OUR PREFATORY POEM

TO VOL. V.

ANOTHER Volume,—(one more charanful link

In the bright strong and intellectual chain

That binds us to the public,)—bids us drink

From the full Cup of Gratitude again—

Pledging a happy future to those friends

Whose firm support has crown'd our prosperous Past ;

And promising to work out noble ends,

With hardy purpose that shall live and last,

Long as their countenance our toil beguiles,

And we are sunned by such a host of smiles !

A host !—the word is one of multitude :

Armies have been concentrated in't ere now ;

Yet is it not with such a force imbued

As may describe our "troops of friends ;"—we bow

To half a world of readers ;—thousands more

Than fight our nation's battle, read our page

In calm enjoyment of that peaceful lore

Which pours its influence upon youth and age,

Giving historic value to the time,

And fixing memory with a mark sublime !

How Art hath reared its triumphs in our tomes !—

How it hath ploughed, and tilled, and cropped our field,

It hath gone into a million homes !—

With what a glorious impress hath it sealed

Year after year of fate !—as TIME rolls on

We form its picture-gallery of the mind,

For many after years to gaze upon

Through the dim Past at what it left behind !

And as it peers the wondrous vista through,

Dwell on the glories we have brought to view !

The by-gone year—nay this one volume—holds

No few memorials of a teeming age

Of startling progress ; every leaf unfolds

Some novel freshness—Life on every page !

More of free Commerce, sprung from hallowed Peace,

Of friendly converse 'tween the crown'd of earth,

Of Royal Home-tours—that will never cease

To prove the Queen's love, and the people's worth.

More of Art's progress,—what the mind achieves

When Science guides it—Literature's display,

The Drama's mimic show—and all the leaves

In the strange book which we call "Every day !"

For still one feature more—we hope to gain

The public favour—'tis our "NEW YEAR'S GIFT,"

Fresh watered into life by genial rain,

Of Genius, Patience, Industry, and Thrift !

Thrown into pictured form—and soon we hope

To deck some thousand walls, from goodly frames,

Showing our noble river's glorious scope

THE MIGHTY LONDON ON MAJESTIC THAMES !

Enough—more words were idle : now adieu,

No more, sweet Public, we your time abuse,

But still grand efforts shall be made for you

Who Illustrate the triumph of our News !

LONDON, JANUARY, 1845.

JULY 1, TO DECEMBER 21, 1844.

2. A Revising B. register in Maryland decided in favour of a claim to vote under the Reform Act, from a lodging only.

3. News of the arrival of the new Governor-General, Sir H. Hardinge, at Calcutta, on July 23; and of Lord Ellenborough's embarkation on his return, on August 1, previous to which a splendid banquet was given to his lordship at Calcutta.—Intelli since conveyed by steam-ship and railway, from Liverpool to Montreal in 13 days 24 hours.—Entire destruction of the city of Niagaraga, by earthquake.—Accounts of O'Connell's triumphant progress to his native mountains.

4. The King of the French granted an amnesty to all political offenders whose penalty, pronounced previously to 1844, was to expire before the 1st of January, 1847; and to twelve of their political prisoners sentenced to imprisonment for various terms, from six to twenty years, or to transportation.

5. A sudden death of Lady Hayler, aged 66, at Brighton.—Death of Lady Heytesbury, at the Vice-regal Lodge, Dublin.

7. The King of the French landed at Portsmouth, and proceeded to Windsor, on a visit to her Majesty. His Majesty was most cordially received by all classes, and by his frankness and affability, made a most favourable impression. During his short stay at Windsor, he was entertained by state banquets, and was installed with the usual ceremonies as a Knight of the Garter. Addresses were presented to him from the Corporations of London and Windsor, and he received one from the Corporation of Portsmouth before he landed. On the 14th, the King, accompanied by her Majesty and Prince Albert, left the Castle for Portsmouth, intending to embark for France, but the tempestuous state of the weather rendering it probable that he would be enabled to disembark at Treport, his Majesty took the resolution of proceeding by the South-Western Railway to London, and thence to the New Cross station, and forward by the South-Eastern line to Dover. On reaching New Cross, about eleven P.M., escorted by the Royal Horse Guards, the large station was in flames, a most destructive fire having burst out about two hours before his Majesty's arrival; notwithstanding which, preparations were hastily made for receiving his Majesty with suitable respect, and which he courteously acknowledged. He entered the railway carriage amidst the mingled cheers of the people and the noise and confusion of the firemen engaged in working the engines, and arrived in Dover about two A.M. About eleven o'clock, after receiving an address from the Corporation, his Majesty embarked for Calais.—The Queen and Prince Albert passed the night on board the royal yacht, in Portsmouth harbour, and afterwards spent a few days at the Isle of Wight.—Companion to the Albatross.

Seven lives lost by a boat swamped at Plymouth.—Four persons drowned in a heavy gale in the Mersey: nine in a boat run down by the Irish Duke steamer, and five by a boat capsizing.—On the previous day the Nymph, from a collision with the Ocean Queen, sank in the Mersey, and of the crew, all but three, were drowned.

11. Lord Ellenborough arrived at Portsmouth, from Calcutta, in the Locust steam-ship.

12. Sudden death of the Duchess of Marlborough, at Blenheim Palace.

13. Marriage of Queen Christina to the Duke of Rianagares, at Madrid.

14. Terrible explosion of a gun, in firing salutes at the King's Bastion, Plymouth: two artillerists killed.—O'Connell's manifesto issued for Federative or single Republic.—Mr. Hampton's new balloon totally destroyed at Dublin, by striking in its ascent against a chimney, and taking fire from the sparks issuing therefrom. Mr. Hampton escaped with little injury.—The Gladiator war-steamer, 1230 tons, launched at Woolwich.—Marriage of Mrs. Nesbitt, of the Haymarket Theatre, to Sir W. Woodley, Bart.

15. The Earl of Ellenborough gazetted as Viscount Southam.—Lucerne made a strong demonstration against the installation of the Jesuits there.—Two men and two horses drowned on Lanesand Sands, by the rising tide.

16. Atrocious murders in Cork and Kilkenny, and Carrick-on-Shannon; and two brutal murders in Tipperary.

17. Extensive fire at Blackwall: the Britannia Tavern burnt, and others much damaged.

18. News of the town of Matamoros, in Mexico, destroyed by a hurricane.—The long-looked-for Brazilian Treaty received from Rio de Janeiro.—A Bill for the Abolition of Slavery lost in the Portuguese Chamber of Peers.—Eleven persons killed by a colliery explosion at Rowley Regis, Staffordshire.

20. The New Royal Exchange opened by her Majesty and Prince Albert, in state; the royal procession being met by the Lord Mayor in state, who, with several of the Aldermen and Common Councilmen on horseback, preceded her Majesty to the Exchange, where a banquet and the ceremony of proclaiming "the Royal Exchange," took place by sound of trumpet. The day was one of general rejoicing throughout the City.

21. The Duke de Montmorency tried at Paris for the distribution of alleged seditious emblems, and acquitted.—Opening of the House General of Holland, by the King.

22. Opening of the Belgian Chambers by King Leopold.—A waterspout burst upon the town of Cete, and crushed several houses.—Great overflow of the Rhone, the Danube, and the Saone.

23. News of dissension in the Cabinet of Greece, and a change of Ministry. Several persons killed at elections.—The Honourable W. E. Trenchard tried at the Central Criminal Court for shooting at Mr. Smith, gunmaker, of Holborn, and found "Not Guilty, on the ground of insanity."—The celebrated Father Mathew arrested in Dublin for a debt incurred for temperance medals, and a subscription set on foot for his relief.—The first stone of the New Docks at Rotherhead laid with splendid ceremony.

24. Died, Miss S. Wynard, aged 71, at Kensington Palace, daughter of the late Lieutenant-General Wynard, and for many years bed-chamber woman to the late Princess Augusta; Col. Sir Samuel Gordon Higgins, K.C.H., aged 74, in Chapel-street, Belgrave-square, Esquerry to the Duchess of Gloucester; his Grace the Duke of Grafton, K.G., aged 84, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Suffolk.—The Spanish Constitution of 1807 abrogated, under the dictation of General Narvaez, President of the Council of Ministers, who proposed one of much less liberal construction.

25. Defeat of 3000 Kabyles by the French troops under Marshal Bugeaud.

26. News of renewed dissensions at Canton.

NOVEMBER.

2. A large factory at Oldham fell down and killed 21 persons, besides injuring others.—Alarming conflagration at Southampton: 40 houses, a brewery, and ten works, burnt.

3. Six men killed at Derby by the falling in of a newly-built sewer arch, by the removal of the centre before the materials had set.

4. News of a conspiracy formed at Madrid to assassinate General Narvaez.—Thirty persons arrested at Barcelona during the riots there.—Continued ravages of brigands in Greece.—News of a Brahmin festival at Gungputtee, when 190 persons were killed by the falling of a staircase.

7. A verdict of manslaughter found against the master of the Waterman steamer, No. 6, for running down a wherry, by which a waterman was drowned.

12. A very melancholy accident occurred on the river, near Blackwall, on board a new steam-boat called the Gipsy Queen, by which Mr. Jacob Samuda, the head of a firm engaged in business as engineers, lost his life, along with nine other persons. The vessel was making an experimental trip with a view of trying engines of a new construction, called bell-crank engines, said to be the invention of Mr. Samuda; and while he was in the engine-room with the other officers, superintending and examining the working of the engine, the boiler burst and scalded to death all within reach of the explosion.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert left Windsor Castle for Bury, near Stamford, on a visit to the Marquis of Exeter, and returned to Windsor on the 16th.

13. News of a dreadful hurricane at Lake Erie, with loss of more than fifty lives, and property of great value.—Death of Mr. Sargant Andrews.

14. The closing prices of the following Stocks this evening were:—3 per Cent. Reduced Annuitants, 104; 3 per Cent. Consolidated Annuitants, 104; 3 per Cent. New Annuitants, 102.

19. The sum of £3000 subscribed at Birmingham for public baths and walks.—Violent affray at Stapleford Park, between the agents of Lord Harborough and of the Midland Counties Railway.

20. News of great excitement at New York, on the approaching election of President.

21. Fatal accident on the Midland Counties Railway, at Beeston, near Nottingham, and three lives lost. A verdict of manslaughter returned against the station-master at Nottingham.

23. Intelligence received of the election of Mr. Polk as President of the America, by a large majority over Mr. Clay.

24. Total eclipse of the moon, visible in some parts of England.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 114, Vol. V.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1844.

[SIXPENCE.
WITH SUPPLEMENT, GRATIS.]

SESSIONAL SYMPTOMS.

VERY sign of the beginning of the end of the session is distinctly visible; the indications of the period so desired by all parties—by the Ministers who represent her Majesty, and by the members who represent the people—are abundant, decisive, and not to be mistaken. We have before spoken of a fatality that overtakes measures that are still left pending, about the first week of July. It is a legislative epidemic, periodical in its visits, unvarying in its effects, and this week has set in, as Canning once said of the English summer, "with its usual severity."

There are two ways of getting rid of business; one is by talking as little and doing as much as possible: this is the mode pursued by men in the City. The other is by talking much, doing a little, deferring a good deal, and altogether dropping the rest. Business is thus, at least, disposed of, though it is not done; but it is the method practised at Westminster. The much talk is a symptom of the early part of the session, when time does not press, and grouse shooting is a long way off. The deferring measures is partly a consequence of the talk aforesaid, and begins about the middle of legislative sitting; the dropping measures altogether is the last and fatal symptom which shows that its days are numbered. Soon after its appearance, dissolution supervenes; and many an elaborately-drawn measure sinks into "mere oblivion." That symptom has appeared this week.

On Monday evening Sir Robert Peel stated to the House of Commons the measures the Government intend to proceed with, and those they intend to abandon. The list of failures is rather longer than most people could wish, especially those sanguine spirits who are always expecting Parliament to do "something." It includes the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, the Irish Registration Bill, the Irish Municipal Bill; the decision on the County Courts Bill is postponed for a week, when it will in all probability receive the coup de grace.

The Superior Courts, Common Law Bill, and the Small Debts Bill, are not in the charge of the Government; but if the Ministry cannot carry through its measures, it is not likely an independent member will be able to do so.

The Poor-law Bill is not yet completely abandoned; the Government has still some hopes of proceeding with it. The hope, we fancy, must be something mingled with fears.

Now, looking at what the Parliament has done—and, be it said, undone—during the present session, at the scarcely disguised command of the Ministry, we are safe in saying that the Government is strong enough to carry through almost any measure it really intends or truly wishes to carry. With what facility Sir R. Peel has effected his settlement of the Bank Charter! How easily the Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. The alteration in the Sugar Duties was carried against the strong opposition of the friends of the Ministry, which was saved by the votes of those who usually oppose it. Determination and perseverance in the face of difficulties carried the Government through; Sir R. Peel screwed his courage to the sticking place, and did not fail. It was the same with the Factory Bill. Not even a majority against them could drive the Government to the course it did not mark out for itself; Lord Ashley, if not outargued, was outnumbered. Both on the Factory question and the Sugar Duties Bill, the House of Commons reversed its own decisions, at the instance of the Ministry. How determined, too, was the support it gave to Lord Lyndhurst's Dissenters Chapel Bill, which passed both houses in the face of opposition out of doors, which, on some occasions, has been found too powerful to be disregarded. We may fairly suppose, then, that, having done so much, the Government might have done more. It had only to will that a certain thing should be done, and it was effected; all that is not done, therefore, must be considered exactly that which it did not wish to do.

Every one must remember the sarcastic reviews that Lord Lyndhurst used, in the days of the Whig Ministry, to give of that Government's sins of omission, of its failures and shortcomings, at the close of every session. He was then in Opposition, he is now in office; but his skill in criticising the deficiencies of his opponents has not enabled him to infuse the ability of producing results into his friends. The Government of which Lord Lyndhurst is a member is open to the same reproach that he, with such damaging effect, used to cast upon its predecessors. And among the measures abandoned, virtually or actually, are some which the Lord Chancellor himself either actually supported or did not oppose. Where is Lord Cottenham's Bill for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt? Dragged from the light of day into the darkness of a Select Committee by the twin measure of Lord Brougham, who would rather see a bad law disgrace the Statute Book for ever, than permit any one but himself to have the credit of reforming it. Where is the County Courts Bill? Stopped in its progress by the loss of Lord Cottenham's bill; for it was at first delayed, in consequence of the more comprehensive measure of the Ex-Chancellor rendering the more local enactment in many points unnecessary: thus one evil creates another.

There is no doubt that much of this delay and disappointment as to the carrying through of proposed measures, is unavoidable in a Legislative Assembly; it is one of the evils that must be submitted to for the sake of the compensating good arising from free discussion—an advantage that would be but ill exchanged for all the celerity that the machinery of an absolute power, fixing every thing by an ukase, or a decree, could afford. That the evil is in some respects unavoidable, seems proved from its existing alike under two Governments, so differently circumstanced, as those of Sir R. Peel and Lord Melbourne. The Whig Ministry had a bare majority in the Commons, and a united and powerful opposition; while in the Lords it could scarcely carry a single measure: it, therefore, did nothing. The present Government has an overwhelming majority in the Commons, where the opposition to it is broken and divided; while in the Lords, it has the powerful support of the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Lyndhurst, and the good will, in the main, of the majority of the Peers. Yet, strange to say, the strong Government does almost as little as the weak one. There are so many events, beyond the control of a Ministry, giving rise to discussions it cannot prevent, that some expenditure of time is inevitable. But the mischief is in a great degree to be attributed to the Ministry not pressing its own measures forward at the early part of the Session, when the greater number of nights are occupied, we will not say wasted, in discussions on every imaginable subject. We think it possible to combine the advantages of free and full discussion with a greater dispatch of business, provided the Government would attempt less, know with more certainty its own intentions, and exhibit a little more determination and earnestness as to all the measures they take in hand. It is possible to talk and work at the same time, but no example of the double process is furnished by the Session of 1844.

FUNERAL OF CAMPBELL, THE POET, IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY, ON WEDNESDAY LAST.

FUNERAL OF THE POET CAMPBELL, IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Farewell! farewell, with kindred ashes mix'd,
Thy worldly home is now for ever fix'd;
Poet! amongst some mighty ones of old,
Who sleep around thee 'neath the marble cold!

But is it death-still eye throughout the pile—
Does it not happen in the mortal coil
That spirits from their tombs disparting rise
And join their fancies in strange colloquies?
Can they who can't die, now to hope—then fear,
Again to smile—or weep the pensive tear—
To laugh outright at Wit and Honour's play,
Or steal our senses by Harmony away—
Can these all mixed, in mute communion lie?
Do they not sometimes have ghost-revelry,
And at the midnight gaze the inscribed floor
With harmless incantation of earth once more?

Alas! 'tis silence all—the monuments
Are only emblems of the deep, intense,
And lasting sleep of those who are enshrined,
Once quick with various qualities of mind,
But now all equal in the silent dust
As e'en to be the king and peasant must!

Farewell! thou classic bard of hope, and song
Of many-ministered truth! Time will prolong
Thy memory through yet unborn-of years,
And make it, dimm'd but by the Muses' tears,
A star to gaze on, like thy own sweet theme,
A thing to love and cherish in the dream
Of life's dull sleep, until the hour be nigh
When all shall merge into Eternity!

Sleep, gentle Spirit! 'neath the Abbey wall,
Nobles and statesmen—Poets wept thy fall—
But up on high thine was a welcome death,
For now Heaven's quire has gain'd more tuneful breath!

W.

The funeral of no public character since that of the late Mr. Canning, has excited so much interest in the public mind as that of the poet, Thomas Campbell, which took place on Wednesday last in Westminster Abbey. We speak not of royal funerals, which are of course an exception, and such an exception as afford no contradiction to our assertion when speaking of subjects. Thomas Campbell was known to all who like delight in pursuits above mere animal gratification; a patriot, a poet, a scholar, and a gentleman. It was no wonder then that a host of men of all ranks and parties—of literary men, of artists, and of friends, who knew and estimated his virtues whilst living—flocked to his funeral, and by their presence gave the last testimony of what they were capable of their respect to his virtues, his genius, and his philanthropy.

It was wisely chosen that the remains of the author of the "Pleasures of Hope," should find their long and last home in Poets' Corner, and that the dust of the greatest poet of these days should mingle with the kindred dust of the great poets of earlier times.

The plate which accompanies this description of the funeral will be viewed with interest by thousands of persons, and it will be creditable to their good feeling as well as to their good taste to sympathize with the sentiments which have led us to present it to our readers and subscribers.

The mourners, who were anxious to pay the last tribute of respect to departed worth, assembled in the Jerusalem Chamber, which is an ancient room, well known in the annals of English history, situated on the north side of the Abbey, in an angle formed by the south aisle and the cloisters of that venerable edifice. The corpse, which had been landed last week from Boulogne, and which was brought to London, and deposited at the house of Mr. Ives, the undertaker, in Holborn, for a few days, was removed to a small apartment in the Abbey, called, we believe, the "Room of the Spirit," on Saturday last, and all the preparations for the solemn occasion duly made. The pall-bearers and chief mourners put on their sable weeds in the house of the Rev. Mr. Milman, a poet of no small reputation, and formerly Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford, now a Canon of the Abbey; and at ten minutes to twelve o'clock, the procession, which passed at once from the Jerusalem Chamber, by a private way, into the Abbey, and not as some of our contemporaries have erroneously stated through the Great Western Door, took its way to Poets' Corner along the south aisle of the Abbey in the following order:—

The Rev. Mr. Milman, the officiating minister.
The coffin, covered with a large black pall, supported by
The Duke of Argyll Lord Mordaunt
Lord Brougham Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart
Lord Aberdeen Lord Leigh, and Lord Campbell Sir Robert Peel
Lord Stangford

All of whom wore scarves and handkerchiefs.

The Chief Mourner.

Mr. Alexander Campbell, Mr. Wales (nephew of the deceased), in crape scarves and handkerchiefs.

The Executors.

Dr. Beattie and Mr. W. Moxon.

Mr. J. Richardson, Mr. W. Ayrton, the Rev. C. J. Hassell, and Mr. E. Moxon, wearing silk scarves and handkerchiefs; and after these the great body of the mourners, walking two-and-two, amongst whom we observed:—

Sir J. C. Hobhouse, Bart., M.P.; Sir J. Haughey, Bart., M.P.; Major-General Sir J. Macdonald, K.C.B.; Sir P. Shelley, Bart.; the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, M.P.; R. M. Milnes, Esq., M.P.; B. Disraeli, Esq., M.P.; the Right Hon. R. Peel, M.P.; Emerson Tennant, Esq., M.P.; R. Christopher, Esq., M.P.; J. G. Lockhart, Esq.; the Rev. W. Harnes; the Rev. A. Lyce; W. S. Ayrton, Esq.; H. Smith, Esq.; Brighton; Dr. J. Johnson; Sir F. Laune; the Rev. Dr. Crilly; W. Jordan, Esq.; Mr. Pettigrew, Mr. Semple (of Boulogne), Dr. C. Holland, Mr. G. Daniell, Sir J. Ross, Dr. Vivian, &c. A deputation from the literary Association of Poland, of which the deceased poet was the founder, was also present, consisting of the Chevalier B. de Wretchinski, Colonel Teyssier, Captain Kloczynski, M. Kuzman, M. Olszowski, and Count Grabowski: one of whom carried a small portion of earth from the grave of Kosciuszko, near Cracow, which was cast into the grave of Mr. Campbell, and will mingle with the dust with which he is covered.

The service was read in a more than commonly expressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Milman; and certain it is, that those who attended appeared, and, no doubt, were more than usually affected by the solemnity of the occasion, and by the recollection of him to whom they came to pay their final testimony of veneration. After the Epistle of St. Paul, ending with the words, "For as much as you know that your labour in the Lord is not in vain," the organ pealed forth its solemn notes, and then the corpse was lowered into the grave, and the clergyman concluded the ritual of the burial service.

After the whole of the ceremony was finished, the procession returned to the Jerusalem Chamber, and after a few minutes most of the mourners retired.

The public were admitted at the door in Poets' Corner, and were allowed to take their places behind the railings used to keep the body of the church clear on public solemnities.

The coffin was very plain—black cloth, with gilt nails—and the following inscription, being all the decoration of the last narrow tenement of a great man:—"Thomas Campbell, LL.D., author of 'The Pleasures of Hope.' Died 15th June, 1844."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, JULY.

MOROCCO.

An extraordinary courier, who left Parys on the 29th of June, brings the following important intelligence:—

"The Emperor of Morocco has rejected the ultimatum of the Spanish Government."

"The Emperor has equally rejected the proffered mediation of England."

"The four Spanish Ministers now at Barcelona will return to Madrid at the end of this present week."

The impression produced by the news of the Emperor's obstinacy, in the best political circles, is, that France must have recourse to most decisive measures. France and Spain, it is concluded, are equally set at defiance, and England barred from interference.

The Emperor of Morocco has not a part in his dominions that might not be taken by a frigate and two bomb-vessels in less than four hours. His army is a large, and their mode of warfare perfectly childish. The national resources are very trifling. The munitions of war are scanty; while the population of the country is but in proportion of one-third to the whole extent of the dominions, and of them the Emperor could at no time gather or hold together 100,000 men, and these comprising a host of such ill-dressed, ill-armed, ill-disciplined fighting men, and these comprising a host of such ill-dressed, ill-armed, ill-disciplined fighting men, as a man might well be "ashamed to march through Coventry with." From their biggest habit of excluding from their country all Europeans, and from the little experience they have gathered of European war tactics, it will be some years (even under the tutelage of Abd-el-Kader, who has acquired this knowledge) before they will be able to make any stand against the French, so that, once engaged in open warfare with that power, the slaughter of the French arms will be as terrible as their success will be certain, easy, and rapid. The Prince de Joinville may take Mogadore in three hours, and possess himself of the capital in five days, with every facility, and with no larger army than 3000 infantry and 500 cavalry. The annexed engraving will convey an idea of the Arab cavalry, the Emperor's chief force, against whom the French troops have to contend.

FRANCE.

The great topic of discussion during the last three days arises out of an article which appeared in the Moniteur of Sunday last, in which it endeavours to discredit, and was to be transported to the Cansey Islands. He is believed to have been connected with an extensive conspiracy against the Government, which had recently been discovered in the provinces. There is nothing new from Barcelona.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 26th ult. announce that Russia had acknowledged the constitutional Government of Greece.

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer, Montrose, Captain Samuel Lewis, arrived at Southampton on Monday afternoon, at one p.m., from the Peninsula. Her dates of departure are as follows:—Gibraltar, June 23; Cadiz, 24; Lisbon, 25; of Oporto, 27; Vigo, 28.

It was reported the day of her departure from Gibraltar that a severe battle had been fought between the French and Moors, on the 15th, and several since that date; many are stated to have been killed on both sides.

The Minister of Justice, M. Sousa Azeredo, had tendered his resignation, and it was said that the Queen refused to accept it. His reason for so doing, it appears, is, that the decree for the collection of taxes, which, as an extraordinary measure, was the act of all the ministers jointly, was issued, not only without his concurrence, but even without his knowledge, so much so that it was only after it had been published in the Diário do Governo, with the names of all his colleagues appended to it, that his own signature to the original was applied for.

The Constitutional Charter has now become a mere face—name and nothing more. The Chief of the Lisbon Police takes it upon himself, contrary to all law, to prohibit the publication of the Opposition papers, and finding that in despite of his interdiction, the editors still contrive to circulate them to some extent, he applies to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, without the least ceremony, orders the Postmaster General to stop the transmission of the obnoxious journals through the Post-office; and yet this is the state of things which the papers in the interest of the Government are constantly loading, and placing in favourable contrast to the frankly avowed absolutism of former times.

Mr. John Alfred Torr is still confined in the Castle of St. George, and, in gross violation of his privileges as an Englishman, has not yet been placed under the jurisdiction of the British Judge Conservator. The Government recently attempted to compromise the matter by offering to set him at liberty if he would promise to say no more about it, but he has spurned the offer and continues to demand a fair trial.

This is a strong presumptive proof of his innocence, and, assuredly, if ever any one was entitled to compensation, Mr. Torr is so, for the outrageous treatment he has received at the hands of the Portuguese Government.

TURKEY.

Our letters from Constantinople reach us to the 12th ultimo. On the previous day the Sultan had returned from his trip, and was received with as many honours as if during his absence he had been victorious enough to conquer a vast and wealthy country. Salutes of guns, volleys of musketry, began as soon as his steamer hove in sight, and continued in one thundering roll for a full hour, until he had safely landed at his palace at Begler Bay. The Grand Vizier, the ministers, and all the high grandees of the capital, were on the wharf to receive and welcome him. Salutes were repeated at noon, at Bendi (the afternoon prayer), at sunset, and at Yaldi (the evening prayer). The city and the banks of the Bosphorus were illuminated at night; fireworks were let off, the sounds of music and bells burst forth from every house, and all was joy and exultation. The poets, too, had been making sonnets on the occasion, the last line or two of each recording the date of the event. The ministers display their zeal in service homage to their young Sovereign, who is landed out of his senses, and made to believe that the wishes of the people are all concentrated in his own individual comfort and contentment. It was hoped that during his late voyage he would have seen that the glitter of his capital is not to be found in the provinces, where crumbling hovels are witnesses to the mal-administration of a government which squanders millions in vain show, whilst it neglects public works which would tend to advance the prosperity of the country.

The Turkish fleet, under the command of the Capudan Pacha, was at Mytilene, and was to set out for Syria immediately after the arrival of the steamer Esmeri Djedid.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Sugar Duties Bill was read a second time, and the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill went through committee.

Lord Powis moved the third reading of the bill for preventing the Union of the Seas of Harp and St. Asaph.—Lord Vivian thought the people of North Wales were indifferent to the question as to whether these Seas should be united or otherwise.—The Bishop of Bangor denied that any such indifference existed.—The Duke of Wellington said her Majesty had not given her assent to this bill, nor were Ministers prepared to advise that the royal assent should be given. If, under such circumstances, their lordships should suffer the bill to go down to the House of Commons, he hoped that in the latter house such amendments would be made as to preserve the machinery of the bill for uniting these Seas, which would be in a great measure repeated by the present bill.—Lord Mowbray said that this bill, if passed, would stand in the way of that provision for the working clergy contemplated by the ecclesiastical commissioners; and he, therefore, moved that it be read a third time that day six months.—The Lord Chancellor expressed a doubt as to whether he could put the question upon a bill which so directly affected the rights of the Crown, and suggested the propriety of appointing a committee to search for precedents.—Considerable discussion followed, and at length Lord Canterbury moved the adjournment of the debate, with a view to the appointment of the committee suggested by the Lord Chancellor.—The Earl of Powis wished to have the bill read a third time, and referred upon the question that the bill do pass.—After some further discussion, the motion of Lord Canterbury was agreed to, the debate was adjourned, and a committee to search for precedents appointed. Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

After the presentation of a large number of petitions, Sir R. Peel intimated that it was the intention of the Government to persevere with the Bank Charter Bill, and to carry one, not yet introduced, for the regulation of future joint-stock banks; also, to persevere with the Poor Law Amendment Bill, the Railways Regulation Bill, the Savings Banks Bill, the Presbyterian Marriages Bill, and some others, to which they did not anticipate much opposition. Upon the County Courts Bill they would reserve themselves until after the decision of the House of Lords on the subject of imprisonment for debt. It was not intended to proceed with the Irish Registration Bill beyond the second reading, nor with its companion, the Irish Municipal Corporation Bill. Neither was it intended to go on with the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. A bill would, however, be introduced respecting the jurisdiction of the house in contested elections, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee on that subject.

On the motion for the second reading of the Irish Registration Bill, Mr. DUNCAN objected to its proceeding as being a useless waste of time, now that it was announced that the bill was not to be passed during the present session.—A discussion ensued, in which Lord Eton, Mr. Sturt, Mr. Searl, Mr. Shaw, Mr. M. J. O'Connell, and Lord Palmerston took part; after which Sir R. Peel said he had no wish to press the second reading of the bill against the general feeling of the Irish members.—After some further discussion the house proceeded with the other orders of the day.

The Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, after some discussion, went through committee, as did the Prisons (Scotland) Bill, and the house adjourned at half past eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The adjourned debate on the Bangor and St. Asaph Bishops Bill was postponed to Monday next.

The Earl of RANKIN presented a petition from Llyncham, in Wiltshire, praying for a repeal of the Corn-laws, and originated a discussion on it, in which Lord Methuen, the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Cleveland, the Earl of Strathmore, the Duke of Beaufort, Lord Ashburton and Lord Beaumont took part. The point in argument was whether or not the rate of wages rose and fell with the price of food.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave notice that on Thursday, he should put a question relative to the dismissal of Mr. Cornelius O'Brien from the magistracy of Ireland.

Lord CAMPBELL, owing to the absence of the Lord Chief Justice, again postponed his Law of Libel Bill until Friday.

The Earl of DALHOUSIE moved the third reading of the Sugar Duties Bill, and stated to their lordships the principles upon which the Government proceeded with respect to the regulations. He contended that considerable length the various objections which had been urged against the measure while it was in the House of Commons, and expressed his opinion that it was the best measure that could be adopted, both for the interests of the consumer and the general benefit of the country.—Lord MONTGOMERY condemned the course pursued by the Government, in not at once settling this question instead of bringing forward a temporary measure like the one before the house, which left every one interested in the subject in a state of uncertainty. He also objected to the bill, because it would occasion great fluctuation in price, making, as it did, the supply of sugar to this country dependent upon the laws of other countries.—Lord BROUGHAM, in reference to some observations of Lord Montagu, imputing either delusion or hypocrisy to those who had supported the bill on the ground of its tendency to discourage slavery, said that he wholly differed from his noble friend in his theory; he also dissented from the most part of his facts, and entirely differed from him in all his conclusions.—The Earl of RANKIN contended that if a sufficiency of free labour had been supplied to the West Indies, the necessity for this bill would never have arisen.—The Earl of RANKIN thought it a great hardship on the West India proprietors that he was not allowed to refine his sugar before sending it to this country. The bill took a step in the right direction, and, perhaps, as great a step as could be taken in the first instance.—Lord ASHBURTON said such a bill as this was necessary to insure cheapness to the consumer, and considerable advantage to the revenue.—After a few observations from the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of DALHOUSIE shortly replied, after which the bill was read a third time and passed. Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion of Mr. CLANRICARDE, an alteration was made in the standing orders relating to railways, by which subscription contracts entered into before the session of Parliament in which the particular Railway Bill was introduced are in future to be held valid.

Mr. WALLACE moved an address, praying her Majesty to appoint a commission to inquire into the conduct of the Judges who presided at the assizes held in whose the public mind of the impression that the private means of the King of the French are not so large as they have been represented; and more especially that they are sufficient to afford a pretext for withholding from his children donations from the state. Besides borrowing money on his title-deeds, his Majesty has frequently been compelled to have recourse to the liberality of Madame Adelaide, his sister—a state of things which, as the Moniteur remarks, is at variance with the principles of justice and sound policy, as well as opposed to the dignity of the Crown. This being naturally regarded as the precursor of a new donation bill, a discussion arose on the subject in the Chamber of Deputies, on Monday. M. Guizot being asked if the Ministry took upon itself the responsibility of the article in the Moniteur on the donation question, replied in the affirmative; but added, that as there were amongst his own party persons who thought the time for the discussion inappropriate, the Ministry would not bring the measure forward until they should have reason to be confident of its success. A motion was made for passing to the order of the day, at the same time expressing regret that the article in the Moniteur should have been published; but this was resisted, and the Chamber passed to the order of the day without any expression of opinion on the question. M. Guizot's remarks, and the subject generally, are warmly commented upon in the Opposition journals. The Constitutionnel, and the Courrier Français in particular, reprobate, in the strongest terms, the idea of donations, and charge the Ministry with having delayed the house by bringing the subject forward.

In the Chamber of Peers on Monday Count Molé announced that in consequence quence of the attacks which had been made upon his motion elsewhere, he deemed it necessary to withdraw his name from all railroad projects. He contended in strong terms the amendment of M. Cremieux, which disqualified all peers and deputies from taking part in the administration of railways, and named the Government for having allowed a principle so injurious to railway enterprises to pass without remark or animadversion. The Montpelier and Nîmes Railroad Bill was then passed by a majority of 25 to 51.

The feeling against the application for donations is almost general. The real friends of the King think that the article in the Moniteur was most unwise and ill-timed; but it is now well known that it was not advised by the Cabinet.

SPAIN.

We are in receipt of letters and Madrid journals of the 26th ult. arrived this morning. They furnish us with another instance of the respect paid to personal liberty in Spain by the constitutional Government. An artist has been arrested and thrown into prison for engraving on the heads of some portraits supposed to be that of Espartero. The Globo publishes a letter from Paris, asserting that M. Guizot has protested against the idea of hurrying on a marriage for Queen Isabella; but a Barcelona letter states that Count Bresson has been charged with the negotiation for a marriage with the Count de Trapani, and to proceed to Naples almost immediately. If the accounts of the young Queen's state of health that have appeared be well founded, she has something else to think about at present than marriage.

Senor Capetazo Cardero, the former political chief of Badajoz, had been ar-the city of Glasgow in the month of May last, and especially into the circumstances attending the trial of Alexander Walker, accused of a felonious assault.—The Lord Advocate opposed the motion as unavailing and unnecessary.—Mr. Wallace in his reply stated that as usual, whenever he brought any case before the House with respect to the conduct of his countrymen, he never received any assistance from that House. (A laugh.) He believed that Mr. Muir had been most improperly snubbed by the Lord Justice Clerk, and he had no doubt, if the learned Judge had been at the bar, instead of being on the bench, Mr. Muir would have pulled his nose. (Great laughter.) The House then divided, when there appeared—

For his motion	35
Majority	114

At the earnest request of Sir R. Peel, several gentlemen who had precedence gave way, in order to permit Mr. DUNCAN to move on the subject of the opening of letters in the Post-office, to be brought on. Mr. T. DUNCAN then moved for a select committee to inquire into a department of her Majesty's General Post Office, commonly called "The Secret or Inner Office," the duties and employment of the persons engaged therein, and the authority under which the functions of the said office are discharged, with power to the committee to report their opinion to the House, upon the expediency of making alterations in the law under which the present practice of opening letters is carried on. The Honourable Member entered into starting statements as to the mode and extent of the practice, both with respect to foreign and home correspondence, all which, he said, he was prepared to prove if the committee were granted. The letters of the foreign Ministers, he asserted, were examined, and during the disturbances of the year 1842, a commission of three individuals had been sent down to the manufacturing districts, with instructions to examine all suspected correspondence. Nay, the Honourable Member even went the length of saying that the mail bags were frequently sent to the secret office, and that there the letters contained in them were opened wholesale.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM rose immediately, and having acknowledged that since he was last questioned on this subject it had assumed a very serious aspect—that in fact it had become an important question between the people and the Government—stated his determination now to speak out the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Though he would have endorsed the obloquy cast on him, even though it should crush him, rather than injure the public service; and though he had endured much, after the votes and speeches of Lord John Russell, Lord Hawick, Sir George Grey, and Mr. Macaulay—all men conversant with official duties—in favour of Mr. DUNCAN's former motion for inquiry, he now felt himself relieved from his late reserve, and felt bound to confess that he believed it to be impossible to maintain the power confided to him longer without a full inquiry. Now, therefore, without the slightest sacrifice of duty, either to the Crown or to the country, he could, and he would, indulge his own feelings, as well as his sense of public duty, by becoming a party to a most searching inquiry into the state of the law, and the practice under that law, from the earliest time to the present moment. As he had nothing to conceal, he proposed to go before a committee and state every thing he had done down to the present moment. He hoped that his colleagues would also appear before the committee and his predecessors in office, in order that there might be a full and entire investigation. He hoped that the inquiry would also extend to the manner in which this power had been exercised by Lords Lieutenant of Ireland, to whom it was intrusted by the Act as well as to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.—Sir J. Graham, in accordance with this determination, proposed that the committee should be a select one, invested with the amplest powers, and that their investigation should commence with the least possible delay. The following gentlemen, five being those who usually vote against the Government, and four who generally support them, to be the committee of nine, viz.:—Lord Sandon, Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. T. Baring, and Sir W. Heathcote, of the Ministerial side of the House; Sir C. Lemon, Mr. Warburton, Mr. Strutt, the O'Connor Don, and Mr. Ord of the Opposition. To this committee the right hon. barrister who spoke throughout under deep feelings, said he was willing to submit his character and conduct for the most full and searching inquiry, and he confidently hoped to defeat the attempt that had been made to crush him. He moved his proposition as an amendment to Mr. DUNCAN's motion.—Mr. Hume deemed that some gentlemen, learned in the law and accustomed to extract evidence, should be added, one on either side.—Sir G. Grey urged the propriety of delaying the nomination of the select committee until the names should be canvassed.—Mr. LAPOINTE approved of the select committee, and also of the determination to exclude from it all lawyers.—Sir R. Peel said he rejoiced at the appointment of this committee, as it would afford a fitting opportunity for obtaining full and proper information on the subject of this most invidious power. The sets done had been done with the cognizance and under the authority of the whole Government, and the whole Government, and not the Home Secretary individually, were responsible for them. Lawyers had been specially excluded from this committee, because it was feared that if they were nominated squabbles about the construction of the statutes might arise, and an unsatisfactory termination of the labours of the committee would be the result. As the inquiry was to be followed up by full disclosures, and as it was intended that the Post-office authorities should undergo examination, a select committee instead of a select committee was indispensable for the public service.—Lord J. Russell justified his vote for Mr. DUNCAN's former motion, on the ground that Sir J. Graham had then denied every information. He did not regret the course which he had taken on the former occasion, or the excitement which prevailed, because the result was that they were to have an inquiry. He, however, agreed that this should be a select committee, because the purpose they all had in view would be better answered than by an open committee. He also agreed that the names had been properly selected, and so far as he was concerned, he should be happy to state all he knew, although there were others who could give better evidence than him.—Mr. WALKLEY said this select committee was a most extraordinary mode of satisfying the curiosity of the public. It was said that when certain characters fell out honest men came by their own; and as Sir James Graham defended himself on the plea that he was no worse than his predecessors, he was glad that the quarrel between the late and the present Government had brought about the present intended inquiry, which, however, he feared would end in a managed report, vindicating the perpetration of this most odious power.—After some observations from Mr. McGRATH and Mr. WALLACE, Mr. MACAULAY denied that he had made a mere personal attack on Sir James Graham, who, in refusing all information when first asked for, had drawn a distinction between himself and his predecessors in the Home-office. He should be surprised, indeed, if the committee were to report otherwise than that the law required extensive alteration, as being a power, the advantage of which was not at all commensurate with its evil and insecurity.—Mr. WILLIAMS, as a security to the public, proposed that Mr. Hume and Mr. DUNCAN should be added to the committee.—Mr. CECIL said the public were indebted to Mr. DUNCAN and the press for directing attention to this power, which ought not to be possessed by any Government.—Some conversation arose in settling the precise terms of the amendment (the original motion having been withdrawn), but Sir JAMES GRAHAM having assured the House that he wished a full investigation, the following form was agreed to:—"That a committee of secrecy be appointed to inquire into the state of the law with respect to the detaining of letters in the General Post-office, and to the mode in which that power has been exercised, and that the committee should have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to report the result of their inquiry to the House."—It having been discovered that Mr. H. Drummond had practised at the bar some twenty years ago, the name of Mr. W. Patten was substituted for his. With this exception the committee, as proposed by Sir J. Graham, was nominated, after an unsuccessful attempt made to add Mr. DUNCAN's name, which was rejected by 129 against 52.—Five of this committee are to constitute a quorum.—Mr. MACAULAY submitted a motion for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the existing opinions of the several reports on prison discipline, and to recommend some uniform and satisfactory system.—After a short discussion, the hon. member withdrew his motion.

Some unopposed bills were advanced a stage, and the House adjourned, at twelve o'clock, to next day at noon.

HOUSE OF LORDS—WEDNESDAY.

The House did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Commons met at twelve o'clock. Some discussion took place on the motion for going into committee on the Joint Stock Companies Registration and Regulation Bill, which was opposed by Mr. Hume and Mr. Hayter; but eventually the House went into committee, and the first clause was agreed to. The second clause led to a considerable discussion, which was terminated by a motion that the Chairman should report progress, and ask leave to sit again.—Agreed to.

The Smoke Prohibition Bill was postponed until next session. The Customs Duties (Sale of Man) Bill went through committee. The Locomotive, Manufactures (Ireland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Sergeant MURPHY moved that the House should, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a committee to take into consideration the Act 17 and 18 Car. II. c. 7, intitled "An Act for Provision of Ministers in Cities and Corporate Towns, and making the Church of St. Andrew, in the Suburbs of the City of Dublin, prescriptive for ever," with a view to the repeal of so much thereof as relates to the payment of ministers in corporate towns in Ireland.—Lord ELIOT said that he had, in conjunction with the Attorney-General for Ireland, endeavoured to devise some plan to relieve the rate-payers from this burden, but they had not as yet been able to adopt any specific plan which could be submitted to Parliament. Under these circumstances, and as the hon. and learned gentleman proposed no plan of his own, he hoped the House would not assent to the motion, although the law as it now stood did reflect considerable injustice.—While the discussion was proceeding, an attempt was made to rattle out the House, but it failed, and soon after a division was called for. The gallery was cleared, but it appeared that after strangers were withdrawn, a rush of Opposition members into the House took place, and the Ministerial benches being very thin, the Ministers allowed the motion to be carried without a division.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS—THURSDAY.

The Royal Assent was given on Thursday, shortly before four o'clock, by Commission, to the following Bills:—The Sugar Duties Bill, the Vinegar Duties Bill, the Slave Trade Treaties Bill, the Gold and Silver Wares Bill, the Piratical Abolition Bill, the Night Poaching Bill, the Assaults (Ireland) Bill, the Limitation of Actions (Ireland) Bill, the Salisbury and South-Western Branch Railway Bill, the Chester and Holyhead Railway Bill, the Sharnbrook and Chichester Railway Bill, the South Devon Railway Bill, the South-Eastern Railway Bill, the Folkestone Harbour Bill, the Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Stenway Railway Bill, the Sheffield Gas Bill, the Manchester Warehouse Bill, the Manchester Police Bill, the Nottingham Canal Bill, the British Society Incorporation Bill, Liverpool Fire Prevention Bill, and various turnpike, drainage, estate, naturalisation, and other Bills.—The Commissioners were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Walsingham.

After the Commission their lordships resumed the arguments in the case of the Queen v. O'Connell and others.

Their lordships re-assembled for parliamentary business at five o'clock, when the Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack.

Notices were given by the Earl of Minto and the Marquis of Clanricarde to put questions to Government with regard to the war in Africa.

The Earl of RALPH then moved for a committee of their lordships upon the subject of opening letters by the Government and the Post-office.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—THURSDAY.

After the presentation of a number of petitions on various subjects, the House passed to the order of the day for the third reading of the Bank Charter Bill.—Mr. WOODHOUSE moved the insertion of a clause with regard to legal tenders, but there being a technical informality, it was subsequently withdrawn.—Another amendment, proposed by Mr. Turner, to clause 9, was also withdrawn.

Sir J. GRAHAM then moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the Poor Law Amendment Act. A long and interesting discussion ensued, in which Lord J. Russell, Col. Wood, Lord Sydney, Mr. Walker, Mr. Borthwick, and others joined.—At a late hour Mr. FERRAN moved the adjournment of the debate.—This was opposed by Sir R. Peel, who said that if the debate was adjourned, the bill must be given up.—Lord J. MANNERS complained of the conduct of the Government in bringing in the bill at a late hour, and then refusing them the opportunity of discussing it.—After a few words from Lord Stanley, Mr. R. Cochrane, and Mr. Borthwick, the House divided on Mr. Ferran's amendment, when there appeared—

For the amendment	14
Against it	219
Majority against	205

The House again divided on the main question, and the committee was carried by 199 to 19.

The House then adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS—FRIDAY.

In answer to a question from the Earl of Minto, with regard to the affairs of Morocco, the Earl of HARRINGTON said, that her Britannic Majesty's Government had sent to Morocco such forces as they thought the circumstances required, and with regard to every other station, they had such forces ready as were necessary for the protection of British interests.

Lord CAMPBELL then moved the third reading of the Law of Libel Act Amendment Bill. The purpose of the bill is to extend the provisions of the act proposed last session as to private libels and slander, and Government prosecutions for the same offences, by admitting defendants to prove the truth of allegations as a justification.—The Lord Chancellor opposed the bill.—Lord BATHURST advocated the measure.—After a speech from Lord DENHAM against the bill, most of the Opposition peers left the House, and on the division, the measure was thrown out by 33 against 3.—The House adjourned at half-past eight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—FRIDAY.

A new writ was ordered for the borough of Birmingham, in the name of Mr. Schofield, deceased.

The House then went into committee on the Poor-law question.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

According to the promise made to our readers, we resume the analysis of the evidence given before the Select Committee of the Lords on the above subject.

The Earl of Shaftesbury presided on the second day's sitting, the 26th of April last, and the first witness examined was Lord SADDLEY, who was, as we have already stated, a member of the committee.

His lordship stated that, having been one of the Commissioners appointed to select the designs sent in for the new House of Parliament, and, having conferred with the other commissioners in giving the preference to Mr. Barry's, he had made it his business to master all the details of the plan, connected with the House of Lords, and the offices belonging to it. But he admitted, in justice to Mr. Barry, that it never was their "idea, expectation, or wish," to restrict him closely to that plan, which they conceived capable of improvement and modification; and while they did not intend that alterations should be made without reference to them for approval, he could not take upon himself to say that these improvements were expected to be submitted to them severally for inspection, for they had been out of office from the time they had made their report.

The noble lord then read some extracts from the testimony given before a Committee of the House of Commons, by himself and the other Commissioners, to show in how far their united opinions of the excellence of Mr. Barry's design as a general one coincided, but that they also thought it susceptible of various improvements in detail.

As a proof that some portions of the original plan were not approved of, and called for alteration, he instanced a pillar, round which the royal carriage was to drive, after entering the tower from the west, before stopping for the Sovereign to alight at the staircase at that side, and thence it was to depart by the southern gateway. Now that arrangement had been considered objectionable, on account of the length of the royal carriage, and he had urged it to Mr. Barry as such. Mr. Barry seemed not to agree in opinion with him; but, however, he found that that part of the plan had been altered in the present building, and he approved of such alteration. But what he thought was, that, considering the great additions made to the area of the original plan, as much had not been made of the increased space as might have been.

It was at this portion of his lordship's evidence that he explained that the observations which he was making had reference to the plan published in this journal. We have already given the question and answer at length; but it will be more explanatory just to recapitulate them briefly as follows:—

Then your objection to what has been done, is not that there has been alteration, but that that alteration, considering the increase of area, has not been sufficiently effected to accomplish the purpose?

Yes. I object to the present plan, because I think it is not nearly so good a plan as the one before you, and secondly, I object to it, because the Architect has not carried out his own idea in the best possible manner. But, perhaps, I had better now explain the second plan, taken from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and which is now being carried into execution.

The noble lord then proceeded to detail the course proposed for the royal carriage by the present plan. The royal carriage was now to drive through the Victoria Tower, and under the Queen's Robing-room into the royal court. Her Majesty was set down at the left, and ascended a flight of nine steps to the first landing, then ascended three more to the second, and turning to the right, had to mount a second flight of twenty-six steps to the lobby, thence through the Victoria Gallery to the Robing-room, after which she had to pass through the Victoria Gallery again into the House of Lords. Now, his objection was to every part of the plan except the Tower, which he admitted was much improved. But he particularly reprobated the stairs, as consisting of so many steps unbroken by a landing.

His lordship then entered into a minute detail of his objections to the internal arrangements of the present plan. In the centre of the lobby was a pillar for supporting the ceiling, which being exactly opposite the staircase would be in the way of the Peers' approach. What struck him as principally objectionable, was, that everything appeared to be sacrificed to the Victoria Gallery. The Queen's Robing-room was removed from the back of the throne; a continuous roof was now necessary (contrary to the original plan, by which the House of Lords was intended to be higher than the surrounding buildings) from the House of Lords to Little Abington-street; thereby causing an obstruction of light and air; the House could not be lighted, if deemed necessary, at one end; a passage north, east, west, or south, could only be had through the Victoria Gallery, which it would be necessary to keep heated and lighted all the year round. Mr. Barry's conception about this gallery might be very well if the building was intended only for the Fine Arts, but he conceived that they were for other purposes, and, however the Fine Arts might be called in for its embellishment, he did not think that any architectural arrangement should be sacrificed for their display. In his opinion the original plan had been all marred. There had been something like a gallery in the original plan, but the present was too short for use in proportion to its width, and too wide for a hall; in fact it was neither one thing nor another. There were no corridors in the present plan from one end of the House to the other along either side of the gallery, which was in the old plan, and the want of which was a great objection to the new.

Here the noble lord begged to suggest a remedy for the inconvenience which he conceived to exist in the design at present carrying out, and proposed a plan, showing by what means he proposed effecting a change. It contemplated reducing the Victoria Gallery to the dimensions of 100 feet by 45; thereby making it a hall instead of a gallery, and making the ascent to the House more gradual by introducing two additional landings.

The noble lord concluded his testimony by expressing his regret that the present investigation should have only taken place at the eleventh hour; but though, if the contemplated changes should take place, it would be necessary to pull down a portion of the masonry already set, the expense of such a thing could hardly be deemed worth any consideration, where they were expending nearly a million of money. It was, however, a great pity, from the advanced state of the works, they were placed in the position, that they should either put up with what they considered a defect in the plan, or pay the cost which its removal might occasion.

Mr. Barry was then called, and on being questioned touching the alterations above adverted to, maintained that none had taken place in the leading features of the original plan, those which had been made being only in the details; and with respect to those he had consulted no one, nor had he any direct authority for them; but they had been effected, upon his own judgment, with a view to the general improvement, beauty, and convenience of the internal arrangements. He contended that although the staircase might have been different from that in the original plan, it was much improved in the present, and he gave examples of staircases of greater length and height, and number of steps, in various celebrated palaces on the Continent, where one flight was continued without any landing. With respect to the Robing-room, as he had been given to understand that inconvenience would arise from the Sovereign proceeding a distance under the weight of heavy robes, there would be no difficulty in getting a Robing-room closer to the Throne.

He is then called upon to produce the original instructions he received for the dimensions of the House of Lords, and the various offices, chambers, and apartments connected with its business; and having accordingly handed in a copy of those instructions, containing a detailed statistical account of all the different apartments and other conveniences required, with the height, length, and width of each arranged in a tabular form, and stated that those were the only instructions he had received, the witness is ordered to withdraw, and the committee adjourned to the following Monday.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ACCIDENT BY LIGHTNING.—On Monday evening, during the storm, the lightning struck the clock of St. Clement's Church, in the Strand, and as the minute hand, which was at ten minutes past six o'clock, back five minutes, when it stopped; the flash passed down the steeple, and crossed the street, where Mr. Caiman, the umbrella manufacturer, who was standing at his door, received a severe shock on the legs, which nearly felled him to the ground. At the same time a shower of sand and small pebbles descended on the houses in Cambridge-street, Hyde Park-square, thus corroborating, in a great degree, the truth of the phenomenon described as having taken place at Liverpool during the previous week.

ESCAPE OF A SOLDIER FROM THE STRONG-ROOM IN THE TOWER.—On Sunday night last, Thomas Hodges, a private in the Scots Fusilier Guards, made his escape from the strong-room attached to the barracks in the Tower. He was under sentence of sixty days' confinement, for disobedience of orders, and is believed to have been in possession of a quantity of valuable jewellery which had been stolen from a gentleman named Studley, at North Brinton, by his servant, who was transported for the offence at the last Old Bailey Sessions. The girl was taken into custody in the Tower, while on a visit to Hodges, who was seen several times, by his comrades, with jewellery and a number of sovereigns, after that occurrence. He was taken into custody and examined at Union-hall, but discharged for want of evidence. Since then he has been tried by a court martial, and sentenced to sixty days' confinement. He contrived to get a suit of private clothes on Saturday, and was seen in possession of a diamond ring, and about twenty sovereigns. He is supposed to have gone to Hereford, and a handsome reward is offered for his apprehension. He is about six feet high, well made, light complexion, and sandy hair and whiskers; aged twenty-six.

ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—On Wednesday morning, about half-past two o'clock, a man named Jacob Allwood, the master of the Dover, a ballast steam engine, and vessel, lying nearly off Hungerford-market, his wife, and two other females, embarked in a boat at the wharf opposite, for the purpose of going on board, when the boat upset, and the whole party were immersed in the water. The crew of a Thames police-galley saved two of the women, and conveyed them ashore in a deplorable condition, and a police-constable of the F division, named Smith, saved Allwood, but his wife was drowned.

FIRE IN OXFORD-STREET.—Late on Wednesday night a fire of somewhat an alarming character broke out in the extensive range of premises known as Stratford House, situate at No. 151, Oxford-street, in the occupancy of Messrs. Taylor and Morel, jewellers and dealers in fancy goods. The flames were first discovered by a man in the 'news at the back of the premises, by perceiving flames rising in the second floor. An instant alarm was raised, and in the course of a few minutes a great body of the F division of police were on the spot, as well as the St. Marylebone parish engine. That part of the premises where the fire originated was, with its contents, destroyed, the adjoining apartments much damaged by fire and water, and the ceilings underneath greatly damaged by water. The upper floors are also discoloured by smoke and heat. The precise cause of the fire is unknown, but the supposition is, that it was caused through a cat having crawled under the kitchen fire-place, and her coat becoming ignited, then ran underneath the bedding in the second floor. Fortunately the whole of the valuable property in the lower part of the premises is unimpaired, and the business of the firm will not in the least be retarded. The loss is fully covered by insurances in the Sun and Guardian Fire-offices.

LAUNCH OF THE BRAGANZA STEAMER, AND THE KESTREL YACHT!

On Monday last West and East Cowes were the focus of unusual gaiety and attraction, occasioned by the sending aloft of two splendid vessels: the Braganza of Southampton, one of the large steamers belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company; and the R. Y. S. yawl, Kestrel, belonging to the Earl of Yarborough, Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron; both of which vessels having been, some months back, hauled up on adjacent slips, for the purpose of undergoing extensive alterations.

The ceremony drew hundreds of pleasure-seeking visitors from Southampton, Ryde, and Portsmouth, and the morning steamers brought over a number of passengers, who, from the fineness of the weather, had resolved on making a holiday. The shores of the Medina, on both sides of the river at "the Ferry," and every spot from whence a sight could be obtained, were crowded with spectators, and the river in the immediate vicinity covered with boats with fashions, amongst which we observed several belonging to the Royal Yacht Squadron.

Our engraving shows "the Launch," sketched from the opposite shore of the Medina, at the period when the Braganza was making her way along the inclined plane, returning to that element where she had previously distinguished herself; introducing also the extensive premises of the Messrs. White, shipbuilders, West Cowes; and the adjacent slip, belonging to Mr. Hansen, on which the Kestrel is observed, previous to being launched.

The Braganza has been lengthened 30 feet in midships, and her dimensions are now as follows:—

Length aloft, from the lower part of the main stem to the fore part of the sternpost	188 ft. 10 in.
Breadth amidships	24 ft. 10 in.
Depth of hold in midships	18 ft.
Engine-room in length	57 ft.
Total tonnage (as follows),	855,852-3500 tons.
The hull	794,657
Keel	66,395
Defunct engine-room	855,852-3500
Register tonnage	350,1925

She is now a splendid model, commanded by Captain James Down, her former commander, and we understand is to be employed between London and Constantinople.

Precisely at eleven o'clock this superb steamer was turned off, amid the cheers of thousands, and her gradual and steady progress towards the river was truly majestic. She was fully rigged, and dressed out in a gorgeous attire of flags and signals. On reaching the middle of the stream, the anchor was let go, and she was moored until the following day, when she was taken in tow by the Iberia steamer, and conveyed to Southampton, where she will receive her boilers.

At noon, the Kestrel was launched from the adjacent slip. This vessel was built by Mr. Joseph White, at East Cowes. She has undergone some alterations; her stern has been shortened, and a cut-water, with the figure of a kestrel, added, together with a standing bowsprit; and, although on the whole she is a fine vessel, we do not think that the alteration forward has added to her beauty. She now has the appearance of being one of "the olden time."

On Wednesday, at noon, the foundation-stone of the new Steam Frigate Dock, which is being constructed at this port, on the premises of Messrs. White, was laid by the senior of that firm, Mr. Thomas White, in the seventieth year of his age, unaccompanied by the pomp usual on similar occasions. It will be a dry dock, capable of taking in the largest steam-vessel afloat, without the necessity of unshipping the paddle-wheels. Already above two-thirds of the soil (a stiff loam) has been excavated, and the whole dock piled in; and, when viewed from the interior, the excavation resembles the hold of a great floating monster. It is expected the dock will be completed in November next. This additional accommodation in the port will greatly benefit the place, and its continuity to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Station at Southampton.

At the conclusion of the ceremony of laying the stone, the proprietor drank the following pithy toast:—"May the dock answer the purpose for which it was intended, and may it reward the honest endeavours of many generations;" which was responded to in a bumper, and with the long and loud cheers of the persons present. In a bottle beneath the stone were deposited various coins of the realm, and many little statistics relating to the port, and the causes which gave rise to the work.

THE TAYLOR INSTITUTE, OXFORD.

In our account of the Grand Commemoration at Oxford, we perceived an engraving of this handsome edifice. It has been erected from the bequests of Sir Robert Taylor, the architect, and of Dr. Randolph; the one for the study of modern languages, the other for a picture and statue gallery; and the funds have been appropriated by the authorities to a structure intended to serve both purposes. The portion allotted to the Taylor Institute, from the designs of Professor Cockfield, is shown in our illustration. The entire building occupies the angle of St. Giles' and Beaumont streets, the east front wing (the Taylor Institute) facing the former. The entire site is about 250 by 100 feet; but about 150 by 70 feet is given up to a raised terrace between the wings, and the entire building is set back to the depth last mentioned. Externally, this middle building has a tetrastyle Corinthian portico, carried up as high as the wings, and raising above the parts on each side of it, which last in height correspond with the order introduced into the wings, and here continued as ante-facings four in the columns on either side of the portico, with as many windows below, and niches above them. The most striking features in the wings are the large arched windows in the second tier, which, besides having a projecting balcony, are recessed, and are carried up quite through the entablature of the floor above. The raised court, or terrace between the wings, to which the ascent is by a wide flight of of steps facing the portico, is a pleasing novelty: the cornice and roof of the wings produce a fine effect.

The Taylor building will contain the Curator's residence, six lecture rooms, and a library, forty feet cube.

It is to be hoped that some portion of the entire building will be appropriated as a museum of specimens of sculpture and architectural decoration of the middle ages, which should be arranged chronologically. Oxford may be termed a sort of architectural museum in itself; but nowhere, except at the sister University, could a gallery of the kind suggested be more desirable, inasmuch as it would tend to promote a feeling for the beauties of our ancient architecture among those destined for the church, and likely to have influence in the preservation or restoration of our ancient ecclesiastical edifices.

Meanwhile, considerable interest has been excited, at Oxford by the University having in convocation rejected the new statute for the extinction of modern languages at the Institute, on account of the weak and inefficient scheme for its regulation. The capital is £50,000, and a magnificent foundation like this, will, it is hoped, be not frustrated by injudicious parsimony.

ASYLUM HARBOUR FOR PORTLAND ROADS.

The Harbour of Refuge Commissioners having just completed a careful survey of Weymouth Bay and Portland Roads, and having examined all those who offered themselves and were qualified to afford the necessary information, the Commissioners are fully impressed with the natural advantages presented to their notice for forming a Breakwater in Portland Roads, capable of affording shelter and protection to the shipping and maritime commerce of England, of being a counterpoise to Cherburgh (from which Portland is only distant sixty miles), and St. Malo, and situated about midway between Portsmouth and Plymouth. In their visit to Portland, the commissioners were forcibly struck with the economy that would be attendant on the erection of a Breakwater here—large quantities of stone, already quarried, and now only encumbering the land, and of no value, seeming to invite the undertaking, and the owners would, no doubt, be glad to see it removed. This stone (the roach) being in large pieces of from ten tons and under, is admirably adapted for the construction of a Breakwater; and we congratulate the town and neighbourhood upon the prospect of this great and important national undertaking being carried into effect.

We quote this statement from the Dorset Chronicle. It is now more than probable that the Breakwater proposed by the late Mr.

John Harvey, so far back as 1813, will be constructed. The work in its progress would be of vast advantage to the neighbourhood, since it would afford employment for five or six years to many thousands. Mr. Harvey's plan proposes that the Breakwater extend from the north-east point of the Isle of Portland, to a distance of about two miles and a quarter, which would secure a safe anchorage, and form a roadstead of four square miles in extent, situated only twenty-one leagues north of Cherburgh; and would prove the most complete shelter, during all winds, in the British Channel.

The excellent anchorage in Portland Roads, consisting for the most part of strong blue clay, with scarcely any tide, is too well known and appreciated by mariners, to require any comment; a fleet of sixty sail of the line would be in perfect safety during every vicissitude of winds and weather, and be enabled to go to and from sea at discretion. There are numerous springs of excellent water contiguous to the proposed Breakwater, sufficient for the use of the whole British Navy, if required.

THE PROPOSED BREAKWATER AT PORTLAND.

By extending the Breakwater 2½ miles, it would completely shelter Weymouth Pier, Harbour, and Bathing-place, when it blows hard from the south-east. The point of termination will then be on the remains of the wreck of the Abergavenny; and it is important that a vessel may, from that point, clear Portland with the wind at south-east, without making a tack; a position to be more readily gained by vessels working up to it under the lee or shelter of the Breakwater.

The stone for this great work may be obtained gratis, and there are in one mile of quarries no less than 20,000,000 tons of stone already prepared: this being the upper, or cap stone, which must necessarily be removed in order to obtain the finer stone suitable for building. The quarries are upwards of 300 feet above the sea level, so that by railways, or inclined planes, the stone might be conveyed to the water side without either engines or horses. The expense of the proposed Breakwater is estimated at £200,000.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLVI.

ST. GILES'S-IN-THE-FIELDS.

Many a reader may start at the adjunct of "in the fields," to the dedicatory name of this metropolitan church; and the surprise is natural enough when we recollect that the structure is situated on the south side of the High-street, St. Giles's, probably one of the narrowest roadways in this overgrown city. For the information of such persons, however, it may be as well to premise that the name of the church receives its addition from the circumstance of being formerly in the fields, and to distinguish it from the Church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate. This parish was anciently a village of the same name, and its church is supposed to owe its origin to the chapel which belonged to the hospital founded about 1117, by Queen Matilda, consort of Henry I., for the reception of leprosy patients belonging to the City of London and the county of Middlesex. In 1324, Edward III. granted this hospital to the Master and Brethren of the order of Barron, St. Lazarus, of Jerusalem, in Leicestershire, for certain considerations for which it became a cell to that order, till the general dissolution of religious houses by Henry VIII., who, in 1545, granted it to Lord Dudley. Soon after this period, the chapel or church was made parochial; and on the 29th of April, 1547, William Rawlinson was instituted rector.

CHURCH OF ST. GILES'S IN THE FIELDS.

The ancient church being very small, and much dilapidated, was taken down in 1623, and a church of brick was erected in its stead. This also became in its turn too small and inconvenient, when the inhabitants applied for an Act of Parliament to enable them to rebuild it; accordingly, the old fabric was taken down in 1730, and the present very handsome edifice was erected and completed in 1733; this being the third church built upon the site.

Mr. Elmes, in his Diligently compiled "Topographical Dictionary of London," attributes the design to Gibbs; but the following statement is more circumstantial—"It is curious that this edifice, which has given to Flaxman his reputation, should be ascribed, in the Report of the Church Commissioners to the House of Commons, to Haskins, who, they say, expended £665 7s. 9d. upon it; but there is no doubt but Walpole, and the View, published in 1733, are correct in ascribing it to Flaxman, who was, probably, employed by Gibbs, and not by the Commissioners."—Elmes's "London."

The church is built of Portland-stone, as are also the tower, and the tall and graceful spire, which are 160 feet high to the cross. The interior is 75 feet in length, exclusive of the recess for the altar, and 60 feet in width: it has a wagon-headed ceiling, and is divided into nave and aisles by fluted stone Ionic columns, which assist the main walls in carrying the roof. The effect of the entire composition is more than usually chaste and beautiful.

A new entrance-gateway, of considerable beauty, has, within these 40 years, been erected from the designs of William Leverton, Esq., in which is introduced an ancient piece of sculpture, of more curiosity than beauty, representing the last judgment. This work was taken from "The Resurrection Gate" of the old church, which had also many rich monuments, one of which, to Sir Roger I. Esturmer, the well-known lawyer and writer, still remains. Andrew Marvell was also buried here, "A man in whose reputation the glory of the patriot has eclipsed the fine powers of the poet." St. Giles's also preserves the ashes of Chapman, the translator of Homer; and Flaxman, the truly great sculptor, was buried here on December 15, 1826, his body accompanied to the grave by the President and Council of the Royal Academy. For once, an inscription speaks simple truth; we read here, "John Flaxman, R.A., P.S., whose mortal life was a constant preparation for a blessed immortality: his angelic spirit returned to the Divine Giver on the 7th of December, 1826, in the 72nd year of his age."

There is a peculiarly interesting circumstance connected with his death, told by Allan Cunningham, in his Lives of the British Sculptors, (Page 339), which we cannot resist the temptation of transcribing. He says "the wicker had set in, and, as he was never a very early mover, a stranger found him rising one morning when he called about nine o'clock. 'Sir,' said the visitor, presenting a book as he spoke, 'this work was sent to me by the author, an Italian artist, to present to you, and at the same time to apologise for its extraordinary dedication. In truth, sir, it was so generally believed throughout Italy that you were dead, that my friend determined to show the world how much he esteemed your genius, and having this book ready for publication, he has inscribed it 'Al Onbra di Flaxman.' No sooner was the book published than the story of your death was contradicted, and the author, affected by his mistake, which, nevertheless, he rejoices at, begs you will receive his work and his apology.' Flaxman smiled, and accepted the volume with unaffected modesty, and mentioned the circumstance, as curious, to his own family and some of his friends." This occurred on Saturday the 2nd of December, when he was well and cheerful; the next day he was taken suddenly ill with cold, and on the 7th was dead.

We perceive, with great satisfaction, that a subscription is in progress for a statue of Flaxman, but we are not aware of its destination.

In the churchyard, too, is the tomb of the Pennells, who aided in the escape of Charles II.; and, a few years since, was revised the custom of decorating this tomb on Restoration Day (May 29), with branches of oak, in commemoration of Pennell's loyalty and attachment to the "unhappy king."

In the tower is a clock, the dial of which are illuminated at night with gas; this being, if we remember rightly, the first improvement of the kind introduced into the metropolis.

The church is a rectory, in the County and Archdeaconry of Middlesex, in the diocese of London, and the patronage of the Lord Chancellor. The present rector is the Rev. J. E. Tyler, who was instituted in 1826. He is the author of a recent treatise on Oaths, and a life of Henry V., blending the research of the antiquary with the accomplishment of the scholar.

Although the church is very spacious, it is altogether inadequate to the spiritual wants of the parish; and the excellent Rector has been very instrumental in raising funds for the erection of another church, the first stone of which was laid a few weeks since. Of the superstructure, cleverly designed by Ferrey, we shall shortly present our readers with an engraving.

It was in front of the site of St. Giles's Church that Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, was so awfully burnt during the reign of Henry V., his early Pever. The phrase, "St. Giles's Road," will remind many of the custom that formerly prevailed here of giving every malefactor on his way to Tyburn a bowl of ale, as his last worldly draught. Thus is the site associated with the ferocity and coarse spirit of hygienic ages; and probably the most graceful relic are the trees in the churchyard, which carry the mind's eye back to "the fields." The illuminated clock and the wood pavement of the roadway, are unquestionably of our own time.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XXII., XXIII.

LORD DENMAN, CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

The name of Denman is one of the greatest of those that figure in the political and legal history of the present and past age. He was early on the stage of public life; he has continued on it long, and he has won the honour and respect of all parties throughout his career. In him the learning of the lawyer has not deadened freedom and independence of thought in the man; nor has the exalted station he has attained caused him to forget or hold in light esteem the rights and privileges of the people. This he has proved on many occasions, in his decisions from the judgment seat, which was never, we believe, filled by a man in whose uprightness and integrity there was a more universal and absolute confidence. But his exertions are not confined to the bench.

In his place in Parliament he is not an unfrequent speaker, and it is on account of the part he has taken in the debate in the Lords on the management of the Post-Office that we give him as one of our Parliamentary Portraits. His speech on that occasion was a severe denunciation of the system; and the censure he threw on Sir J. Graham, though couched in temperate language, was nevertheless strong.

Lord Denman is now sixty-five years of age; he seems to have borne with less injurious effect than might be expected the wearing of his judicial office. He was created a peer in 1834, having previously sat in the House of Commons as Sir Thomas and Mr. Denman. He was, with Lord Brougham, the advocate of the unfortunate Queen of George IV.; he filled the office of Solicitor-General to her Majesty. His exertions for his client were so well remembered, that, it is believed, they excluded him from the Bench during the life of George IV., but, on the accession of the Whigs to power, under William IV., he was made Attorney-General, and then Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench.

T. S. DUNCOMBE, ESQ., M.P.

Mr. T. Duncombe is well known as the Parliamentary advocate of popular rights and personal grievances. In bringing forward both of them, he has on many occasions met with more success than could have been anticipated for one who holds extreme political opinions, and who is not attached very closely to any one section of the house as a party man. He owes his success partly to personal qualities, such as earnestness and boldness of speech, but more to the ability with which he chooses his ground of attack, never bringing forward a case that is either untenable or badly supported by evidence, and more than all, perhaps, by the great knowledge he has of the forms of Parliament, and the skill and tact with which he uses it. He is almost the only member of whom it can be said that he has beaten Sir R. Peel on points of precedent and parliamentary practice. In the first session of the Peel Ministry, when its power was yet unshaken by internal divisions, he defeated it on a motion with respect to the right of petition on the Income-tax Bill. But his efforts have been rather exceeded by his late exertions in bringing forward the affair of the opening of letters by the Secretary of State. In this matter it must be admitted that he got hold of a famous grievance, one in which he enlisted on his side a great amount of public feeling, not by any means confined or limited by party or partisan spirit. He has carried the question through with his usual ability. From briefly refusing all explanation and inquiry, the Government have been brought to furnish something like the first, and to grant the latter by the means of a committee; it is a secret one, indeed, but it is still a concession. Mr. Duncombe has great personal advantages; his features are handsome, his voice good, his bearing bold, manly and unaffected, and (what is not altogether without its effect) his style of dress is unexceptionable. The frank bonhomie of his manner when addressing the House, combined with the power of giving hard hits, of the effect of which there is no mistake, make the honourable member for Finsbury a favourite on his side of the House, while he is not disliked by the other. Having before given a sketch of the honourable member—(See the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, for July 30, 1843)—we do not think it necessary to add more than the following details:—Thomas Duncombe is the eldest son of Thomas Duncombe, Esq., of Grove, near Boroughbridge. His father is brother of the first Lord Feversham. He sat for the borough of Hertford for several Parliaments previous to 1832, in which year he was unseated by Lord Mahon and Ingestre, under the influence of the Marquis of Salisbury. Their election was afterwards declared void. He has represented the Metropolitan borough of Finsbury since 1834; at the present moment he may be called the most popular of the Metropolitan members.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—THE YELLOW DRAWING-ROOM.

Waagen, the acute German critic, said of Buckingham Palace, "it looks as if some wicked magician had suddenly transformed some capricious stage scenery into solid reality." Thus far of the exterior. Mrs. Jameson, speaking of the interior, says: "George the Fourth had a predilection for low ceilings, so all the future inhabitants of the Palace must endure suffocation; and, as his Majesty did not live on good terms with his wife, no accommodation was prepared for a future Queen of England."

The superb saloon represented in our engraving, will, we think, gain the last quoted opinion. It shows "the Yellow Drawing-room," the most superb of the entire range of rooms that occupy the western or garden front of the first story, and the northernmost in the suite. Its height is 32 feet, and its form nearly square: it has a lofty cove, richly gilt, and ornamented with heraldic shields. In the frieze is a series of sculpture, in relief, by Pits, descriptive of the origin and progress of Pleasure, namely, Love Awakening the Soul to Pleasure—the Soul in the Bower of Fancy—the Pleasure of Decoration—the Invention of Music—the Pleasure of Music—the Dance—the Masquerade—the Drama—the contest for the Palm—the Palm resigned—the Struggle for the Laurel—the Laurel obtained. There is so much classic beauty in these designs, that we regret to see the continuation broken by the introduction of medallion portraits, even though they be of royal and illustrious personages.

But the main beauty of the apartment lies in the harmony of colour adopted for its draperies, &c.; namely, a series of shades of yellow, ranging almost from brown to green. Thus, the walls are hung with figured yellow silk, and the window draperies are of similar costly material; as are the sofas, chairs, seats, &c. The effect is truly elegant; and we remember the like success in the principal drawing-room of the Reform Club House in Pall-Mall.

The floor of the Yellow Drawing-room in the Palace is bordered with satin and holly wood, inlaid with devices of rose and tulip wood, which ingenuity it were pity to hide even with the choicest productions of the loom.

Upon the walls are portraits of royal personages; and at each end, and above the chimney-piece, are placed superb mirrors. The chimney-piece is of exquisitely white marble, sculptured by Westmacott. The furniture of the room is truly sumptuous; and the assemblage of vases filled with flowers, clocks, bronzes, inlaid tables, cabinets, &c., in exquisite taste. To quote a contemporary, "All that luxury can desire, or skill and wealth accomplish, to make this apartment magnificent, in the ordinary modes of obtaining magnificence, is to be found here in an extraordinary degree."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1844.

THE Post-office business has raised a greater storm than the Home Secretary at all anticipated. The first surprise of the public has changed to a deeper feeling, and from one end of the country to the other so unanimous have all parties been in denouncing the practice, that even Sir James Graham has, to some extent, yielded to the force of public opinion. The narrow majority of 44, and the part taken by the members of the late Government, have also told on the Ministry; and the explanation that was at first refused, and that somewhat cavalierly, is conceded now in the shape of a Secret Committee of the House of Commons, that is to inquire both into the law of the matter, and the practice.

There is evidently a good deal at stake on the question. Sir James Graham confesses that he cannot stand up under the load of obloquy that now rests upon him; he must remove some of it, or he must sink under it; and that he may throw some share of it from his own shoulders to those of his predecessors, of all parties, is his object in granting the inquiry. He says, or implies, that whatever he has done has been done by others; he uses the old and everlasting defence of political men and political parties in England—the tu quoque. It is an effective defence as far as the recriminating parties are concerned, but it is no answer to the complaints of the third and greater party that stands between the two, and suffers occasionally from both. The people are just as averse to having their letters opened by a Lord J. Russell or a Marquis of Normanby as by a Sir J. Graham. Politics ought to be kept out of consideration with respect to an act that is a violation of the principles of common morality, which is a breach of the law of the land and a suspension of the Constitution of the kingdom, by the command of power under the shield of official impunity. Sir J. Graham seems to think that the conduct of the Opposition has fixed a sort of personal stigma upon him in the affair. It cannot be denied that the Whigs have small cause for forbearance when their old associate, changed into their bitterest opponent, lays himself open to attack. But we do not believe that Lord J. Russell would have ventured to denounce in another the very identical practices he had, in the same office, authorised himself. Dwelling in a glass-house he would scarcely have been so imprudent as to throw stones, knowing pretty well that he must bring his own fabric about his ears. We may take it for granted that former Home Secretaries have ordered the detention and opening of letters; but we may take it for granted also, that it was done for the advantage of our own State, not at the mere instigation of Foreign Powers. Had explanation been asked of them, it would, moreover, have been given, at least as to the principle on which they proceeded, as in the case of the celebrated Sir R. Walpole, when questioned on the same subject. The great mistake of Sir J. Graham was so obstinately refusing any information at first, only to be driven afterwards into conceding much more than was asked. He refused to give the slightest explanation of the principle he had adopted; Parliament murmurs, the press exposes, and the people become indignant, and on the third discussion Government is compelled to concede an inquiry not only into the facts of the case, but the law, which it is not improbable will undergo considerable modification.

On this occasion, as on the former discussions, the weight of argument and the tendency of the debate are directly against the Home Secretary and the Post-office. The bulk of the Ministerial party have thought it quite an official question, to be fought out between the holders of office and Mr. Duncombe. Most of them gave their votes to the Government, but did not feel called on to give their advocacy; that is, not in the political bond. To give their votes is their duty, but to speak is more a matter of feeling and conviction; the votes were given, though not without many exceptions, but the advocacy was withheld, except by Lord Brougham among the Peers, and his double, or shadow, Mr. Roebuck, in the Commons. The manner in which the latter gentleman defended the Government was rather curious. He always does things in a two-handed manner; if he interpose between two contending parties, it is generally to say something bitter of both; neither of them is quite in the right, nor wholly in the wrong. Thus nothing can be stronger than his condemnation of the practice which all parties denounce.

He was sure that when the people of England understood what was the nature of the power exercised under the Post-office Act, and likewise when the proceedings which had taken place at the Post-office were laid bare, that moment was its destruction sealed. Such a power was not necessary toward the safety of the country, or even, he would say, of the world. It was only used to gratify base and malignant passions, or to serve the most dangerous purposes, nor could it be of any use whatever to a Government resting on the affections of the people.

Now to ordinary minds it would seem that a power "not necessary to the safety of the country," and which was "only used to gratify base and malignant passions," could not be too strongly denounced by all right thinking men. But here is Mr. Roebuck's wrath poured on the denouncers of the abuse, and his sympathy, shed like balm, on the official functionary who committed it.

He begged to assure the right hon. baronet that he sympathized most sincerely in the feelings which he had expressed as to the manner in which he had been dealt with in this matter. Public indignation had been called down upon a public officer, whose only offence was that of following, exactly in the footsteps of his predecessors in office; and that sense of indignation had been created out of doors by all the vile arts of the daily press, which he did not hesitate to designate as the foul instrument by which all manner of villainies had been poured upon the right hon. baronet's head. He would not hurt or one more than another of these detestable and despicable channels of private information by naming it.

We learn through these same "detestable and despicable channels"—it being among the "vile arts of the daily press" to make known such matters—that these remarks were received with "loud laughter;" so we should imagine; and that laughter must have been caused by some feeling not far removed from contempt. In the affairs of life there is no separating the act from him who does it; the doer must be responsible for the deed. We have it on the best and highest of all authorities that offences must needs come; but it is added, also, "Wee unto them by whom they come." By this mode of dividing the system from the men who carry it out, the most atrocious crimes against society might be justified, if any one in office were only allowed to plead the practices of his predecessors as a defence of his own. Men have not allowed the judicial cruelties of former ages to grow into precedents, neither will they allow official espionage in the present to become one. It is the duty of every age to improve on the past, and leave society better than they found it, or, at all events, not to leave it worse; and in this matter we seemed retrograding. But the discussions, the vote, the granting of the committee, have, we hope, given the system a check.

We regret to see, by a letter in the Times, that much wanton damage has been done to the statues and columns of the ruins in Windsor-park; some have been thrown down and others mutilated. It is such conduct as this that compels the exclusion of the public from many places to which they would otherwise be freely admitted. It is lamentable, too, that a very few individuals are sufficient, by their misconduct, to bring a reproach on all. They are exceptions to the general rule, but unfortunately these exceptions oblige precautions to be taken that look a mistrust of all.

Tax public occasionally hear strange things, but very few were prepared for one portion of the foreign intelligence of the week, which states the poverty of Louis Philippe! It has been generally believed that he was one of the most wealthy monarchs of Europe, having, in addition to the Civil List, the family property of the Orleans branch of the Bourbons, while the wealth of the Prince de Condé is inherited by the Duc d'Aumale. The statement of the insufficiency of the fortune of the King is said to be put forth in order to prepare the way for procuring a "dotation" from the State for some of his children yet unprovided for. The Opposition papers are in a blaze on the subject, and there seems much probability of the plea being not very favourably received by the French people.

THE REVENUE.

The Quarter's Revenue has been made up till yesterday, and presents a favourable aspect. In the important department of Excise, there is an increase on the quarter of about £40,000, and on the year of nearly £400,000. In the Customs there is an increase of £200,000; the Stamp and Tax department is nearly the same as in the corresponding quarter of last year. There is a small increase in the Post-office returns, but there is a slight deficiency on the quarter as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, under the head of Miscellaneous Taxes, in consequence of the remittance of silver from China coming into the account of last year, and the remittances recently received in this country not coming into the revenue account until next quarter.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace, in an open carriage and four, at twenty minutes past three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, escorted by a party of lanciers, for Claremont. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were in the next carriage.

Sunday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite, and the household, attended divine service at Claremont. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. In the evening her Majesty and the Prince took an airing in an open pony phaeton.

Monday.—In the morning her Majesty and Prince Albert walked on the lawn in front of Claremont, and also promenade in the gardens. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Bouverie, afterwards rode out on horseback. The Prince returned to Claremont at two o'clock. In the afternoon the Marchioness of Dairu left Claremont for a drive in an open carriage. The Royal Family were taken their accustomed daily airing in Claremont Park. Sir Robert and Lady Gascoigne had the honour of joining the Royal dinner-party.

Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, arrived at Buckingham Palace, at twenty minutes before twelve o'clock, in a carriage and four, escorted by a party of lanciers, from Claremont. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were in the next carriage; and the Marchioness of Dairu (Lady in Waiting, Colonel Arbuthnot (Equerry in Waiting), and Major-General Sir Edward Bouverie, Equerry to Prince Albert), occupied another carriage and four. His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided in the afternoon at a meeting of the Committee for Promoting and Encouraging the Fine Arts in the Refectory of the Palace of Westminster. The Commissioners present were Viscount Palmerston, Lord Ashburton, Mr. Henry Gally Knight, Mr. Benjamin Hawes, Mr. George Viner, Mr. Thomas Wray, Lord Malmesbury, and the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay. The Prince arrived at twenty House shortly before three o'clock. The meeting closed up at six o'clock. The Viscountess Jersey has succeeded the Marchioness of Dairu as the Lady in Waiting on the Queen; the Earl of Norton and Captain the Hon. Alexander Nelson Hood have succeeded the Earl of Warwick and Captain Meynell as the Lord and Groom in Waiting to her Majesty. Colonel Buckley has relieved Colonel Arbuthnot in the duties of Equerry in Waiting to the Queen; and Colonel Bouverie has relieved Major-General Sir Edward Bouverie as Equerry in Waiting to Prince Albert.

Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Royal Gardens of Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert did Sir George Hayter the honour to inspect his picture in progress, representing the christening of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The Queen had a dinner party at Buckingham Palace. The company consisted of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marquis of Granby, the Earl of Liverpool, the Countess of Westmoreland, the Earl and Countess of Beverley, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lady Georgiana Bouverie, Harcourt, Ansell, Sir Martin Archer Shee, and Baron Kesselberg. The band of the Grenadier Guards attended at the Palace during dinner, and performed several pieces. The band was conducted by Mr. Crovan. Her Majesty afterwards gave a concert, which was performed in the grand saloon. The picture gallery, green drawing-room, and other state apartments were opened for the reception of the visitors.

Thursday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the gardens of Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting, and visited the Surrey Zoological Gardens for the purpose of inspecting the Victoria Medal of London in the Olden House, with which his Royal Highness was pleased to express himself very much gratified. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert took an airing in an open carriage and four. The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace included the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Marquis of Granby, Lord and Lady Ernest Bruce, Lord Forster, and General the Hon. Sir William Lumley.

The Duchess of Kent.—Her Royal Highness will return to this country on Monday next, on the morning of which day she will embark at Ostend on board the Princess Alice, Dover mail packet, Master Commander L. Smith, with a sister to Ostend on the 7th to be in readiness. The Princess Alice will land her Royal Highness at Wexford.

The Queen Dowager.—Her Majesty Queen Adelaide is expected to return to this country, from visiting her illustrious relatives at Meiningen and Weimar, about the 20th of the ensuing month. It is a gratification to be enabled to state that the last letters from Germany assert the complete health of her Majesty.

Married, on Wednesday, at St. George's, Hanover-square, by the Rev. Lord Wrottesley Russell, Lord Alexander George Russell, youngest son of the late Duke of Bedford, to Anne Emily, youngest daughter of the late Sir Leonard Worsley Holmes, Bart., of Wexford, Isle of Wight, in the presence of a numerous circle of relatives and friends. After the ceremony, the happy couple proceeded to Woburn Abbey, the seat of his Grace the Duke of Bedford.

A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday at the Foreign Office. The Ministers present were Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Warrington, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Earl of Harcourt, the Earl of Ripon, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Sir Edward Kitchin, and Lord Granville Somerset. The Council sat an hour.

It is now definitely arranged that her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the royal infants, and the court, will leave Buckingham Palace for the season, on Wednesday next.

The King of Saxony.—On Sunday evening last, the King of Saxony, attended by the Baron Gersdorff and suite, in two open travelling carriages and four, arrived at the Royal Hotel, Weymouth. On Monday morning early, his Majesty took a walk on the beautiful esplanade; and again, after breakfast, his Majesty, previous to leaving, walked as far as the marine villas on Greenhill, when his carriages, which had been ordered to wait at the end of Brunswick-buildings, being ready, his Majesty and suite took their departure on his western tour, intending, as it was understood, to visit Lyme Regis, for the purpose of geological investigation, to which interesting science his Majesty is said to be much devoted; and a fine field for the exercise of a scientific taste does not present itself in the United Kingdom than the cliffs and surrounding Lyme Regis. On Tuesday the King arrived at Elliot's Royal Hotel, Bournemouth, from Torquay. Quite unexpectedly, on Wednesday, his Majesty, in a private dress, with one or two attendants, came into the dockyard in Admiral Sir David Milne's carriage. The gallant Port Admiral, and Major-General Hon. H. Murray and Captain Murray, his son and aide-de-camp, met his Majesty at the establishment, and proceeded with him round the yard. After this the King proceeded to the residence of the Admiral Superintendent, Sir S. Pym, K.C.B., where he cordially returned thanks for the kind attention shown to his Majesty by the officers of the departments of the dockyard—Captain Burgess, Mr. Lumsdale, the Master Attendant Mr. Edye, the Master Shipwright Mr. Jessop, the Storekeeper, &c. His Majesty and suite, on leaving the dockyard, went, with the Port Admiral, Sir D. Milne, to his official residence, where the royal party landed.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DEPUTATION OF RAILWAY DIRECTORS TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.—On Monday a deputation of directors from most of the railways waited upon Sir Robert Peel, for the purpose of laying before the right honourable baronet their views on the subject of the ministerial measures respecting the railways of the kingdom. The right honourable baronet received the deputation with great courtesy, and listened with attention to their case, which was laid before him at considerable length. A long conference ensued, in which the directors enlarged on the objectionable character of the whole measure, both in its principle and details, and concluded by expressing a hope that, at the present late period of the session, the bill would be postponed. Sir Robert Peel declined acceding to the request of the deputation for a postponement until next session.

THE NEW DUTIES BILL.—We have authority to state that a Bureau Council has been appointed for Manila, and that he will proceed to his destination by the July mail; and also that arrangements have been made, which will take effect immediately after the arrival of that mail in the East, under which there will be, in the three ports of Java to which foreign vessels have access—namely, Batavia, Samarang, and Sourabaya—persons duly authorized to certify the origin of Java sugar in the manner required by the Sugar Duties Bill now before the House of Lords.

SALE OF THE LIBRARY OF THE LATE DUKE OF SUMMER.—On Monday, at one o'clock, the sale of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Summer's library commenced in the auction-rooms of Messrs. Evans and Sons, 55, Pall-mall. The attendance was very limited, and the prices the books fetched were remarkably low. Before the sale commenced a rather strange scene took place between Mr. Evans, sen., and the well-known Captain Ackley, who, it appeared, caused to be inserted in one of the Sunday papers an advertisement to the effect that the sale would not take place, as some of the books were the property of the public, and had been stolen from the palace. On Mr. Evans coming into the auction-room he asked the Captain if he was the author of the advertisement. The latter did not answer. Mr. Evans commenced the business by stating the title of the first lot; upon which, Captain Ackley rose and handed him a paper, saying, "That is my protest, sir. I protest against the sale proceeding."—Mr. Evans: Don't interrupt the business, sir.—Captain Ackley: I have only done my duty, sir, in protesting.—Mr. Evans: You are a meddler; and if you don't behave yourself I shall send you a constable.—Several voices cried "Turn him out!"—The Captain (addressing the persons present): Mind, I caution you; any persons purchasing these books render themselves liable to an action (laughter, during which the Captain retired). The number of lots disposed of during the day was 397; the majority consisting of Bibles and portions of Scripture in Hebrew; and the proceeds of the day amounted to £275 5s. It was stated that the Hebrew books disposed of were to be sent to Jerusalem.

LIVERPOOL VICTUALLERS' ANNUAL.—On Tuesday, the half-yearly court of this corporation was held at the Bridge-house Hotel, the Governor in the chair. Mr. Jones, secretary and solicitor to the corporation, read the report of the committee for the past six months, from which it appeared that the domestic and financial affairs of the asylum were in a prosperous state, and that the inmates of the 101 houses attached to the asylum were enjoying all the comforts that age or infirmity in adversity could desire.

LIVERPOOL VICTUALLERS' SCHOOL.—The annual dinner of the friends and subscribers to the benevolent institution took place on Wednesday, in the theatre of the White Conduit House Tavern. About 1200 persons sat down at table. Mr. Wigram (of the firm of Reid and Co.) was in the chair. The chairman, in a brief and eloquent address, adverted to the great good that had been done by the establishment of the school, and impressed upon the company that they were bound, both by interest and duty, to afford it every assistance in their power. Numerous toasts were proposed, and the party broke up at an early hour. A very large amount of subscriptions was collected during the evening.

THE WELLINGTON SPATER IN THE CITY.—A meeting of the committee was held on Tuesday, at which Sir Peter Laurie protested that his sole reason for intruding himself into the Mansion-house on the day of dining the statue was his wish to be the first to present to the King of Hanover, that the event might be recorded in the annals of the corporation.

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY, REGENT'S PARK.—This Society's third and last exhibition of plants and flowers for the season took place on Tuesday. The weather, though sufficiently cloudy to guard from excessive heat of the sun, so cleared up after the stormy gusts of rain, and had as to enhance the pleasure of the promenade, and afforded to the company as they ranged over the grounds an agreeable surprise that the effects of the storm should have been so quickly obliterated. It is but just to state, as we have before had occasion to do, that the arrangements for viewing the plants were admirable, the tents spacious, commodious, and well-ventilated. The bands of the three cavalry regiments—the Horse Guards Band, the First Life Guards, and the Second Life Guards, met upon the occasion, and played choice selections of music.

THE CONVICT BARBER AND FLETCHER.—The following document has been published as coming from Fletcher. Barber and he are both on board the convict ship Agincourt, lying off Woolwich, and will sail on Tuesday next for their destination. The witness, whose name is appended to the paper, is said to be an officer of the convict vessel:—"25th June, 1844.—I solemnly declare that, to the best of my knowledge and belief, William Henry Barber had no guilty knowledge that the will of Anne Black was a forgery, or that it was otherwise than a legitimate and proper matter of business; as such it was introduced by me to him, as stated in my first examination at the Mansion-house. And I further declare that, to my knowledge and belief, he had no guilty knowledge of either of the cases which have recently formed the subject of indictment. I make this declaration with no other motive than to do an act of justice to Mr. Barber as far as lies in my power.—JOSUAH FLETCHER.—Witness, Matthew Henry Cutler."

COUNTRY NEWS.

BOLTON.—DREADFUL ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE.—We regret to state that a dreadful accident occurred at the linen factory of Mr. Alderman Brooks, at Bolton, on Monday, attended with a considerable loss of life. It appears that the factory, which was built about twelve years since, close to the river Cole, and adjacent to St. George's Church, in that town, was at full work, when the boiler of one of the engines suddenly burst, and hurled the whole of the work, consisting of males and females, to the ruins. The force of the explosion is said to have been tremendous, and to have torn away the roof, and the principal portion of the floors and walls. The authorities were speedily upon the spot, as also were some thousands of the inhabitants; and as soon as the extent of the catastrophe had been ascertained, workmen were employed in clearing away the ruins, with the view of disintering the dead, and ministering to the necessities of the wounded. It was impossible, in the hurry and confusion of the moment, to ascertain how many were employed in the factory at the time. Some said 30 and others 40; but from the fact that a wounded person was not discoverable in any part of the ruins, it was feared that the whole of the unfortunate inmates must have met their death simultaneously. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the building, from the fact that it covered nearly two acres of ground, including, of course, the yards and out-offices. It contained two engines, one at each end of the works; one of 30, and the other of 60 horse power; and it was, as we have said, the bursting of the boiler attached to one of those engines that caused the dreadful explosion in question. The extent of the injury by the explosion of the steam-boiler at the iron-mill of Mr. John Brooks, is now ascertained. Three persons have perished by the calamity. Bridget Hart, who was the first person discovered amongst the ruins, died at her house in Newport-street, this morning, leaving a husband and three children. She was returning from the yard to the mill, when the explosion took place, and thus met her melancholy end. James Smith, an elderly man, was found dead. He was left a wife and four children. He was employed in a drying-room over the boiler-house, and must have been thrown into the air with the materials of the building. James McDonald, of Dale-street, was also employed in the drying-room, and met the same fate as his companion Smith. He was a young man and has left a wife in a state of pregnancy. He had only gone to work at the mill that morning with his brother William, who was also much mutilated, but is expected to recover. James Rigg, the mechanic, George Brinsford, the fireman, and the others who were injured, are also considered out of danger. This morning workmen commenced taking down the chimney and the end of the mill over the engine house. There were nearly six hundred hands employed in the establishment, who are thus thrown out of employment, but, we are happy to say, that three hundred or four hundred of them are expected to be at work again in about a fortnight, there being two other engines at the other end of the mill, which will keep a considerable portion of the machinery going. An inquest will be held on the bodies of the deceased, when some light will, most probably, be thrown upon the cause of this calamitous accident.

CRANFORD.—A public meeting of the shareholders and supporters of the Agricultural College was held at Cranford on Monday, to receive the report of the committee of management. Karl Rathert occupied the chair. The attendance was numerous and influential. Dr. Daubney, of Oxford, was amongst the number. The report was satisfactory. It is intended to hold a public meeting at Southampton in aid of the scheme, on the occasion of the great annual meeting of the Agricultural Society of England taking place in that town. A farm of about four hundred acres, nearly a mile from Cranford, on the road to Stroud, called Port Farm, belonging to Karl Rathert, is to be the experimental farm for the intended college.

GUILDFORD, SURREY, SESSIONS.—The General Quarter Sessions for the county of Surrey commenced at Guildford, on Tuesday last, before G. T. Nicholson, Esq., Chairman, and a numerous attendance of magistrates. The governors of the several gaols reported their establishments to be in a healthy condition. Mr. Smallpiece, the county treasurer, made a report of the state of the county finances, from which it appeared that the amount of the last county rate, at two-pence in the pound, with other items, had produced the sum of £19,771 7s. 6d., of which there had been expended, on account of the county, £10,562 1s. 7d., leaving a balance of £9,209 5s. 11d. There were, it appeared, however, outstanding accounts now due, amounting to £12 4s. 4d., which would leave the treasurer deficient to the amount of £1341 4s. 8d. The excess of expenditure was accounted for by the heavy payments made on account of the Lunatic Asylum, and other causes not of a permanent character. The visiting justices reported that the sum of £500 voted by the Court to erect baths and make other improvements in the Prison House of Correction, in compliance with the new regulations of the Secretary of State, was insufficient, and they requested the Court to sanction the expenditure of a further sum of £47, which would be required before the alterations can be carried out. After some conversation the question was put and negatived by a considerable majority.—Mr. Jeffrey then moved, pursuant to notice from the last session, that in future the clerk of the court be not allowed to demand a fee of 10s. 6d. from prisoners acquitted upon charges of misdemeanour.—Some discussion took place, and the magistrates appeared to be unanimously of opinion that the practice ought to be abolished. Eventually the subject was referred to a committee, with a view to effect the proposed object. It was stated in court that the fee of 10s. 6d. was thus appropriated—six shillings to the jury, half a crown to the clerk, and two shillings to the summoning officer. The Court, after disposing of the routine business, adjourned.

GALLANT CONDUCT OF A BOY.—On the 17th ult. a little boy, named Birch, while playing at Sootle, near Liverpool, fell into the water, when his brother, seven and a-half years old, plunged in, and rescued him.

ROCHESTER.—On Monday a singular case came on for trial before James Knapp, Esq., the Recorder of the Rochester Court of Quarter Sessions. At the last quarter sessions John W. Powell, who was formerly a gentleman of large property, residing at Canterbury, was indicted for stealing three silver tea-spoons, and one table spoon, from his furnished lodgings at Rochester. The case was fully proved against him. It appeared that he took apartments at the house of Mr. Anderson, at Rochester, on the 25th of February, for three weeks, and, after paying three for one week, decamped, having pawned the tea-spoons and sold the table-spoon. The witnesses for the prosecution all of them deposed to various "silly" facts on the part of the prisoner. The defence set up was insanity, and disclosed a singular and melancholy history. The prisoner came, at the age of twenty-two, into the possession of large property, and was shortly after chosen one of the commissioners for the county, which he soon resigned. He had been twice, before he came of age, partially insane. In the year 1827, he received a serious injury in the head by a fall from his horse, and shortly after he became completely idiotic, and so remained for two and a-half years. In the years 1830-35 and 43 it was found necessary to place him under restraint, and the last time he made his escape. The medical witnesses deposed that they had known the prisoner for a long time, and considered him generally insane, with short lucid intervals. Some extraordinary scenes took place during the trial, which occupied about five hours. The prisoner became greatly excited, quarrelling with his counsel, cross-examining the witnesses, and directing the Learned Recorder. His conduct in the dock of itself could leave no doubt of his unfortunate state of mind. The Jury did not think it necessary to trouble the Recorder to sum up, and returned a verdict of "Not Guilty," on the ground of insanity. This is the same gentleman who, in March last, was brought up before the Lord Mayor for contracting a bill without the means of paying at the Guildhall Coffee-house, where he was personating Mr. Whitbread, the Irish baronet.

THE WORCESTER TRAGEDY.—DEATH OF THE MURDERER.—To our former report of the horrible tragedy at Worcester last week, we have now to add the final catastrophe. On Friday James Hooper was considered much better, and the surgeons in attendance closed the horrible wounds in his throat. Next morning, however, he was considerably worse, and unfavourable symptoms supervened in the course of the day, until the evening, when he died. He continued rational during Friday, but at one time got out of bed and approached the window of his room. He was, however, at once stopped by the police officer, and placed in bed. During the day he expressed an earnest desire to know the result of the coroner's inquest, but this was most properly concealed from him until he should be in a fit state to receive the intelligence. On the day of his death the prisoner betrayed slight aberration of intellect. The deceased prisoner formerly kept a general provision shop at Abberley, about eleven miles from Worcester, on the Ludlow road, and is respectably connected. About twelve months ago he removed to Worcester, and was living at his brother's house when the murder was committed. There does not appear to have been the slightest ill-will subsisting between him and his brother's family; and as to the allegation of the prisoner's insanity, we may say that, although it is positively affirmed that he has betrayed symptoms of mental aberration after indulgence in intoxicating liquors, nothing of the kind was apparent a few hours before the commission of the horrid deed which has hurried two mortals unprepared into the other world. The remains of the poor child were buried on Friday afternoon, in the presence of a large concourse of spectators.

IRELAND.

Lord Heytesbury succeeds Earl de Grey as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He is expected in Dublin on the 15th inst. The following appointments have been announced:—Mr. O'Connell, at present of the Chief Secretary's Office, Dublin Castle, to be Private Secretary to Lord Heytesbury; Capt. Rowley, brother to the gallant admiral lately on the Irish station, to be Comptroller of the Household, vice Major Parker of the 1st Life Guards; Capt. Willis, Gentleman Usher (and-in-law of Sir William Gossett), succeeds to the Mastership of the Horse, vice Capt. Williams, formerly of the 7th Hussars; Lords Francis Gordon, Charles Ker, and Sir William Den, will be retained as Aides de Camp. It is generally understood that the foregoing are the only changes contemplated in the household.

The weekly meeting of the Repeal Association, which was held, as usual, on Monday, in the Cornhill Hall, presented an equally crowded appearance as on any of the previous Mondays since the incarceration of Mr. O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs. Valentine Maher, Esq., M.P. for Tipperary, was called to the chair. The Repeal rent for the week amounted to upwards of £2,000.

It is stated on the authority of the Limerick Chronicle that Sir Richard de Burgh, Bart., of Carletonville, abjured the Church of Rome, and embraced the Protestant faith, at Castle Town, county Cork, on Sunday 26th inst.

The corporation of Dublin have chosen Mr. Arabin (a liberal Protestant) to fill the office of Lord Mayor during the coming year. It was proposed to re-elect Mr. O'Connell, but the honorable and learned gentleman declined the honour.

JOURNALS TO IRELAND.—We observe with pleasure that a meeting of Irish peers and gentlemen is announced to take place this day, at one o'clock, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, "for the purpose of forming a society, the aim of which will be the promotion of social and intellectual intercourse amongst Irishmen, resident in or visiting London, irrespective of religious or political differences." This is a "union" which even the great Repealer himself would shrink from disavowing, and we heartily wish success to the brotherly project. The Marquis of Clanricarde is named for the chair. We are given to understand that he will be ably supported on the occasion by leading Irishmen, and noblemen and gentlemen closely connected with Ireland, belonging to all the parties, and creeds, and professions into which Irish society is divided. The association proposed to be formed will bear some similarity to the Scotch and Welsh Societies now existing in London. Personal communication—social intercourse—an interchange of sentiment—co-operation on the broad ground of Ireland's welfare—are among the objects to be advanced; but the main feature will be benevolence—a watchful care over the interests of the Irish in England. It is here that the meritorious stranger may look for friends without disappointment; it is here that the honest sufferer may come with a certainty of finding generously sympathy and prompt relief. The advantages of such a society are so obvious and so numerous that our wonder is that the first step had not been taken years ago.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CONFIRMATIONS.—On Tuesday morning the Lord Bishop of Lincoln commenced a course of confirmations for that part of his diocese situate in Rutlandshire. His Lordship attended at Lanchry, and admitted upwards of 200 young persons to the sacred ordinance. An appropriate charge was delivered. On Wednesday his lordship held confirmations at Burghon and Beaulieu, and on Tuesday at Marlow and Wycombe. The following are his lordship's subsequent engagements:—Friday 5th, Aylesbury; 6th, Wendover and Princes Risborough; 8th, Colindale and West Wycombe; 10th, Aylesbury; 11th, Stow and Marlow; 12th, Buckingham; 13th, Stony Stratford and Penny Stoney; 15th, Newport Pagnell and Olney.

The Bishop of Landaff intends holding a course of confirmations throughout his diocese, in the autumn.

YORK MINSTER.—This beautiful ecclesiastical edifice has been closed for some time, and has undergone a complete restoration. It will be reopened for divine service next Sunday.

OXFORD.—On Sunday the following gentlemen were elected Probationary Fellows of Wadham College:—Rev. John G. Sheppard, M.A., Henry King, B.A., Rev. Richard Congreve, M.A., scholars of that society. At the same time John Richard Capner, Baccalaureate of Merton College, Francis Morgan Nichols, and Henry Wrenn Blundell, Bachelors of Wadham College, were elected scholars. John Fichter Mackerness, Postmaster of Merton College, was elected Fellow of Exeter College.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(At Guildhall, before Lord Denman and a Special Jury.)

THE QUEEN V. ASHBURTON AND OTHERS.

This was an indictment against Lord Ashburton and Messrs. Baring Brothers, for a conspiracy to defraud a gentleman of the name of Kinder, with respect to an estate in Mexico, purchased jointly by Mr. Kinder and them. The merits which the defendants were charged with employing to effect that purpose, was bribing Members of the Mexican Congress to secure the passing of the law preventing foreigners from holding landed property in Mexico. Mr. Kinder and other learned gentlemen were for the prosecution; and Mr. Kelly, Mr. Clarkson, &c., were for the defendants. The case occupied the entire of Monday and Tuesday, and the evidence consisted chiefly of an immense mass of correspondence between the house of Baring and their agents in Mexico.—Mr. Kinder, in addressing the Jury for the prosecution, contended that it was evident that Lord Ashburton had considered the purchase of the estate in question, which had been effected by one of his agents in Mexico, to be a bad bargain, and that he had endeavoured to get rid of his agent's purchase as he best could, even at the expense of the considerable advances which had been made upon the estate, and there could be no question that bribery had been practised towards the Congress to secure the passing of the law.—Mr. Kelly, for the defendants, did not deny the bribery, but contended that it was exclusively the act of the defendant's agent in Mexico, and that the only error committed by them was that when the fact of the bribery of the Mexican legislators was made known, they did not denounce their agent and make him lose the bribery money himself. Bribery was not in Mexico what it was considered in England; and the agent, who had acted entirely upon his own suggestions, had erred from excess of zeal, and the Lords, having had only been unwilling to allow him to suffer a loss. It was idle to talk of the defendants wishing to injure the prosecutor, who had been at one time indebted to a large amount to the defendants, and who might have been crushed by them by other means. It was an ungrateful prosecution brought against indulgent and forbearing creditors.—The Lord Chief Justice having summed up in his usual lucid and impartial manner, the Jury consulted for an hour and twenty minutes, after which they returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

THE ORIENTAL AND PENINSULAR STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY

V. HERAPATH.

This was an action for a series of lies in the Railway Journal. The defendant's Counsel (Mr. Solkin) expressed his regret for having published, upon incorrect information, the unfounded statements in question, and a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 40s., was taken.

LEAK V. THE DUKES OF ANGLER.

This was an action brought to recover a sum of money, for printing the bills, reports, &c., of the British American Association. The affairs of this Association have been frequently before the public; and, as our readers will perhaps remember, were at the time made the subject of some severe animadversions in this journal. The work in question was admitted to have been done, and the prices were admitted to be reasonable; but it was contended for the defence, that there was no evidence to the Duke with liabilities.—Lord Denman, in summing up, said the duke's merely becoming president would not make him liable for the debts of the Association. The duke could only become liable by his own conduct, and by doing that which induced persons to give credit on his account. The Jury, after retiring to consult, and remaining absent for about an hour, returned with a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £145. Mr. Platt, Mr. Swain, and another Learned Counsel were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Martin and Mr. James were for the defendant.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE AFFGHAN MASSACRE.—A handsome tablet has been erected in Abchurch-lane Church, near Gosport, to the memory of the officers and soldiers of the 44th Regiment who fell in the Affghan war, over which hangs the columns of that ill-fated regiment. The full name is the inscription:—"Sacred to the memory of Colonel T. Mackenzie, A.D.C. to her Majesty; Major W. B. Scott, Captain T. Swaine, Captain R. B. M'Crea, Captain F. K. Leighton, Captain T. Robinson, Captain F. C. Collins, Lieutenant W. H. Deakin, Lieutenant W. G. White, Lieutenant W. G. Wade, Lieutenant H. Calkett, Lieutenant S. Swinton, Lieutenant F. J. C. Fortye, Lieutenant A. W. Gray, Paymaster T. Bourke, Lieutenant and Quartermaster R. B. Hallahan, Surgeon J. Harcourt, Assistant Surgeons W. Balfour, and W. Pittmore, and 645 non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the 44th Regiment, who fell upon the field of battle in the disastrous Affghan war of 1841 and 1842. They sank with some in their hands unconquered, but overpowered by the united horrors of climate, snow, and barbarous warfare; their colours saved by Captain J. Smevor, one of the few survivors, long above this shore, which is erected to their memory by the officers of the 44th Regiment—June, 1844." And if thy people Israel be put to the worse before the enemy, because they have sinned against Thee; and shall return, and confess Thy name, and pray and make supplication before Thee in this house; thou shalt hear them from the heavens, and forgive the sins of thy people Israel.—6th chapter of the 2nd book of Chronicles, 24th and 25th verses.

LAUNCH OF THE RETRIBUTION.—The launch of the Retribution Steam-frigate took place on Tuesday last at two o'clock, at Chatham Dock Yard. The assemblage of persons present was not so great as on previous occasions of a similar kind, which may be accounted for by the wetness of the morning. Among those present were:—Vice Admiral J. C. White, commander-in-chief in the Channel; Captain Martin of the Camperdown; Captain Fisher, superintendent of the Navy; Captain Storriff, superintendent of Chatham yard; Commodore Burton, of the Porpoise; Sir F. Smith, commanding Royal Engineers; Lord Fitzclarence; Sir W. Symonds, Surveyor of the Navy; and the heads of the local departments. The Royal Marine and Dockyard bands were in attendance. The superintendent and master shipwright gave a grand entertainment to their friends on the occasion, and altogether it was a very pleasing and gratifying night. The following is the description of the frigate, launched on Tuesday last:—The Retribution is a frigate of 3,500 tons, with 25 guns of 68 lb. each, and 100 of 32 lb. each. She will be taken into dock to-morrow, after the Apollo goes out, and will be put out on Thursday, and proceed to the River Thames to have her engines &c. tried. The workmen had the remainder of the day for a holiday. Miss Phillimore, daughter of Dr. Phillimore, had the honour of performing the ceremony of christening. The Retribution was christened building on the 1st of August, 1842, and is the design of the surveyor in his "improved" system. As we have before stated, she was ordered to be called the Dragon, subsequently the name of "Retribution." She is at present, and will be until March next, the largest steam-frigate of the stocks in the British navy, when, at that period, she will be second to Mr. Lang's Terrible, building at Deptford Dockyard. The Porpoise, alias Porpoise, is the next largest steam-frigate afloat; but, although the latter is less in tonnage by 35 tons, in length by 4 feet, and in horse-power of engines by 150, the Porpoise has 3 inches more in breadth, and twice as heavy an armament. Maudslay and Field are the contractors for the engines, which are of 800 horse power, or two of 400 horse power each. Her armament will consist of 100 pieces of ordnance, that is two 32-lb. guns of 119 cwt. each, four 32-lb. guns of 65 cwt. each, and five 32-lb. guns of 20 cwt. each. We believe this is smaller than at first intended. She has eight ports on a side, besides the bow and stern ports. Her intended load, draft of water is 18 feet forward and 18 feet aft, and the height of the midship part from the water is to be 6 feet 6 inches. The centre of the engine shaft is to be 10 feet above the water; the diameter of her paddle-wheel is to be 35 feet. Her rigging consists of two masts only; the foremast is square-rigged, and the mainmast has a boom-stay and reef-topsail.

DEPARTURES FOR TANGIER.—The Sydenham steam-ship, Lieut. Commander Mapleton, having had her defects repaired at Portsmouth, is ordered to Liverpool, whence she will proceed to Tangier, with despatches for the British Consul. If her services be not required by that functionary, she will go to Gibraltar, and be under the command in chief of Vice Admiral Sir E. Owen, at Malta. As we stated previously to her being commissioned, she will be employed as a post-boat on the Mediterranean station, but more especially on the western part, and by the Canal at Suez.

PROMOTIONS.—Messrs. George Harcourt (1840) from the Excellent, for his proficiency in naval studies; and William L. Patridge (1839) of the Duke, to the rank of lieutenant.

APPOINTMENTS.—Lieutenant—Admiral Fairman (1829) to the Warrior, taking passage to the Mediterranean in the Scythian, vice George Goldham (183) invalided.—Second Master, George S. Hall, of the Sydenham, acting master of the frigate.

LIGHTS ON THE COAST OF NORWAY.—The following has been received at Lloyd's, from the Hydrographic Office, dated the 18th June, 1844:—"The Norwegian Government has given notice that the following lights will be established in the course of the present year:—1. Two fixed lights on the island of Ulsnes, in lat. 59 16 N., and long. 4 33 38 E., visible from 18 to 20 miles distant. 2. Two fixed lights on Sore and Little Turney Islands, at the entrance to Arendal, in lat. 58 24 N., and long. 8 53 E., visible from 18 to 20 miles. 3. A fixed light on the island Sandviken, on the western side of the Channel to Arendal, in lat. 58 25 40 N., and long. 8 53 16 E., visible from 18 to 19 miles. In order to prevent any of the above lights from being mistaken for those of Marko and Lundersnes, on the south point of Norway, the light of Marko will be discontinued on the 1st of July next."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—We do not remember ever having seen such a combination of exceeding excellence as that announced for Fum's benefit for Thursday. The very life of the first talent in Europe will, on this occasion, be drawn into one dazzling focus. The selection is marked by infinite taste, tact, and experience. The best works of the two first Italian modern writers are to be presented, supported by artists who have earned the greatest fame by the highest qualities. Anna Bolina, the best opera singer of Donizetti, will not only have the advantage of Labiche, as the eighth Harry, a character in which he has no rival, and we much doubt whether he will have a successor; Mercuri whose exquisite style and dramatic feeling has gained for him a reputation as universal as well earned; but Gini will also appear as Anna Bolina, one of her most original essays. A fresh appearance in the person of Signora Gaiasopina, Riccioli, from the Italian Opera, at Vienna, will make her first appearance in this country as Jane Seymour, and Favanti's magnificent voice will give consequence to the Page Smeaton. As if this grand assemblage was not sufficient, the second act of Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" is to be given, with the powerful aid of Madame Parniani, and Labiche, Fossati, and Mario. Those who served at the shrine of the Elisee and the Circe will be in ecstasy at the various pos which those quires of the ballet will perform. The benefactors will delight his patrons with a solo on the horn—his purity of tone and taste are so well known, that any comment on his talent would be supererogatory. This may indeed be called a monster affair.

POSTSCRIPT.

We understand the removal of the Court from Buckingham Palace to Windsor Castle has been postponed until Wednesday or Thursday next at the latest. Her Majesty will have a large dinner party on Monday next, at the Palace, which, it is expected, will close the royal banquets in town for the present season.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge arrived at Dover on Thursday, at 12 o'clock, and was accompanied by Baroness Ashfeld and Baron Kneisebeck. Her Royal Highness went to Worthington's Ship Hotel, to await the arrival of her daughter, the Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. At two o'clock the Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, landed from her Majesty's steam-jacket the Princess Alice, Captain Smith, at the Admiralty wharf, where a guard of honour of the 6th Regiment was in waiting. Colonel R. Jones and Captain Mores, R.N., were also in attendance. Captain Meier had the honour of escorting the Grand Duchess to the Ship Hotel. After dining, the Royal passengers set off for London by the half-past four o'clock train.

The Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress gave a most splendid ball and supper, at the Mansion House, on Wednesday night. There were upwards of three hundred and fifty guests.

Several of the Cabinet Ministers visited Sir Robert Peel on Friday morning, at the residence of the right hon. baronet in Whitehall-garden.

The Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, and Mr. Bigham, as Commissioner for the Reduction of the National Debt, had a meeting on Friday morning with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street.

POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.—The secret committee appointed to enquire into the regulations of the Post-office, met on Friday morning at twelve o'clock in the Committee-room, No. 14. Sir James Graham was in attendance during the whole morning, but nothing transpired as to the mode of proceeding which the committee intended to adopt.

ANGLO-GERMAN INSTITUTION.—Yesterday the annual meeting of this most excellent institution, which has for its object, the education, cloth &c., and nurture through life, of the orphans of clergymen, and officers in the army, navy, and marines, was held at the Institute, in St. Andrew's-park, Regent's-park, the Right Hon. the Earl Manserv, in the chair. The Rev. Thomas Bowdler, the Secretary, read the report, which, after expressing the healthy state of the Institute, &c., stated that the number of wards at present were 31, 9 being the orphans of clergymen; 14, of officers in the army; 9, of officers in the navy; and 3 in the Royal Marines. Since the opening of the Institution, 205 orphans had been clothed, 54, instructed in dancing, music, &c., to fit them for government; 51 being the orphans of clergymen, 72 of officers in the army, 73 of officers in the navy, many of whom were now in good circumstances. The finance account stated, that the total sum for the last year had been £272 10s., and the contributions £700 0s.; of which the receipts being £2418 13s. 4d. The disbursements had been £2311; the house expenses being £719 10s. 7d., and the salaries £700. The balance in hand was £203 19s. 4d. The company inspected the rooms and gardens of the building, and seemed much pleased with the cleanliness of the young women who were parading the grounds.

DEATH OF MR. SCOLEFIELD, MEMBER FOR BIRMINGHAM.—We regret to announce the death of this gentleman, which took place at his residence in Manchester-buildings, at three o'clock on Thursday afternoon. The deceased gentleman was in the 70th year of his age.

ATTEMPTED MURDER.—On Thursday afternoon the neighbourhood of Red-cross-street, Southwark, was thrown into great excitement by the report that a woman had murdered her husband. The unfortunate sufferer, Mr. Samuel Johnson, arrived home to dinner from Billingsgate-market, at which place he is a salesman, when he found his wife insensible, and no dinner provided for him or his family. He remonstrated with her for her conduct, and was about to leave the house, when his wife, in a state of frenzy, seized a table-knife and stabbed him in the back of the head, just below the scalp. He was taken to Guy's Hospital, where it was ascertained that the knife had entered with great force between the nape of the neck and the skull-bone, against which it had struck, and that little hopes were entertained of the man's recovering. The wife was taken into custody.

THE CONVICT DALMAN.—Dalman has received a reprieve during pleasure, which is tantamount to remitting the capital punishment. Dalman will remain in Horsemerger-lane prison for another month, and it will then be decided whether he is to be transported for life or sent to Bridham as a lunatic. We understand it is the opinion of Drs. Sutherland and Monro that he is subject to such violent passions when in the least provoked, that he cannot be considered in any other light than that of an insane man.

ENTRY OF MARSHAL BUCCHARD INTO MOSCOW.—Dispatches were received by the French Government on Wednesday, announcing the entry of Marshal Bucchard into the town of Ouchka, on the 15th ult., without a shot being fired, the Moscow troops having evacuated the place two days before. A Marshal Chief had asked previously for a conference with the Marshal, and appeared disposed towards a pacific arrangement. At this period, however, the Marshal had not received instructions from his Government, acquainting him with the views of the Cabinet, nor was he aware of the fact of the departure of the Prince de Joinville with the fleet under his command.

THE OVERLAND INDIAN MAIL.

THE MAIL PACKET FROM ALEXANDRIA, OFF MARSEILLES—THE INDIAN MAIL ON BOARD.

The arrival of the Overland Mail, on Tuesday morning last, suggests the fitness of this opportunity of perfecting our details of this complete postal arrangement.

We have described in former numbers the course of the Indian

Mail from Bombay to Marseilles, together with views of some of the more remarkable localities in the passage of a newspaper express from Paris to the Times office in London. Since that period, the subject has grown to be one of greater importance; the states of Hin-dostan have become more essential to the welfare of the home country; China has been added to our commercial empire; and the course of trading adventure on the coasts of Burmah, Japan, and many wondrous places of the Orient seas, have combined to give all Postoffice arrangements with these immense territories a degree of surpassing interest. The flight of the Indian Mail is, in truth, a wonder of the day: thousands follow its course for pleasure or instruction; and even the Governor-General, throwing off the customary solemnity of a state march, has at last ventured to take the post passage to Calcutta. For these reasons, we have felt ourselves bound to gratify the public with some additional information on the subject; and accordingly, at great expense, we have prepared them a complete series of views of the more important agents used in the transmission of "The Mail" from Egypt to London. These engravings almost describe themselves; and, being consecutive in their arrangement, will call for little additional matter to make both them and the intermediate steps of the mail journey intelligible to the untravelled reader.

The India Mail—comprehending all the mails from the departments of the East—is made up at Bombay. It consists of bundles of letters, so packed, in strong iron boxes of about two feet by one and a half in depth, securely bound and sealed in colter, as wax would be melted by the heat of the climate; these boxes are stamped with a crown, and the words, "GENERAL POST OFFICE—INDIA MAIL." The number of these boxes varies from thirty to forty, or more; together, they constitute the Mail. The boxes, sealed and numbered, are put on board a powerful steamer, and sent direct to Suez, at the head of the Red Sea; then they are transmitted across the Desert in light carts, to Cairo, where they are shipped on the canal, and towed, or steamed, according to circumstances, to Alexandria, where the race against time and tide in reality commences. They are mostly shipped by one of the magnificent steamers in the service of the Oriental Steam Navigation Company, and carried, via Malta, direct to Marseilles. At this port, the papers for France are delivered, and an abstract of the Indian news drawn up for the instant information of the French and English Governments. This abstract is sent by telegraph to PARIS: DEPARTURE WITH THE MAIL SIGNALS.

Paris and thence to Boulogne by a one-horse "Malle-poste." Our cut exhibits one in ordinary use. In France, the telegraph usually occupies the top of a church tower. On reaching Boulogne, the "abstract" India Mail express, bearing on its envelope the significant words, "Tres Pressé" is placed on board a steamer—or, in extreme cases, a sailing smack—and forwarded, with all possible speed, to Folkestone. In approaching this port the vessel hoists a signal of the "Mail," called a "whiff," or pennon tied at the end in a knot, to give notice to the harbour-master and the railroad authorities, to have all things in readiness to speed it on its flight to the metropolis; but if the coast be made during the night, a red light under her bows and a white light at the mast-head are the only signals given. The answer to these signals, from the pier-head, is made by a double white light, as shown in our engraving. The passage by steam vessels has varied from 2 hours and 40 minutes to 14 hours; and by sailing vessels, from 3 hours and 55 minutes to 48 hours. The South Eastern Railway Company hope, however, to be able to send the Mail by their new steamers in, at most, 1 hour and 45 minutes. Immediately on the Mail signal being observed, the railway harbour-master, the indefatigable Mr. Faulkner, makes the necessary arrangements for its reception. If it be high-water, these are simple and common-place enough, as the despatch has merely to be landed and sent by the mail omnibus to the station, a journey of about a mile, performed—amid the shouts of the company, who usually assemble in great numbers to welcome its arrival—at the break-neck pace of twenty miles an hour. But if it be low-water, the weather rough, and the time night, a scene of exciting adventure ensues. A dilly—a long clear-water boat, manned by some eight or more stout fellows, under Mr. Faulkner's command—is launched from the beach, and sent off to the approaching vessel. On reaching it, a large blue light is fired, and in the glare of its ghastly flame, the captain of the steamer descends, bearing the express, and is immediately rowed to the shore, when, if it be dark, and a heavy surf rolling, a number of fishermen are usually posted with flambeaux to light them through the breakers. On landing, the express is committed to Mr. Faulkner, who carries it to the train.

The Abstract Mail having thus escaped the perils of the water, and reached the Folkestone station in safety, is placed in the carriage of a special train, which is usually in waiting a period—more or less—of three days, for its arrival, and, despatched in less than two hours to the metropolis. On these occasions, the transit of a train on India Mail service, is indicated to all the railway servants by a broad white board placed during daylight in front of the engine; and, at night by three white lights in the same situation.

Several of these expresses, from one to half-a-dozen, will sometimes arrive in the course of as many hours, to be sent in the same "special" manner to London. The Times, the Herald, the Chronicle, the Government, the Stockbrokers, have often their separate expresses. Each of these despatches costs the parties upwards of £100 from Marseilles to London—£50 from Marseilles to Boulogne, £45 from the voyage, and £45 for the special train.

The Abstract of the Mail usually anticipates the Mail itself by about two days. While the "heads" of the intelligence have been progressing at the rate we have described, the iron boxes of details, packed in a hearse-like coach, called by the estafettes a "fourgo," has been dragging its comparatively slow length along, at the rapid pace of sixty-three hours from Marseilles to Boulogne, on reaching which it is shipped on board the mail packet, and sent direct to Folkestone, and thence by rail to London; but formerly—we believe even to the arrival of the present Mail—at was sent to Dover, and despatched by coach to London, a proceeding attended with the loss of at least ten hours.

The Railway Company have just placed, in conjunction with the Folkestone Station, two iron steam-boats, the Princess Mary and Princess Maad, by each of which the passage to Boulogne is performed within two hours; and the Company are not without hope that the time of transit may be reduced to an average of one hour and an half.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

We have received, in anticipation of the Overland Mail from Bombay, letters and papers from all parts of our Indian empire.

The latest dates are from Bombay to the 26th, and from Calcutta to the 11th of May; from Marao to the 26th, and Hong Kong to the 26th of April. The mail from England of the 6th of April, had reached Bombay on the 12th of May.

The principal intelligence brought by the Indian mail of the 26th of May relates to the state of the Punjab, which appears now to be more distracted than ever. A bloody fight is stated to have taken place on the 7th of May, between Heera Singh, the present Prime Minister, and the party of the sons of Burej Singh, who are opposed to him, led on by Burej Singh, a chief of considerable influence. In September last, when Ajit Singh had murdered the then King, Sher Singh, and the Prime Minister, Phyas Singh, he was himself slain in a fight with Heera Singh, who avenged the death of his father, Phyas, by ordering all the family of Ajit to be hanged. One boy of nine years was allowed to live, and an uncle named Utra, or Utra Singh, escaped into the Sikh States, protected by the British. After seven months' residence, he went back on the 20th of April, and joined the party under Chaudhara Singh and Peshora Singh, both sons (through of minor rank) of old Burej Singh. They proceeded to attack Heera Singh, and a bloody conflict took place, in which Heera was said to have been wounded. Burej Singh was considered by some of the partisans of Heera as being supported by the British, and they therefore have threatened to invade the territories of the latter, to revenge themselves on those who had countenanced the proceedings of Burej Singh.

The threatened movement of the notorious Akbar Khan on Peshawar had not taken place. The position of his father Dhoat Nahrud, was by no means satisfactory; his age, his infirmities, and the complicated state of the affairs of Calcutta would, it was thought, induce him to resign his sovereignty into the hands of Akbar.

The news from Scinde extends to the 16th of May. Sir Charles Napier was busy in making preparations for the meeting of the Beloches chiefs, which was to take place on the 24th of May, when it is said that upwards of 17,000 of them would attend, each having an armed attendant. Thirty thousand men assembled to deliberate would present an odd appearance. It was supposed that Sir Charles had some important measure to propose to their attention. In Upper Scinde, where General Simpson (who was to be succeeded by General Hunter) commanded, nothing remarkable had occurred. Preparations were going on for the purpose of putting down the fresh hosts under Bera Khan, who had acquired new strength in consequence of the unsuccessful attempts made by the force under Captain Tait and Lieutenant Fitzgerald to storm Poonjee, as mentioned last month.

The Bengal troops had arrived at Suikur, where they were making arrangements for locating themselves. General Hunter was expected there from Ferropore.

Great expectation was entertained respecting the meeting of two large corps of troops, which are to be collected towards the month of August and September on the Sutledge; the one to the west to be commanded by General Sir Charles Napier, and the other, near Ferropore, by Sir Hugh Gough. The latter statement might be doubted, as it was said that the presence of the Commander-in-Chief was required at the Council Board at Calcutta. It seems, however, more likely that either Sir Charles Napier or Sir Charles Napier will attend the movements of the Governor-General, who was, it was reported, on the eve of going from Calcutta to the north-western provinces, and who would reach Meerut in September. The disturbed state of the Punjab is calculated to hasten the movements of the British Indian armies in that direction. The attempts lately made to corrupt the fidelity of the British army, and the large sums sent to Ferropore and its vicinity (£470,000), have excited a strong feeling for punishing the unprincipled chiefs of Lakore. The large force of 50,000 men was therefore ordered, and it was thought Lord Ellenborough and Sir C. Napier would undertake the conquest of the Punjab, the former as a diplomatist and a politician, and the latter as a general.

In Gwalior there were intrigues fomented by the Queen Dowager against the British and the Regent established there; but a caution and a threat had been given her on the part of the Supreme Government. Tranquillity prevailed in the capital, and the people were satisfied, for an excellent police had been organized there by the British officers. The ancient capital of Candahar, called Buzakpore, had been ceded to the British, and was taken possession of by the troops from Mhow and Asseghun. The occupation of it by the British is satisfactory to its inhabitants, as it was going to pass under the Mahatta yoke.

One of the freebooting chiefs of Bughilkund has had his castle levied to the east, and is himself a prisoner, in consequence of his refusal to obey the orders of the Supreme Government, and to restore some plunder which he had taken from some merchants, British subjects, who were travelling through the country. This decided act of the British authorities is highly acceptable to the ryots and traders, who are delighted when these petty tyrants are punished for their robberies and insolence.

The other parts of India were tranquil, and expected to be so during the rainy season.

Admiral Sir W. Parker was at Madras on the 11th of May, when he was fitted by the inhabitants.

The large native-made piece of ordnance which was found some years ago at Kurnool has been shipped on board her Majesty's ship Cornwallis, and was to be removed to England. It weighs upwards of eight tons.

In Bombay there was a discussion going forward respecting the conduct of the native justices, who had not carried themselves to procure the arrest of a man named Aloo Paroo, against whom evidence had been discovered to prove his being implicated in the burning of the five ships from that harbour during the last two years, and also of his being connected with the gang of pirates, smugglers, &c., discovered in 1842.

The news from China comes down to the 25th of March, but it adds nothing to the facts already known.

Further intelligence had been received at Bombay from China, just before the departure of the mail, by way of Calcutta. It is to the 10th of April, but is still destitute of political news. Males opium was said to have declined very materially in price in consequence of its inferior quality.

The mail from Bombay was brought to Suva by the Hon. East India Company's steamer Cleopatra, which arrived there on the 14th ult., with an passengers. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamship Hindostan reached Suva on the following day with upwards of 100 passengers, having left Calcutta on the 11th of May.

The Great Liverpool steamer, which had only reached Alexandria on the 16th, from Southampton, was to leave again on the 21st, on her return voyage, with a full complement of passengers.

Sir Henry Hardinge was expected at Alexandria on the 21st ult.

One case of plague had occurred at Alexandria.

The following extract is taken from the Bombay Monthly Times of the 26th of May:—

"Considerable alarm prevailed at Shikarpore, in consequence of the return of Captain Tait and Lieutenant Fitzgerald with a force of 800 men, which had been repulsed at Poonjee, and were followed by the enemy back towards."

SCIND.—The Beloches having come down to plunder the country round Shikarpore, had destroyed several villages within a few miles of our camp. Captain Tait, with six hundred irregulars, and Lieutenant Fitzgerald, with two hundred of the camel corps, had gone out in quest of them, and having crossed the desert, proceeded till very near the entrance of the Murree hills

—the scene of so many of our misadventures in 1840. The enemy were here in considerable force, and had taken refuge in the strong fort of Poonjee. An attempt was made by Lieutenant Fitzgerald to blow open the gate with powder-bags and storm the town. The first operation was unsuccessful, the leading man carrying the gunpowder having been killed on his way towards the gate. The fire from the walls was found so hot that our troops were compelled to retire—the enemy following them, the whole way back to camp, a distance of 70 miles. The coast being thus clear, the Beloches proceeded with their altars to renew their forays, and to strip the unprotected country round Shikarpore of everything that could be carried away."

THE RUNNING REIN CASE.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Before Baron Alderson and a Special Jury.)

WOOD v. PEEL.

This trial having been appointed for Monday last, the court, immediately on its opening, was crowded to excess. Several sporting men of celebrity were in attendance.

The Earl of Strafford, the Hon. Mr. Byng, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, the Baron De Tesser, the Hon. Charles Grey, and other distinguished individuals, sat upon the bench. Lord G. Bentinck sat close to the counsel for the defendant.

Mr. Cockburn, Q.C., Mr. James, and Mr. Lush, appeared for the plaintiff; and the Solicitor-General, Mr. Wetherby, Q.C., and Mr. Martin, for the defendant.

At a few minutes before ten o'clock Mr. Baron Alderson took his seat upon the bench, when the following gentlemen were sworn of the special jury:—Joseph Hosman (foreman), Isaac Harwood, Charles W. Moore, Frederick Bryant, Charles J. Cotton, Robert Bentley, Richard Williams, William Coles, Thomas A. H. Dickson, John T. Miller, Edward Antrobus, and Henry Watson.

Witnesses on both sides were ordered out of court. On application to the Bench, Lord George Bentinck was, however, permitted to stay, as were also the Baron De Tesser and Sir Gilbert Heathcote.

Mr. Lush having stated the pleadings,

Mr. Cockburn said, the question was, whether a horse called Running Rein, which was the Derby at the last Epsom Races, was a colt foaled in 1841, whose sire was The Saddler, and whose dam was Mah. When they proffered what the Derby was—the amount of the stakes, and the number of people, grave senators, lawyers, and others, who took an interest in it—it would easily account for the importance that was attached to the present issue. The plaintiff laid to contend with individuals of great weight and station, who had very large bets depending on the result of the action, and who, therefore, were indefatigable, and not very scrupulous in their efforts to defeat him. The question, however, was a very simple one. It was not one of opinion, nor of science, but of fact. Indeed, it was a plain question of identity. The horse in question was the race-won it gallantly. This done, Colonel Peel, the owner of the second horse, objected to the statement being put over to the owner of Running Rein, and claimed them for himself, as the owner of Orlando. According to the ordinary rules of the Jockey Club, Colonel Peel, having objected to the age of the horse, was bound to prove the disqualification to the satisfaction of that club. But Colonel Peel did not do this, but took refuge under the power of the law, thus throwing on the plaintiff the onus of proving the birth of the horse.

Baron Alderson.—The plaintiff himself undertook that; he chose his own position.

Mr. Cockburn.—And did not shrink from it. The proper qualification of the horse—its actual identity—should be fully proved, not by one witness, but by a whole host. The learned counsel then proceeded to state the pedigree of the horse, and after detailing the facts which he proposed to substantiate in evidence, concluded by saying that surely the transaction was straightforward enough; and yet because some suspicion attached to certain transactions of Goodman with regard to other horses—and because certain gentlemen and gentlemen (as they called themselves) had bet to an enormous amount against the horse, Mr. Wood was now attempted to be robbed of his gains. He spoke next of Colonel Peel—not by name, there was an honest man; but let other gentlemen, and one or two certain gentlemen, get into the witness box—let them dare to do it, and he would turn them inside out. (Laughter.) Why many of these people—members, say, and high members too of the Jockey Club—he could prove, laid, heavily, enormously, against Running Rein at the very time they were preparing a case to dispute his qualification. A day or two before he ran, Lord George Bentinck, Mr. Bowers, and Mr. John Scott, signed a protest against Running Rein. The awards adopted the usual rule of the Jockey Club, and appointed a time for receiving evidence as to the identity of the horse; and they determined that he was prima facie qualified to run. He did run, and he won the race. It was objected that the stakes should be given up, and further inquiry was to be instituted. Mr. Wood again proposed for it; but Colonel Peel refused to give in, but offered to abide by the arbitration of a barrister. This Mr. Wood declined, in his (Mr. Cockburn's) opinion most properly. At the same time he could not but regret that the anxiety of a court of justice should be generated, and its estimate sullied by contact with the foul practices of a race course. He ventured to say that many members of the Jockey Club had made bets against the horse at a time they intended to protest against him if he lost, and if they dared to enter the witness box he would turn them inside out. (Laughter.)

Plaintiff's witnesses were now called.

Thomas Lettbridge, of Norton, deposed to the birth of the foal at Colby's, in May, 1841. He said it was two or three days old when he saw it, of a bay colour, all the legs black, and clear of white. It had a few white hairs on its forehead, but no star. He saw her two or three times a day, and knows King, of Norton; the colt and its dam remained three or four months in the paddock.

Cross-examined.—It was a smart little foal. He was not sure that saddle he observed that all the feet were black.

Re-examined.—Many white hairs constitute a star. The mother had none.

John Kingsley.—In 1840 I went to Colby's, at Norton, and remained three years. Knows the mare. She had a foal, and remained a week in the stable. The mare and foal were then taken to Sutton House paddock, till it was brought at the instance of Lettbridge. He looked after it there and in the hay-house. It was a bay foal, having black legs, and was not particularly broad in the ears. Robert Spanton took it to King's stables, near Sutton House. He is a training groom. He went with Allen to Lord George Bentinck's lodgings, and thence, with his valet, to Kent. His last day came next day with another gentleman, and by him he was taken before the stewards of the Jockey Club, where he made his statement. Lord Strafford went with him to the stable, and showed him the horse, which he at once knew, and said so. He did not talk with any one of Goodman.

Cross-examined.—I am twenty next January. Left Colby last Martinmas. The horse in question has black legs and feet. I have resided with Mr. Gill, the plaintiff's attorney, for nearly a month, in Adlington-street, Hamstead-road. I have done nothing since the Derby. I have been at Mr. Glen's, baker, Regent-street. I have not given up my situation at York. [A letter being handed him, he read it to himself, and declared the handwriting to be his.] Mr. Glen has not permitted me a situation. I do not expect at 100 if the action is won, I wrote that letter to partly my father.

Baron Alderson.—That may be the Yorkshire method of parrying a father, but it is as bad to art a lie as to tell one.

Henry Stedding, training groom of Hambleton.—I knew that Colby had a foal in 1841. I saw him at Colby's paddock, with a donkey. Watson was sent for him. I gave him 40s to pay for him. Watson took him to York. He is of a bay colour, has black legs, clear of white, and a few white hairs on the forehead. I saw him at York, in January, 1842. My brother James was there. He put the colt in a railway box, and went to London. I could expect it to grow into such a horse as Running Rein. I bought him for Mr. Goodman.

Cross-examined.—I am much accustomed to horses. Goodman employed him at Newmarket. I bore the letter that endorsed the payment. It was a last foal; had a white pattern, and I did not observe that its off fore-foot turned outwards.

Re-examined.—Goodman had several horses.

Wm. Wise.—In January, 1842, Stedding's servant went to Colby's about the foal which he had seen. It was of a bay colour, black legs, clear of white, and had a few white hairs on the forehead. It was to be sent to John King's.

Baron Alderson here said, it would be highly proper for the horse to be seen, especially by the jury.

Mr. Tesser said he had been refused to see it.

Mr. Cockburn.—Your lordship shall presently see under what circumstances it was refused.

His lordship advised that the horse should be in readiness to be viewed tomorrow.

Robert Spanton.—In January, 1841, I was in Colby's service. Witness then described the history of the foal about the time of its birth. It has black legs, clear of white, a little white hair on the forehead, and its hind heels much cracked.

James Stedding.—Lives at Hambleton with his brother Henry. In January, 1842, he was at York, and going to London. I came to York with him from Thack. I saw the foal at the Derby station. When we came to Euston-grove we were met by a man or a lad. The colt was taken next day to some stables in Euston-place. I should have entered him as a bay horse; some would have entered him as bay or brown, from their anticipation of a change of colour. It had four black legs, and no white that he knew of. Saw him running at Newmarket on October, 1842. The foal I saw was likely to grow into such a horse as Running Rein.

John Andrews.—In December, 1841, I was in the service of Mr. Fools, a country gentleman, attending some of his hunters then standing at Colby's. He saw the foal and gave a description of it similar to the preceding one.

Daniel White.—In 1842, I was employed at Joseph's stables. I went to Euston-square station for a foal. He remained at Euston-place two nights and a day. I saw him the next day, and took him to Mr. Peel's, Mutton-street, Dorset-square. In September, I saw him at Bean's, at Finchley. I betched him from there and took him to Goodman's, in Finsbury-place, and thence to Haynes's stables, Langham-place.

Cross-examined.—Mr. Joseph is brother-in-law to Mr. Goodman, who sometimes uses his stables. Mr. Joseph keeps a book. I gave the note to Goodman White next with me. I do not know that Bean had a chequer tally.

Re-examined.—I met George White, who told me he was going to fill a situation at Paris.

James Wilson Peel, lives in Milton-street, Dorset-square. On the 20th of January, 1842, a man brought Goodman's boy for the colt. He remained till the 26th. Bean, of Finchley, fetched him away. I saw him every day. He was a little bay foal, having black legs, clear of white. I have every reason to believe that the horse I saw at Epsom was the same. Bean's padlock adjoins the road.

Wm. Bean lived at Finchley in 1842. Goodman applied to me to allow his foal to run in my paddock. On the 30th of January, 1842, I saw him at Bean's. He remained with me till the 24th of September. During his stay with me, he met with an accident, in endeavouring to enter an adjoining field. In so doing he knocked off some hairs from his forehead and near fore leg, between the knee and arm, and broke some of his skin. I saw him at Newmarket in October, the year after. It struck me that it was the same colt I saw afterwards in training with Smith at Epsom. I never had any other colt. I was not at home when the message came for him, but was going to London, and met him on the road. I gave my order, and he had the colt. The colt was gone when I returned.

Cross-examined.—I have been a horse-dealer for 30 years. In business, I have not been prosperous, having been twice bankrupt, and twice insolvent. In my first bankruptcy, I cannot say whether my creditors ever received a dividend, nor can I say as much respecting my second bankruptcy. No account was ever given, nor was there a creditor who applied to me. Mr. Hammond is my assistant. I don't remember ever having asked him to advance me £25 on the order of Allen in my favour to that amount, and that that order arose from a dishonest transaction by me. I do not remember any transaction with Allen, but I do remember one with Kingswood. I will not swear that I ever told Kingswood that Kingswood owed me money, that he was away, but would soon return, and in the mean time asked him for money. I will not swear that I paid part of that money, and have left the rest unpaid till this day.

His lordship here told the witness, that he ought to be able to swear to these points one way or the other; but it was impossible to get other than guarded and qualified answers from the witness.

The above are the principal witnesses examined in behalf of Mr. Wood. Others were equally minute in tracing the horse through town, and down to the time he won the Derby. The facts were exactly as Mr. Cockburn had related. Among these witnesses were the Baron De Tesser, John Derby, James Love, Rayner, Brewster, Hitchcock the horsebreaker, and Smith the trainer. A certain period in the course of the evidence rendered it necessary to advert to the actual inspection of the horse.

Baron Alderson said that if evidence could be afforded which should go to show that the examination of the horse's mouth was an infallible criterion, he would assuredly call the serious attention of the jury to it. If, on the other hand, it was a fallible criterion, he would then tell them either to dismiss it altogether, or to be guided in the application of it, should make of evidence thus obtained. In the meantime he extremely recommended the counsel to consider the question in their evidence, as the course he had adopted was, evidently, the only fair and rational method of proceeding.

Mr. Cockburn would have no objection to show the Gladiator colt, when his witness was first pointed out. But he would not undertake to show him to witnesses behind a hand, who, he was afraid, would be too ready to take advantage of their knowledge to his detriment.

Baron Alderson put the case of a bill of exchange as a parallel one. Nobody ever thought of objecting to show it, if any dispute existed as to a signature, until the handwriting had been first described. He saw no sensible difference in the cases as to identity.

Mr. Cockburn submitted that there was no analogy in the cases. If the Gladiator colt had been seen by the other side, it could be easily described; but if he was shown before description, there were plenty of persons to be got to come into court and swear to his identity with any horse.

There was some clapping and stamping in the body of the court as the learned counsel made this observation; but it was speedily repressed by the learned Judge commanding the court to be cleared. He did not, however, enforce this order, but he lectured the offenders very severely upon their insolent conduct. The case then proceeded.

The Solicitor-General said the Gladiator colt was four years old, if he was right; and, if the other side was right, Running Rein was only three. It was important that persons of skill should have an opportunity of examining the horse to settle that question.

The case for the plaintiff having closed,

The Solicitor-General rose to address the jury in behalf of Colonel Peel, the defendant. Having commented upon the sudden and unexpected termination just put to the plaintiff's case, he proceeded to remark upon the different parts of the evidence by which it was supported. He then laid the defendant's case before the jury, in which he intended to show that Running Rein, the winner of the late Derby race, was not the real Running Rein but a fraudulent substitution of a horse which was foaled by a mare owned in the possession of Sir Charles Blount. He would show that this Running Rein was formerly called Maccabeus, and in that name had been entered at several races. The learned counsel's speech occupied a large portion of the advanced part of the day, and went into details which showed where the two horses were at the various epochs to which the attention of the jury had been called.

It was six o'clock when the Solicitor-General concluded his address to the Jury; and the bar and the spectators evidently appeared anxious that the case should be adjourned; but the learned Judge decided upon hearing some of the evidence for the defendant, on the ground that as the trial would necessarily go on the next day, it was important that as much should be done as possible. The following witnesses for the defendant were therefore called and examined:—

Lord Strathmore, examined by Mr. J. S. Wetherby: Was one of the stewards of the Jockey Club last year. He remembered the race on the 4th of June, when Running Rein beat Crenolin at the Newmarket meeting. Crenolin was the property of the Duke of Rutland. The race was for two-year-olds. The Duke made an objection after the race that the winner was three years old. The stewards were Mr. Byng and Mr. Greenville. An arrangement was made that the case should be heard at the Houghton Meeting. An application was made to examine the horse's mouth. The stewards met and heard the case, and Mr. Goodman examined two or three witnesses to prove Running Rein was only two years old; the Duke of Rutland produced only one—the boy Karlton. It was arranged that the boy and a veterinary surgeon, named Barr-w, of Newmarket, and Mr. Wetherby, the secretary, should be taken to Goodman's stables. The horse was in a loose box; Karlton looked at the horse, and said at first he thought it was the horse, and then that he believed it was. It was then proposed that Mr. Barron should examine the horse's mouth—he is a person of high character, but Goodman objected positively to it, and gave them to understand he would resist by force. He said his legal adviser had advised him not to permit the horse's mouth to be examined. They then returned to the rooms where the stewards met, and he (Lord Strathmore) repeated the result to the meeting. The stewards were of opinion that though the Duke of Rutland had not proved his case, it was one of suspicion. Goodman was told by him (Lord Strathmore) on the part of the stewards, that the horse should never be allowed to run again at Newmarket unless he permitted the examination of his mouth. The horse had not since run at Newmarket.

By Baron Alderson.—In forty-one cases out of fifty the mark of the mouth had been stated to be an erroneous test; but lately he had understood it to be regarded to a certainty.

Messenger, the stud-groom to Sir Charles Blount, and Mr. Hayward, the land agent, deposed to the marks of the Gladiator foal said to Goodman.

George Wharton, groom to Sir Charles Blount, examined by Mr. J. S. Wetherby, proved that he took the colt in question to the Maresborough station, on the North Midland Railway, on the 17th of September, and delivered him to Mr. Goodman, who went off the London way.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cockburn.—Knew Mr. Goodman by sight very well. It was the day after one of the Doncaster races he took the colt to the station.

Charles Wetherby, examined by Mr. Martin.—Was Secretary to the Jockey Club, and kept, with his clerks, the books for Epsom and Newmarket nominations. There was an entry in his books of the entry of Gladiator, in the name of Watson, for the Derby of 1843. That horse was afterwards entered as Maccabeus for the Liverpool Cup, in 1843; the entries closed on or before the 2nd of January, 1843. Both entries were in the handwriting of the witness's clerk. There was forfeit of £1 paid for the Liverpool Cup, which was paid in Goodman's name by a Mr. Moffat, in the presence of Goodman. It formed a portion of £45 over-due stakes paid on Goodman's account, to permit his horse Dr. Phillimore to run, in accordance with the rules of the club.

Joseph Farrell, examined by Mr. Martin.—Was clerk to the stewards of the Epsom races. Goodman entered his bay colt Maccabeus for a sweepstake of £3, with fifty sovereigns added, in April, 1843. The colt ran in that race, carrying 20, as a three-year-old.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cockburn.—Captain Flathooker was a bay horse.

Mr. Wetherby, re-examined by Mr. Martin.—Running Rein was first entered for a sweepstake of 50 sovereigns to run at Newmarket First Spring Meeting, 1844. The next entry was for the Derby; it was made at Newmarket on or before the last day of the July meeting, 1843. The third entry was for the Second October Meeting at Newmarket, 1843, for the 2000 guineas Clewwell Stakes, to be run for in the spring of 1844. He was also entered for a 50 guinea stake at the Alington Mile, in October, 1843. The horse did not run at the Houghton Meeting. The meeting took place on the Thursday after the decision of the stewards allied to by Lord Strathmore.

The Court then adjourned until the next morning.

TUESDAY.

Long before the time appointed for resuming the trial, on Tuesday morning, Westminster Hall was crowded with individuals connected with the sporting world; and when the doors of the Court of Exchequer were opened, the rush to gain admittance was terrific. In a moment every space appropriated to the public was filled, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the officers of the court, with the assistance of several police-officers, could keep the crowd from occupying the barristers' benches.

The Duke of Rutland, the Earl of Strafford, Baron De Tesser, Lord G. Bentinck, and other noblemen and gentlemen were in the court at the time of commencing business, and were accommodated with seats on or near the bench.

Before the business commenced, Baron De Tesser asked Lord George Bentinck to come and speak to him. His lordship was bound to say, "I am a witness in the cause, and cannot hold any conversation with you until the trial is over." Baron Tesser then asked Col. Peel to have a few minutes' conversation with him, which Col. Peel acceded to, and in a few minutes afterwards it was announced that Mr. Wood intended to give up his case, and withdraw the record.

Mr. Baron Alderson, on taking his seat on the bench, at ten o'clock, asked the name of the first witness counsel intended to call.

The Solicitor-General said.—Mr. George Wetherby is the first witness, my lord.

Mr. Cockburn said, after what had fallen from his lordship yesterday he was placed in a difficult situation as to the production of the horse.

Baron Alderson said.—Mr. Cockburn, surely you must be anxious to produce the horse.

Mr. Cockburn felt that it was his duty to produce the horse for the inspection of the jury, and in that opinion his learned friends and the plaintiff fully concurred; but Mr. Wood assured him, the horse had been taken away without his sanction, approval, or knowledge, and that, having traced it to the place to which it had been first removed, he went there for the purpose of getting possession of the horse, but he was there informed that it had been again removed to some other place.

Mr. Baron Alderson.—Why do you not then apply to the police to apprehend the persons so acting, on a charge of horse-stealing? If they were tried before me on such a charge, I would transport them as sure as they are born (laughter).

Mr. Cockburn said no doubt it was an offence which could be so punished, but the only question in which he (Mr. Cockburn) was concerned, was what course he should adopt after what had fallen from his lordship yesterday respecting the production of the horse, for he felt that it would be vain to strive against the efforts which must be produced by the non-production of the horse after their remarks; and he had Mr. Wood's assurance that it was not in his power to produce the horse.

Mr. Baron Alderson.—It was for the learned counsel to decide on the course which he should adopt. The case as it now stood was purely a question of fact for the jury to decide. There was a case in the old books in which a poor boy who had found a diamond took it to a jeweller, who kept it. An action was brought to recover the value of the diamond, and as the jeweller refused to produce the diamond the jury found that it was a diamond of the first water, and he (Mr. Baron Alderson) thought they had found justly. Up to a certain point the case was perfectly clear, namely, up to the period at which the horse was delivered to Hales, and the question was, did Cook's coat go from Hales's to Hunt's, and subsequently become Running Rein.

Mr. Cockburn was quite willing to do whatever his lordship pleased.

Mr. Baron Alderson.—Do whatever you please.

The Solicitor-General said, as far as they (the counsel for the defendant) were concerned they were quite ready to go on and prove their case.

After a short pause it was resolved to proceed.

Mr. George Worley called, and examined by Mr. J. S. Wortley.—Farmed his own property at Sewell, in Northamptonshire. Was at Doncaster races in 1841. Saw Mr. Goodman and Mr. Henry Higgins. Mr. Higgins said something about buying a colt. Got home the day after the St. Leger was run for. A few days afterwards received a colt from Mr. Higgins; it was a kind of a blood-coloured bay colt—a bright bay colt. Received a pedigree shortly afterwards. Had no white about him; no white dot on his forehead, but he might have had a grey hair or two between his eyes. He was in custody from Sept. 20 to the end of January. Was at the last Derby race. Saw the horse called Running Rein at Epsom, got down and looked at him; had no doubt that it was the same horse as I had seen in my paddock. Saw Mr. Higgins there; rode up to the course from the town with him. Also saw Mr. Goodman there. When the horse was at witness's he was in a paddock, and was a lively spirited horse. He had an accident, falling on himself between the knee and the arm of the rear leg. It would leave a scar. Could not be otherwise. The horse had the scar now. The flesh was lacerated a good deal. Had seen Higgins about him. He was christened at the house of witness. He was got by Gladiator, and at first he was to have been called Prince Fighter, but Lord Chesterfield had a horse of the same name. Higgins then looked in a book and proposed that he should be called Swartown—he found that name in a book (laughter); but he was afterwards called Macabehn.

Baron Alderson.—He did not find that name in a book; or at least in any book he was likely to look in, I suppose? (Much laughter.)

The witness was shortly cross-examined by Mr. Cockburn, but nothing material was elicited.

Mr. George Odell was next called, and examined by Mr. Martin.—I am a horse-dealer at Northampton. I know Henry Higgins and Mr. Worley, of Sewell. I recollect seeing a bay colt at Mr. Worley's early in October, 1841, and in November. Mr. Worley showed me the horse; he was a bay colt, a very good-looking one; he had black legs. He was fifteen hands high, well made, and a good-looking colt, with a good head, and rather strongly made in his hind parts. I went to Mr. Worley's several times subsequently and saw the colt almost every time that I went there. I saw a cut above the knee. I afterwards saw him at Northampton—at the Vase stables. Henry Higgins lodged there. The last time I saw him was as late as April. He was led about by Mr. Higgins's man, who is now dead. I know a paddock at Northampton of which Mr. Markhouse had the letting. Saw the colt there enter in the spring of the year 1843. He continued in this paddock until the latter end of the summer. He had a fresh accident there on the same leg, but a little lower down on the side of the knee. I was at Epsom at the last Derby; went with Mr. Worley there; saw the horse called Running Rein at Epsom. That was the same colt I had seen at Northampton. I will swear it. It had both the marks on the leg.

Mr. Baron Alderson.—Now, if we could see the horse, that would prove the case. Who keeps him away? It is quite childish to act in this manner.

Mr. Cockburn here rose, and said he had just received a note from Mr. Wood's solicitor, stating that that gentleman was now convinced that he had been deceived, and he (Mr. Wood) begged to assure the Court that he had not bought the horse until he had passed through what he thought a sufficient ordeal.

Mr. Baron Alderson.—No; there is nothing to show the contrary. The case was accordingly given up on behalf of the plaintiff, and the record withdrawn.

Mr. Cockburn wished to state that he had received a communication from Lord George Bentinck, couched in terms of perfect courtesy, and which were, indeed, perfectly unexceptionable in every point of view, in which his lordship complained that he (Mr. Cockburn) had not put him into the witness-box, and given him an opportunity of disproving the charges of tampering with some of the witnesses, and with feeling, clothing, and holding out pecuniary promises to them. He had made these charges in conformity with his instructions; and, although his lordship was not extensively a party to the case, he (Mr. Cockburn) had thought it better to open with these matters, than his learned friend, the Solicitor-General, might know the course he intended to take.

Mr. Baron Alderson did not think any explanation was necessary. He hoped learned counsel would always, without hesitation, in matters in which they were instructed, have no scruples in stating that which they deemed to be proper, however high in rank or station the persons may be upon whom they had to make these observations. This had been the practice and privilege of the bar from time immemorial, and God forbid that it should be otherwise now.

Mr. Cockburn said that it was only due to his lordship to say that he did not complain, but, on the contrary, expressed his high sense of the value of the privileges of the English bar.

Baron Alderson.—I am quite sure nothing has been said by you that could give ground for a charge of impropriety in the conduct of your case.

Mr. Wortley (learned counsel for Col. Peel, the Solicitor-General having left the court.) There is no complaint of the kind made by me, my lord.

Baron Alderson.—Oh, no; no ground for it. Lord George Bentinck was most anxious to work out the truth. Nothing more can be said.

Mr. Wortley.—No person feels more than Lord George Bentinck the value of the liberty of the English bar. I may add, however, that the fullest refutation would have been given to the instructions of my learned friend Mr. Cockburn, and to every insinuation that has gone forth to the prejudice of my noble friend, but for the abrupt termination of this trial. But for this circumstance, every charge, or supposed charge, even, against Lord George Bentinck, would have been fully and clearly contradicted.

Mr. Baron Alderson, addressing the jury, said—It is now my duty, gentlemen, to tell you that the verdict must be given for the defendant, and you will therefore proceed to give a verdict to that effect. I must tell you, gentlemen, that this case has produced in my mind a deep feeling of sorrow and disgust. Since the opening of the case a most atrocious fraud has been proved to have been practised, and I have seen with great regret gentlemen associating with persons much below themselves in station. If gentlemen would associate with gentlemen, we should have no such practices. But if gentlemen will condescend to associate with others below their station, they must expect to be cheated.

(The remarks of his lordship were delivered with much warmth, and in a most emphatic manner, and produced quite a sensation in the Court.)

The jury immediately returned a verdict for the defendant; and thus ended this case, so interesting and important to the sporting world at large, and which decides the Derby stakes.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.

HOUSE OF LORDS—TUESDAY.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS—THE QUEEN V. O'CONNELL AND OTHERS.

On Thursday their lordships met at ten o'clock, to hear the arguments of counsel in support of the writ, or rather writs of error, brought by Mr. O'Connell and the other transients against the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland.

Long before the time of their lordships meeting a great number of persons had assembled in the lobby of the house, anxious to obtain admission.

The following counsel appeared on behalf of the plaintiffs in error:—Sir Thomas Wilde, Mr. M. D. Hill, G. C., Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, G. C., Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Mr. Peacock, Mr. J. W. Smith, Mr. Lake, Mr. Chase, Sir Colman O'Loghlin, and Mr. Cranston.

Counsel for the Crown.—The Attorney-General (Sir W. Follett), the Solicitor-General (Sir F. Thesiger), the Attorney-General for Ireland (Mr. Smith), and Mr. Waddington.

There were a number of peers present, amongst whom we noticed all the law lords, who had a conversation together before business commenced. The following judges were in attendance:—Lord Chief Justice Denman, Lord Chief Justice Todd, Mr. Baron Parker, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Colman, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Maule.

When counsel had been called in.

The Lord Chancellor, addressing Sir Thomas Wilde, said—For whom, Sir Thomas, do you appear?

Sir Thomas Wilde.—I have the honour to appear, my lord, as counsel for Mr. Daniel O'Connell.

The Lord Chancellor.—Does any one appear with you for Mr. O'Connell?

Sir Thomas Wilde.—Yes, my lord; Mr. Peacock is with me; and I think it right to state to your lordships that as separate writs of error have been presented, all the defendants are represented by different counsel, in whom they place confidence. The writs contained many different points, and it was, therefore, arranged that each should be argued separately.

The Lord Chancellor.—Well, if that is so, I suppose when we come to the reply that you will reply on the whole case?

Sir Thomas Wilde.—No, my lord; I cannot undertake to promise that.

The Lord Chancellor.—Then we shall have at least three replies, and I wish you to recollect that the judges go the circuits on Wednesday next; and, therefore, if the arguments in this case are not finished before that day, it will be impossible for the house to give judgment this session. I make the remark (said his lordship) for the advantage of the plaintiffs in error. Had you not better (inquired his lordship) consult with the other counsel, and consider whether you should not reply on the whole case.

Sir Thomas Wilde.—I do not think, my lord, that it would be satisfactory to the transients, if their counsel had not separate replies.

After some further conversation, the Lord Chancellor said it would be better to discuss at another time whether or not the Attorney-General had a right to reply on the whole case.

Sir T. Wilde then said he had the honour to appear for Mr. O'Connell, in support of the writ of error, praying their lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland. Several errors had been assigned, all of which it would be his duty to call their lordships' attention to. The learned counsel then, at great length, stated the nature of the proceedings in Ireland, and, after remarking on the different meetings at which Mr. O'Connell and the other transients attended, said it had not been proved in evidence that the parties had conspired to meet for an illegal purpose, and that was necessary to support an indictment for conspiracy. Vast numbers of persons assembled at Epsom and Doncaster Races; but surely no charge of conspiracy could be substantiated.

The Lord Chancellor.—Sir Thomas Wilde, you are aware that the allegation in the indictment is, that the parties conspired for an unlawful purpose; that certainly was a question of law, for no acts of violence followed the meeting.

Sir Thomas Wilde said, he should contend that the meeting was not proved to be illegal.

The Lord Chancellor.—Suppose certain individuals agree to call together large assemblies of the people for the purpose of attempting to alter the Constitution as by law established, would not that be an illegal act? That was the question which the house had to decide.

Sir Thomas Wilde.—My lord, certainly that is the question, but he should contend that the party for whom he appeared had only exercised a constitutional right in calling meetings to petition Parliament for real or supposed grievances.

Lord Brougham.—Suppose half the people of England were to assemble at the instigation of a few individuals, say on Salisbury Plain, for the professed purpose of obtaining and demanding an alteration of the laws—would not such a meeting be considered dangerous and illegal?

The Lord Chancellor.—If parties said, let us assemble in such large numbers that the physical effect will be to obtain a change in the Constitution, would not that be illegal? The question was, whether the meetings and language used were unlawful.

Sir Thomas Wilde then proceeded with his address. He contended that if any conspiracy existed it was not sufficiently defined in the indictment to constitute a legal offence.

The learned gentleman concluded his argument at five minutes to five o'clock, and the further hearing of the argument was adjourned till Friday morning at ten o'clock.

FRIDAY.

Their lordships again assembled on Friday morning, at ten o'clock. The attendance of peers was much less numerous than on the previous day. The Law Lords and the Judges present were the same as those in attendance on Thursday.

At a few minutes after ten counsel were called in, and Mr. Peacock proceeded with his address on behalf of Mr. O'Connell.

When Mr. Peacock had concluded, Mr. M. D. Hill followed on behalf of Messrs. Steele and Barrett, and had not concluded when their lordships adjourned.

The further hearing of the argument was adjourned till next day.

FASHIONS FOR JULY.

(Abridged from "Devere's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.")

CHAPERON and CAPOTES, the close form still prevails here. Some have appeared a little shorter at the ears than they were early in the season. Trimming the interior of the brims with ribbon increases in vogue. Some are merely trimmed with a simple bouquet, composed of a spray of flowers or fruits; others with a mixture of satin and ribbon. Capotes of white gros de Naples, trimmed with moss roses or bouquets of Persian lilac, are very fashionable.

ROBES are still generally made in the pelisse form. The most favourite trimming is the Paspaletoe bynthe. The materials are muslins, balaisans, tulle, and other half-transparent materials, and silks, which present a beautiful and almost endless variety. Cambric or muslin robes, with the reverses in tulle, are setting into vogue. Coloured gros de Naples, and white tulle robes, with deep borders, are still in favour for evening dress.

ROCKERS are decidedly in the ascendant. Mantles are next in favour. The favourite materials are lace, and some caution, trimmed with lace. Embroidered muslin Cambrics are also in vogue. The Cambric Victoria is the most novel.

CAPE.—The moult form is still in favour. They are made shorter at the ears, and trimmed very lightly.

COIFURES of hair are not so much in vogue as usual. In fact, caps have nearly superseded them, and have placed them in a decided minority. Among the prettiest coiffures are those composed of equis of ribbon, which encircle the head and terminate in a knot, with long ends falling on one side.

FASHIONABLE COLOURS are the same as the last. White and green, however, are increasing in vogue.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Why should a man, whose blood is warm within
Not like his grandsons cut in slabs?
Sleep when he wakes, and creep into the jaws
By being young?

SHAKESPEARE.

Why, indeed, unless he cannot help himself, which was pretty much the condition of the metropolitan man of spirit and enterprise during the last fortnight. To practical downright sporting there has rarely been within the bills of mortality so dull a week as that now ended; in its theory, perhaps, there never was one so pregnant with interest and matter of account. On Monday last, in the Court of Exchequer, came on for settlement the issue which has lately paralysed with amazement and dread every member of the racing world. For that day the Running Rein case was set down; and at an early hour Mr. Cockburn rose for the purpose of opening it on the part of the plaintiff, Mr. Wood, owner of the celebrated horse that won the Derby. After hitting right and left at Lord George Bentinck, "according to his instructions," he proceeded to state that the question the jury were assembled to try was "whether the horse called Running Rein, was a colt foaled in 1841, whose sire was the Saddler, and whose dam was Mah." To prove this, he called no less than eighteen witnesses, several of whom swore point blank to the fact of the animal's identity, and subsequently passed through such an ordeal of cross-examination as would have horrified the echoes of the Old Bailey. Monday closed with the Solicitor-General's speech on the part of the defendant. Tuesday opened with the examination of a few most respectable persons for the defence, who most clearly and emphatically contradicted every assertion made by the witnesses of the previous day, and established the fact, past the possibility of doubt, that the horse which ran for, and won the Derby, as the three-year-old colt, Running Rein, by the Saddler, out of Mah, was a four-year-old called Macabehn, bred by Sir Charles Ishington, by Gladiator, out of his Capricorn mare. Previous to the proof, however, the learned judge, Mr. Baron Alderson, distinctly stated, that nothing would satisfy him but the production of Running Rein to the jury, a proposition with which on Monday the plaintiff's counsel appeared to acquiesce; but on the following morning they broadly stated it was not possible for that desire to be complied with, "inasmuch as the horse had been stolen out of his stable, and conveyed no one knew whither!" This clenched the case—one of the most infamous ever dared to be introduced into a British court of justice. The next of scoundrels by whom the fraud was concocted were associated together for the purpose—the systematic purpose—of running horses older than the age specified for the events they engaged them in. This they did last year at the Epsom Spring Meeting, where they ran Goose-Away, an Irish four-year-old, hatched of Mr. Ferguson, as the identical Sonnet Pure, Macabehn, at three-year-old weights. They will be forthwith indicted for conspiracy, and the public will see with astonishment the name of at least one seemingly respectable tradesman of London, a man of substance and credit, included in the list of vagabonds, "Auri sacra fames!"

What indeed will you not induce men to perpetrate?

The great hunt at Cricket, Kent against England, commenced on Monday, at Lord's, and terminated on Wednesday, after the players' imminent risk of being drowned on the spot, on the first day; a water-sport took it into its head to burst over the ground just in the nick of the fun—when everybody was there. Such a catastrophe has not been witnessed since the days of Deuclion. The score terminated with 172 for Kent, and 136 for England. The science displayed was a theme of general enquiry. There was a little more cricket during the week, and a little boat-racing at Epsom, but neither of a character to call for details of them.

Thursday being the first public day at Tattersall's since the verdict in favour of Orford for the Derby, the Subscription-room was better attended than it has been on a Thursday since Epsom Races. There was little, if any, business done, the matter of interest being the announcement by the Stewards of the Jockey Club, that the Derby settling is fixed for Monday next. It will be far from a good one. The partial settling pending the trial was a most inconvenient proceeding. Already its effects have been felt. On Monday next more than one crash is likely to come off it.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The all-absorbing Running Rein case being set down for trial this day, the attendance at the Corner was confined to the select few who were unable to obtain admission into the Court of Exchequer. Reports of the progress of the plaintiff's case were received in the course of the afternoon, and up to a certain point it bore so favourable an aspect, that 3 to 1 on Orford was the highest offer; the trainer's evidence, however, was so complete a break-down, that 4 and 5 to 1 were afterwards laid, and the Orford party evidently looked it "a certainty." On the Goodwood events, the St. Leger, and the Derby of 1845, some betting took place, at the following averages:—

GOODWOOD STAKES.
10 to 1 agst Red Deer	20 to 1 agst Franchise (1)	20 to 1 agst Partisan
10 to 1 — Crown Oil (1)	20 to 1 — The Curlew	20 to 1 — Pride of Killarney

20 to 1 — Seaman	50 to 1 — Minkin (1)	50 to 1 — Young Eclipse (1)

Thursday.—The "Ring" rapidly recovering from the damps thrown upon it by the Running Rein conspiracy; not even the strong observations made by Baron Alderson, in his summing up, having had the effect of preventing that association of the great and small, without which, betting round would soon die a natural death. In proof of this, the room was well attended to-day, and although the Epsom settling has yet to take place, business to a considerable amount was transacted on all the great stakes now in the market, the St. Leger, in the amount and importance of the investment, taking a decided lead. Before we give the prices, we should state, with reference to the late trial, that the members of the Jockey Club, and others interested in the respectability and process of the turf, intend to show their sense of the great service Lord G. Bentinck has rendered it, by detecting, exposing, and defeating the most disgraceful fraud ever attempted, by presenting him with a piece of plate. The subscription, which is limited to £25, and open to all, already amounts to some hundreds, and will, we doubt not, be worthy the occasion.

GRAND FOOT RACE.—The great foot-race between William Jackson, the American Deer, and Thomas Marfield, the North Star, which has created much speculation of late in the pedestrian circles, came off on Monday, in the grounds of the Rosemary Branch Tavern, Perkhams. The match was for £20 a side; the ground selected these roles. Betting was 5 to 4 on the American Deer. The men were prepared for the race when "the pitiless pelting of the storm" induced them to defer it until the rain somewhat abated. The Deer was easily

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The salmon fisheries in Scotland and in the North of England, this season, are unusually full of fish, large quantities of which have, during the last fortnight, been taken, as may be inferred from the fact that in the markets fine large salmon are selling at the reasonable price of 2s. and 3s. per lb., and salmon trout as low as 4d. and 4½d. per lb. of 14 ounces.

Macready, who has of late been playing at New York to good success, is expected to return home either at the end of the present month or early in August, after an absence of about 12 months.

The clear profit of the late ball given for the benefit of the Polish refugees, after payment of all expenses, exceeded one thousand pounds. Last year the ball at Willis's for the same purpose, produced about £600 only.

On Tuesday afternoon, about three o'clock, the low neighbourhoods on the banks of the Thames were completely inundated by the overflow of the tide, which was unusually high. The cellars and kitchens in Bank-side, Tuckey-street, and Wapping, were completely filled, and furniture washed about in all directions.

It is stated that in consequence of the alteration required in the business of the Bank by the new Charter, no less than 93 additional clerks will have to be taken on.

The Orleans Railroad Company is establishing the electrical telegraph between the passengers' station at Paris and the warehouse for goods and the workshops at Ivry.

Lyons and its environs were visited, in the night of the 24th, by a storm of extraordinary violence; the rain fell in torrents, and the hail was so large that in several houses nearly all the windows were broken. In and near the Palace of Loux XVIII. several trees were broken, and more than three hundred birds, which were killed by the hail, were found on the ground the next morning.

Russia has acknowledged the representative regimen established in Greece. The greater part of the Hellenic papers highly commend this step.

News has been received at Trieste, from Corfu, that 40 Italian refugees, among whom were D. Moro and the brothers Staniera, naval officers embarked in the night of the 12th ult., in a Neapolitan or Roman vessel, with the intent of landing on some point on the coast of Italy. It was believed that they had steered their course towards the coast of Calabria. Subsequent accounts state that the insurgents had been attacked and defeated, and that the insurrection is at an end.

The annual distribution of prizes to the students of the East India Company's College at Haileybury was attended as usual by a deputation from the Court of Directors.

Operations for sinking a new colliery at Srahams Park, by a wealthy company, on the estate of the Marquis of Londonderry, have been commenced. This colliery will be an extensive one, and should it be successfully won, will probably be one of the most important and profitable in the county of Durham.

The number of persons embarking and disembarking at Boulogne and Calais, from and for England, during the week ending the 27th of June, was—At Boulogne, 2189; at Calais, 409; total, 2598. The number at Boulogne, during the corresponding period of last year, was 1925; thus showing an increase this year of 674.

Wednesday's sale of the Duke of Sussex's library was highly interesting, and was numerously attended. The great attraction of the day was the splendid "Bible Sacra Latina," two vols. folio, called the Marzari copy, from first having been discovered in Cardinal Marzari's library, by the eminent biographer Dehane. It is the first edition of the Holy Scriptures, and the first book executed by the inventor of printing in movable metallic types, at Mainz, by Gutenberg and Faust, in 1455-56. After much spirited bidding it was knocked down to Mr. Leslie, for £190.

FINE ARTS—THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

THE WHISTONIAN CONTROVERSY. FROM A PICTURE BY MULREADY, R.A., IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

To quote ourselves, this is "one of the most beautiful cabinet pictures ever painted: it has all the finish of Teniers, is full of character, and perfect in the details, as well as the general treatment." It is a masterly illustration of Goldsmith's exquisite "Vicar of Wakefield," representing the famous dispute on Monogamy, in Chap. II., or Whiston's tenet, that it was unlawful for a priest of the Church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second. The disputants are the Vicar and his friend, a rosy-gilled, portly parson of the old school, Mr. Wilmot, whose daughter, Arabella, the Vicar's son is about to marry. It will be recollected that the Vicar having completed a tract on his favourite subject of dispute, which he looked upon as a masterpiece, both for argument and style, he could not, in the pride of his heart, avoid showing it to his old friend, Mr. Wilmot, as he made no doubt of receiving his approbation; but not till too late he discovered that he was most violently attached to the contrary opinion, and with good reason; for he was at that time actually courting a fourth wife. This, as may be expected, produced a dispute, attended with some acrimony, which threatened to interrupt the intended alliance; but on the day before that appointed for the ceremony, the Vicar and Mr. Wilmot agreed to discuss the subject at large. Who can forget the admirable description of the contest?—"It was managed with proper spirit on both sides. He asserted that I was heterodox, I retorted the charge; he replied, and I rejoined." The picture represents the moment, "when the controversy was hottest." Just as the Vicar is about to be called out by one of his relations, who advises him to give up the dispute—at least till his son's wedding is over. Then the sequel:—"How," cried I, "relinquish the cause of truth, and let him be a husband, already driven to the very verge of absurdity. You might as well advise me to give up my fortune as my argument." "Your fortune," returned my friend, "I am sorry to inform you, is almost nothing. The merchant in town, in whose hands your money was lodged, has gone off, to avoid a statute of bankruptcy, and is thought not to have left a shilling in the pound. I was unwilling to shock you or the family with the account till after the wedding; but now it may serve to moderate your warmth in the argument; for I suppose your own prudence will enforce the necessity of dissembling, at least till your son has the young lady's fortune secure." "Well," returned I, "if what you tell me be true, and if I am to be a beggar, it shall never make me a rascal, or induce me to disavow my principles. I'll go this moment and inform the company of my circumstances; and as for the argument, I even here retract

"THE HELLESPONT."

This almost Lilliputian specimen of naval architecture has already been noticed in our journal. It is now lying in St. Katherine's Docks, where its diminutive proportions are very attractive. It is entirely without paint, but has a very gay appearance, as if constructed of satin-wood and mahogany. It has lately arrived from the Bermudas, and is said to be the smallest vessel that has ever performed such a voyage; being only 40 tons burden, and is exceeded in size by many of our Thames barges.

The principal employment of the Bermudians, by the way, is building vessels, which are generally small, swift, and very durable, being constructed of cedar; they are likewise noted for their graceful little boats; and on Ireland Island large sums have been expended, in order to render it a strong port for a naval and military depot. Their fame for building vessels is of some antiquity; for when Sir George Somers was driven upon the Bermudas, in 1609, on his voyage to Virginia, he and his party made their way thence to their original destination in two small cedar-built vessels, constructed by his men; and that in which Sir George embarked, did not contain an ounce of iron, except one bolt in the keel.

THE BANK CHARTER.

As the different enactments of the Bank Charter Bill come into operation at different periods, we think we shall render a useful service to our readers by specifying the date of the commencement of the operation of each enactment.

1. The division of the departments of the Bank of England takes place "upon the 31st day of August, 1844."
2. All persons may demand notes for gold at £3 17s. 9d. per ounce, "from and after the 31st of August, 1844."
3. Bank of England exempt from stamp duty "from and after 31st August, 1844;" Bank to allow £100,000 per annum, from the same date.
4. No new bank of issue to be allowed "from and after the passing of this act."
5. Existing banks of issue to give notice to the commissioners of stamps and taxes of their claim to issue to the extent of their average issue during the 12 weeks preceding the 27th April—such notice to be given "within one month next after the passing of this act."
6. No bank to issue upon an average of four weeks a higher amount than that allowed by the commissioners "after the 10th day of October, 1844."
7. A return of the name of every bank, and of every partner in each banking firm or company, shall be made to the commissioners of stamps and taxes "on the 1st day of January in each year, or within 15 days thereafter."
8. The agreements that have been made between the Bank of England and the bankers named in schedule C shall cease and determine "on the 31st day of December next."
9. The compensation of one per cent. to such banks shall cease "on the 1st day of August, 1845."
10. Any banking company in London, or within 65 miles thereof, though the number of partners exceed six, may draw, accept, or indorse bills of exchange "from and after the passing of this act."
11. The exclusive privileges of the Bank of England shall continue until the expiration of "12 months' notice, to be given after the 1st day of August, 1855."

ANTI-GRAHAM WAFERS.

(From Punch.)

DEDICATED TO THE HOME SECRETARY, AND POLITELY PRESENTED TO HIM BY THOMAS SLINGSBY DUNCOMBE, ESQ., M.P.

We have published this day, at our office, price—but we will not appeal to the credulity of our readers—a sheet of embellished devices, with mottos, for Sir James Fouché Graham, which, from the peculiar appropriateness of their screen, backed by the extraordinary adhesiveness of their gum, are adapted to stick to the Home Secretary for life.

We have also just dotted off a good stinging envelope, which we intend to hold up as a mirror to Sir James Fouché Graham's very bad nature.

- The following are some of the devices and mottos:—
- | DEVICE.                        | MOTTO.  |
|--------------------------------|---|
| A blunderbus on full cock..... | I hope the contents will reach you.           |
| A black lobster.....           | Not to be red without getting into hot water. |
| A mangle.....                  | I trust this will come to hand.               |
| A clenched fist.....           | Should this meet your eye.                    |
| A bee.....                     | Touch my wax, you'll feel my sting.           |
| A soda-water bottle.....       | If opened, a noise will follow.               |
| Grocodile with mouth open..... | You're welcome to the inside.                 |
| A fox.....                     | You'll be run down, if you break cover.       |

CHINESE WATER-BRAVE.

A very interesting item has just been added to the popular "Chinese Collection," at Hyde-park Corner. It has been received direct from China, and is a "Water-brave," with all his warlike accoutrements, and is believed to be the only specimen of the kind ever brought to England. The Water-brave is a soldier mounted upon a large hollow body, and armed with a trident weapon, &c., a fit antagonist, it was thought, before the late encounter, to cope with British seamen; but, by this time, we suspect the Chinamen must be satisfied of their sorry contrivance to withstand those who are accustomed to "rule the waves;" whilst it is altogether unworthy of a people who have been the authors of three of the most important inventions or discoveries of modern times—the art of printing, the composition of gunpowder, and the magnetic compass. Nevertheless, it has been suggested that the "Water-brave" might be more advantageously employed in the peaceful pursuit of lake fishing.

It should be explained that the "horse" whereon "the brave" rides is made of pig-skin blown into shape; he bears a match-lock pistol, and upon the trident are iron rings, which he shakes to intimidate "the barbarians." The costume is the ordinary Chinese dress, the trousers being tucked up.

"YOU SEE THE SLENDER SPIRE THAT PEERS."

A Ballad.

THE POETRY BY DOUGLAS THOMPSON, ESQ.

THE MUSIC BY EDWARD J. LODER, ESQ.

You see the slen-der spire that peers A-bove the trees that skirt the stream; 'Twas there I pass'd those ear-ly years Which now seem like some hap-py dream. You see the vale that bounds the view; 'Twas there my fa-ther's man-sion stood, Be-fore the grove whose va-ried hue is

NEW MUSIC.

THE SEAMAN'S BRIDE; the words by Mr. THOMAS FRICKER, the music by HENRY FARMER. J. Williams, Chesham.

The melody of this song is not very remarkable, except in a passage where the words "mirth and gloe" and "boundless sea" are saddened and confined by an union with a needless and unnecessary minor phrase. The progressions and harmonies at bars 1 and 2, page 3 (and repeated in the second verse), are against all rule. The second portion, or half, of bar 1, ought to be the harmony of 6-4, and the consecration of the fifth between it and bar 2 on the same page is intolerable. By some mistake the authorship of this ballad was, in our last, confounded with that of "The Sailor's Bride;" the notice, however, had nothing to do with the error.

THE GIPSY CHILD. Ballad. The Words by H. LOVELL, Esq. The Music by N. J. SPORLE. Williams and Son, Chesham.

A pretty flowing melody in design, but faulty in execution: the harmonies (?) which occur in each verse at the words "Gipsy child" are not only wrong but intolerable.

LA MOSCOVIE. Quadrille Nouveau, composé et dédié à Miss Woodhead par Elise Launiz. J. Williams, Chesham.

A quadrille nouveau would certainly be a novelty in these days; in the present production we can see nothing but that grace and (for this style of music) correctness which belong to fifty thousand other productions of a similar kind.

THE BEAUTIES OF THE OPERA. Part I. "La Giselle." London: D. Bogue.

This is an interesting and curious publication. It contains an outline memoir of that charming danseuse Carlotta Grisi, and a poetically written description of the Ballet of "Giselle." It is, to use its own words, a feuilleton, in which "engraving comes to illustrate the text, and the text the engraving." There is a portrait in this number of Grisi (which alone would recommend it to all persons of taste), besides a number of wood-cut illustrations of the ballet, executed in a first-rate style of art. We would advise, however, the author of the highly-wrought descriptive narrative to restrain his muse a little. The "Advertisement" which comes at the end of the "libretto," would have rendered Nat. Lee ten times more mad than he ever was, could he have lived to read it. What does the author mean by "the golden or silver notes of a male or female singer?" We confess ourselves to be at a loss!

I COME TO SCENES OF EARLY DAYS; ballad. Written by J. A. PAGE, Esq.; composed by F. H. S. PENDLETON. Smith, Liverpool.

There is a pretty sentiment in the words of this ballad, which has been rather well expressed. Bars two and three of the symphony might have contained a better figure with more correct harmony, namely, had the bass been a third higher. The composer should not have made a trisyllable of the word "alter'd." The progression at bars twelve and sixteen of the melody is not good, but altogether it is a pleasing composition.

PAULINE POLKA. Composed by A. DE LENDONCOURT. Mrs. James Rae, Berners-street.

It is said that "La Polka" has been introduced to the weather-cock Parisiana by a certain Maitre de danse politique, on the same principle that Napoleon ordered the dome of the Invalides to be gilt, namely, to make the vane of the French mind veer from something "grave to gay." He that as it may over the water, the serious heads of Englishmen have been turned by this dance. The music to this Polka is another of the eternal "ringing the changes" on a few chords, which, if it had no ancestor or rival, might claim some notice for melody and grace.

VALSES ROYALES D'ANGLETERRE. For the piano-forte. Composed by EDWARD PAGE. Jefferys and Co., Fifth-street, Soho.

This collection consists of fifty-five waltzes, besides introductions and codas, in eleven books, which occupy close upon one hundred pages! Mr. Page must have an imperfect notion of the value of our paper or space, to think we could give a distinct notice of each particular value. We, however, have looked them all over (not overlooked them), and found many passages of grace and beauty constructed upon the Strauss and Lanner models. Thirteen more books of waltzes are promised on a similarly extensive scale! We suspect this is a national rising on their part against the recent and successful invasion of the Polkas. But the Valse, after all, is no more English than the Polka. In truth, Mr. Page is an inexhaustible writer in this style of composition; he is the Lopez de Vega of valse libretti.

SONGS FOR THE NURSERY. Nos. 1 to 7. Composed by Miss BROCKNER. Willis and Co., Lower Grosvenor-street.

We do not much incline to Nursery Rhymes, or Stories, but we must congratulate the fair composer on having introduced some simple and pleasing music into that hitherto squalling locality. No. 2 ("The Lullaby") is extremely sweet and soft. No. 3 ("The Witches") is good, but above the comprehension of a "babby." No. 4 ("Hark! the Dogs") contains a spicy bit of satire at the close (clothes?). No. 5 ("The North Wind") is extremely pretty and affectionate. No. 6 we do not like, as it familiarises Cockney pronunciation in his rhymes, and No. 7 is inferior to the old song of "Who killed Poor Robin?" but altogether, although we do not like to see purities coupled with any Art, Miss Brockner has produced a series of melodies and arrangements which even adult musicians may approve.

THE DEATH OF ABEL. An Oratorio composed by GEORGE PERRY, the words from the Scriptures and Gesner's Poem. Lee, Albemarle-street.

To write or invent an oratorio is about the most serious task or undertaking for which a composer can possibly prepare his genius. The requisites for such a performance are many and various. In the first place, he must have a deep and poetical sense of the matter or subject he takes in hand—his judicious taste in the first instance must have selected, and in the second, his genius and learning must attire it in appropriate musical costume. How often have we seen the most sacred themes dressed up in the garb of orchestral buffoonery on one hand, and on the other, crowded into monkish and unamiable severity by a love for obscurity and ignorance! The real treatment, like Truth, lies between—and though we have often heard cathedral music highly, nay, as solemnly effective on the stage as in the church, when descriptive of some holy ceremony, we have, as contrast, listened in the face to sounds as profane as we ever heard in a vau-deville theatre. The mighty Handel seems to be the only one deeply imbued with the awful sacredness of his themes.

The subject of the present oratorio is judiciously chosen: "The Death of Abel," the first tragedy of the earth—the scene in which it is laid—its dramatic personae and time of action, could not fail to suggest to a composer's mind some noble thoughts, and Mr. Perry has caught the inspiration of his theme most happily in many instances, and poetically as well as musically (two terms which should never be apart) bodied it forth. Leah's invocation to Cain is full of tenderness and simple beauty. The doctro between the brothers, "I tremble," has much of the Handelian strength about it, and the quartetto, "O praise the Lord," is very graceful and smooth. The recitatives are highly expressive and well and characteristically accompanied. The choruses exhibit the contrapuntal knowledge of a maestro, although perhaps the fulness of their parts is not continuous enough throughout. Handel could embroider on the same ground a hundred times over without concealing or disfiguring his first pattern. With this objection, they are well constructed. The figure "For who has any strength," is very excellent—the double augmentation at pages 92, 93, is highly effective. The concluding chorus, also, "The Voice of the Lord," is admirably worked up: in fact, the only fault we find with our countryman's work (of which we should be proud) is the too frequent iteration of a vocal phrase by the orchestra. This may be unheeded for a time, but once it lays hold of your attention, it becomes exasperating to an intolerable degree. Half of those instrumental echoes might be omitted without injury to the sense or rhythm, but, on the contrary, with great benefit to the general effect of this truly talented composition. We advise all lovers of good music to hear it the next time it is performed at Exeter Hall.

MODEL OF VENICE.—A concert will be given on Monday, at her Majesty's Theatre, for the benefit of the proprietors of the Model of Venice, the impetuosity of which has hitherto been but too differently recognised by the public. For the above occasion, Mr. Lancelotti has liberally granted the free use of the orchestra-room, and the most distinguished artists of the establishment have, in like manner, accorded their elegant services gratuitously.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Tuesday night, Moriani made his second appearance, and met with increased success in the part of Edgar, in Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor." On Wednesday he sang at the Palace, and enchanted the ears of royalty.

On Thursday (for the benefit of Grisi), the opera of "Otello" was produced, with a cast which was never before equalled. Grisi, as Desdemona, Mario as the Moor, Fornasari as Iago, Correlli in the hitherto neglected part of Roderigo, and the mighty Lablache as Elmoro.

The opera of "Otello" is one of Rossini's noblest conceptions; it abounds with musical science, mixed with poetical feeling, and perhaps was never so magnificently represented as on Thursday last. All the prominent beauties of the opera came out magnificently; the trio, "Ti parla l'amore" was beautifully sung by Grisi, Correlli, and Lablache. The quartetto leading into the finale of the first act was all that the sweetest ear could exact. Mario was delightful in Otello; he was perhaps a little more like Romeo than the Moor, but he was, notwithstanding, very delightful.

Moriani again appeared in a portion of the "Lucia di Lammermoor," and, relieved in some degree from his hoarseness, delighted the house once more.

We cannot say more than we have already said about the superlative excellence of the ballet department.

HERR DÖHLER.—This magician without magic, this modern Brazilian, took his leave of London, for the present season, on Monday last.

THE MARKETS.

MARK LANE. Friday.—Since Monday we have received a full average time-of-year supply of English wheat, the quantity of which on offer to-day was tolerably good. Although the abundance of harvest was somewhat voracious, the demand was on a very stagnant state, and prices had a downward tendency. Foreign wheat was unobtrusive, and not to have been purchased on easier terms. For all descriptions of spring corn, the supplies of which were by no means large, we had a very full sale, and in almost every instance the current rates were somewhat raised.

THE SUFFOLK FIRES.

WHATEVER may be hereafter discovered to be the cause of the evil, it is certain that the crime of incendiarism still prevails among the peasantry of the agricultural district of England that lies almost the nearest to the largest and wealthiest city of the world. When it first exhibited itself, it was thought to be the outbreak of political feeling; but that opinion has long been abandoned as untenable; the excitement of the two years preceding the Reform struggle has long since passed away; the farm labourers are now far more anxious to obtain Bread than the Franchise, and more desirous of escaping the inside of the Union-house than gaining the privilege of entering the Polling-booth. But still the dreadful symptom continues; of that there has been no abatement; and while it does continue there can be no doubt of the existence of a fearful mass of discontent and suffering, goading on to crime. The worst of the evil is, that what are the faults of a system are revenged as if they were the acts of individuals: laws oppress or produce oppression, and the result is only seen in the blazing stacks and barns of individuals, most of whom had but little share in making the laws, and are compelled by position to be the instruments for carrying them out. It is a hard case, certainly, when the law thrusts on a man an office that exposes him to the hatred of those he dwells among, and who wreak their hatred by that revenge which has been called a sort of "wild justice," and is certainly as blind and indiscriminating as the more legitimate Justice of mankind is represented to be. We perceive by the reports from the seat of agricultural discontent, that a large number of the fires have occurred on the property of farmers and gentlemen holding the office of Poor-law Guardians, and as to many of whom, it is stated distinctly that they are kind-hearted men and good masters, giving as much employment and as high wages as any persons in their neighbourhood. But they are the officers of a bad law, and that neutralises all estimable personal qualities.

We are beginning, thanks to the exertions of the Press, to get a clearer idea of the causes of this unhealthy and deplorable state of things, and in acknowledging its efforts, we cannot take a fitter opportunity of giving a short estimate of the immense advantages we possess in an engine of inquiry that combines close investigation of causes with the power of spreading far and wide the results it arrives at. It is only by the union of the two powers that opinion can be created.

But when we consider the number of abuses exposed, and of evils detected by the influence of the press, one gloomy reflection at least comes over us—how many more abuses—how many more evils—grew, flourished, and oppressed mankind, when that power did not exist—and long after it existed, indeed—but when it was monopolised by learning, and not yet applied to the affairs of daily life?

The time when it was so applied can be scarcely fixed; the power developed itself gradually; its capabilities were not at first perceived, nor could the eyes of men recognise the forest that was hidden in the cup of the acorn. But as soon as men do feel its vast powers, and put them in operation, the disappearance of the mists of night before the beams of the morning sun is scarcely less rapid and not more complete than the vanishing of the tyrannies and oppressions of the earth before the increase of information and discussion. A slight glance at the past and the present will be enough to satisfy the reader of the justice of the assertion.

The modern press disseminates facts, which are events, and promulgates opinions, generally conclusions, of which those events are the premises, or comments on the public conduct of the public men by whom those events were influenced. Where every reader is more or less of a critic, and has access to more sources of information than one, the facts must be correctly stated and the conclusions drawn rationally, or at least with a show of reason; errors and mistakes are unavoidable, and there is occasionally some allowance to be made for the colouring given by party feeling, but wilful perversions of fact are, we believe, in the respectable portion of the press, both daily and weekly, of rare occurrence.

Under a despotic government such an engine could not exist; the system of Russia, for instance, is one of utter secrecy; it is not allowed even to circulate the intelligence of ordinary events. The most dreadful calamities may occur, attended with great loss of life, but they would scarcely be heard of beyond the immediate spot where they occurred. The Marquis de Custine states that at one of the grand fêtes of the Emperor, a large number of peasants were drowned in crossing a lake, almost in sight of the revellers, but it was forbidden to converse about it! What a strange proceeding would a coroner's inquest appear to those brought up under such a system!

The Imperial power being there considered all-sufficient for the remedy of evils and disasters, it is deemed superfluous for the people to know anything of the affairs of the community. Here we see the exact reverse of this state of things; the "ordinary channels of information," as they are called in Parliamentary language, are often so much better instructed than the Government, that the Executive is compelled to adopt a line of action by the force of that public opinion which has been created by the Journalist. When the riots of "Rebecca" first startled the country, they seemed inexplicable to that great mass of Englishmen who know about as much of the state of South Wales as they do of Tartary. The revelations of the Times in some degree explained the matter, and proved that the Welch farmers had really something to complain of. The result, after months of riot and tumult, was a Commission of Inquiry, and we have just had brought into the House of Commons, a bill to consolidate the different Turnpike Trusts of South Wales, and place them under a control that will prevent both the abuses of the local boards and the discontent they occasioned. We have another instance of the salutary power of the press in the exertions of the same paper with respect to the state of the peasantry of Suffolk and the eastern part of England. There was a general idea as to the cause of these fires, that they were the reckless acts of ignorance driven wild by want. But we have now a clearer notion of the matter, and it has at least been proved that in one point the new Poor-law has been strained beyond its intention, and used illegally and oppressively. Those labourers who refused to accept work at any price an employer chose to offer—in many cases too little to support life—were refused relief at the poor-house because they could not produce a ticket signed by these employers, on the production of which the relief depended. Sir J. Graham has in his place in Parliament declared this practice illegal, and we have no doubt steps will be taken to suppress it. Here is one good result, the forerunner we hope of others, which will testify as this has done to the good effect of "inquiry." More attention than usual has been this week turned to these statements, by a very extraordinary explosion of feeling from a peer—Lord Wodehouse—in the Lords, on Monday evening. He declared that all the statements were calumnies, and sneered somewhat at "gentlemen of the press—as they call themselves." Yet the correspondent of the Times did no more than make known the mournful fact that a kind disposition and all the qualities of a good master give no exemption from the ravages of the midnight fire-raiser; the inquiry, as far as the Times was concerned, had closed, but in consequence of Lord Wodehouse's rather intemperate attack the public is to have, it seems, a special report on that district with which his lordship is more particularly connected.

THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO GIVING AUDIENCE.

THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO.

Here, reader, you have a portraiture—the vera effigies—of the potentate who has just become embroiled with his French neighbours, but who, according to the latest letters from Gibraltar, is ready to grant the satisfaction demanded by France, and to punish as traitors those chiefs who, without his permission, have improperly attacked the French on the frontiers. However this may be, it will be interesting to glance at the personal character of the Emperor, or Sultan, as he is styled by travellers, upon whose conduct in this affair probably rests, in some degree, the peace of Europe.

Muley Abderrahman, then, the Emperor, is between fifty and sixty years of age, robust, and of active habit, but of brutal and cruel character, whilst he possesses a more despotic power than any other even of Mahometan potentates. He is not even held in check by a mull, an uléma, or even a council or divan. He is supposed to possess a divine character, and to be superior to all law.

Yet, this monarch must pay respect to long-established usages and institutions; must not invade the domestic privacy of any of his subjects; and must even give public audience four times a week to administer justice to all who may appeal to him from the civil, or local governor. On these occasions he appears on horseback, in the superb state shown in our engraving, in an open interior court of the palace. He is mounted on a snow-white steed, which, with arched crest and measured steps, is moving majestically under his Moorish burden. The colour of the horse is supposed to indicate his Sublime Highness's humour; for white is the symbol of peace and goodwill; black, that of hatred and war; chestnut, that of displeasure, &c. The bridle and head-trappings are superb, being of green silk richly embroidered in gold, wherein is portrayed the sacred emblem of Solomon's seal; and in the hollow of the neck is a small pouch of scarlet leather, wherein is held a portion of the earth of the holy Dreer's tomb; and by its side, in strange conjunction, the polished tooth of some enormous boar, an infallible remedy against the evil eye. The saddle, which reposes on a housing of orange damask, is quilted in green, having a pommel and girths of the stoutest silk, interwoven with gold thread. The ample stirrups are of massive gold, beautifully chased.

The Sultan's simple dress forms a striking contrast with the richness of his horse-furniture. He wears a caftan of white kerseymer, with the Moorish grille of white leather, embroidered with pale blue silk, fastened by a plain silver buckle. A muslin turban with the silk tuft of royalty, crowns his Imperial head; and over this hangs gracefully, in full broad folds, a transparent hank of the finest fabric of Fax. His legs are equipped in hanks of white morocco leather, curiously worked in devices with silk thread. Above his head is borne a very large umbrella, which is in Morocco to this day the ensign of royalty, and still continues to be in various nations of the East. The suitors prostrate themselves on the ground, and the entire scene of barbaric state is accurately shown in our illustration.

The Sultan's favourite mode of gaining the objects of his ambition is by poison. It appears that he poisoned Solomon Abderrahman, his predecessor and cousin; and a letter from Tangier, published in the Albion, states that since the accession of the present Emperor to the throne of Morocco, he has before his eyes the crime by which he ascended it. The fear of poison incessantly presents itself to his imagination. No one can approach him except his son; he alone is permitted to serve him, and he must first taste each dish. Sidi Mohammed, the Sultan's eldest son, was for some time the guardian of his father, but it is now his youngest son, Moulay Ali, who fills that office. These two sons are born of the same mother, an Englishwoman, called in the language of the country Rahmouna. Sidi Mohammed, the presumptive heir to the throne, is a man of about 35 years of age. His blue eyes and fair hair betray his semi-Britannic origin. He replaces his father on all important occasions. It is said that he commanded the Moroccan troops at the battle of Lalla Magranya on the 30th of May. He had for a long time maintained a direct communication with Abd-el-Kader, whom he encouraged in his resistance to the French. The Moroccans assert that but for him the ex-Emir would have made his submission several years since. Every time that a letter arrived in Abd-el-Kader's camp from the Prince of Morocco it gave rise to great rejoicings.

We may here mention two interesting works in connexion with the present position of France and Morocco, which have just been issued. These are a reprint of Mr. Hay's very interesting account of Western Barbary, in Murray's "Colonial and Home Library;" and a Map of the North Coast of Africa, including Morocco and Algeria, with the Coast of France and Spain. In the latter, the publisher, Mr. Widd, her Majesty's Geographer, has shown his customary accuracy and well-timed activity.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, July 9.

SPAIN.
The ultimatum of the Emperor of Morocco, refusing the mediation of England in his dispute with Spain, reached Barcelona on the 27th ult., and caused a great sensation; a Council of Ministers was immediately held, and the most vigorous measures decided on. Amongst others, orders were given for the Sultan to follow the Isabella war steamer to the coast of Africa. On the 7th of July the five Ministers who had come to Barcelona left for Madrid. General Narvaez remained with the Queen. It was reported that General Narvaez was to replace Narvaez as Minister of War, and that General Ossa was to be the new Captain-General of Madrid. The tone of the Madrid press on the Moroccan affair is truly ridiculous. The Cadiz says it is announced that "this Captain of Castile should venture to be insolent towards the nation which for so many years dictated laws to the whole world, and which, whatever may be its present state, has sixteen millions of inhabitants, and, in the late war, humiliated the hitherto unconquered eagles of the first captains of the age." The Acto de Comercio is more reasonable; it asks how the money is to be found for the expenses of the war? This pertinent question the Ministers will find it difficult to answer, for a country whose finances are in such a state that to avoid the immediate payment of some of its most pressing debts the Government agrees to give 1000 marks in stock for every 300 marks of debt, should only think of war as a last resource. I may as well here give you a few of the articles for the reorganization of the public finance promulgated by royal decree on the 25th of June, at Barcelona.
"Article 1. The credits arising from advances to the Government shall be converted into 3 per cent. bonds, at the rate of 1000 marks of stock for every 300 marks recovered by the treasury. An account shall be made up to the 30th of June, of all interests due, which interest shall be added to the capital. Article 2. The drafts drawn upon the receivers of revenues beyond sea, the floating centralised debt, and bills special in virtue of the law of 25th of March, 1842, are not comprised in this decree. Article 3. In case any of the parties interested in the contracts mentioned in Article 1 shall refuse to accept this conversion, they shall wait till the Government shall have had the matter before the Cortes, and the Cortes shall have regulated the means of repaying them their advances. Article 4. The sinking fund shall immediately prepare certificates transferable to bearer for 3 per cent. stock to be applied for this conversion. This stock shall bear interest from the 1st of July next, whatever may be the date at which they shall be delivered to the parties interested." Articles 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 merely regulate the mode of conversion. Article 11 says, "At the next session the Government shall submit the provisions of the present decree to the Cortes."

The interior of the country is, to outward appearance, tranquil, but I am most confidently informed that vast conspiracies are afoot, and that at the head of an Espartero insurrection are to be found such men as Colonel Prieto and Mendiracul. The Catalans are also actively at work—their agents overrun the mountains of Catalonia, and the whole of La Mancha. The health of Isabella is far from being satisfactory, and although not in immediate danger, great fears are entertained that at no very distant period she must retire from public life.

ITALY.

A letter from Smyrna of the 9th says, "that the Italian refugees had succeeded in engaging in their revolutionary plans a certain number of Austrian seamen, and even the son of Admiral Banchini and a son of Admiral Pasquini, and some officers. Their design was to seize on the Austrian cruises and some of Lloyd's steamers, and with them to put into the ports of the Adriatic and of the Mediterranean, to excite the populations to revolt. The measures of the police caused the project to miscarry. A certain Ricciardi, who had been compromised in the events of 1841 had been sent to Smyrna to watch the refugees. He got intimate with them, entered into the plot, and even organized it, and then betrayed the fools who trusted him." A letter from Venice, of the 24th June, reports, "that several Italian refugees, amongst whom was the son of Admiral Banchini, had been taken by an Austrian vessel, and carried into Trieste. It was given as certain that Admiral Banchini had been placed on half-pay."

The town of Palestine has been visited with three shocks of earthquake; fortunately no person perished.

GERMANY.

In consequence of the improved service of the steam-packets, letters are now only thirty-six hours on their way from London to Cologne.

Notwithstanding the elevated duty paid for Russian passports, there have never come into Germany so many Russians, particularly of the higher classes, as this year.

The Duchess of Angoulême left Berlin on the 27th ultimo for the Château of Froberg, near Vienna. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg was expected at the Château on the 10th instant.

The crops of more than 100 farmers have been destroyed in the commune of Landhagen, Eastern Prussia, by a violent hail-storm. The damage is very considerable—nearly £10,000.

MOROCCO AND ALGERIA.

Great hopes are entertained by General Bugeaud that the dispute with Morocco will be amicably settled, founded on the following correspondence. "From Marshal Bugeaud to El Guernami, June 17, 1844.—In all your preceding letters you accuse us of having violated your territory, of having infringed the law of good fellowship which reigns between us, which means that you attribute to us all that has been done, and that we have nothing to reproach you with. I am not habituated to these diplomatic artifices, I go straightforward and candidly to the point. We wish for nothing that belongs to you, but we desire that you should no longer receive Abd-el-Kader and afford him succour; seeing him when he is almost exhausted, and then sending him forth anew against us. This is the way which you have carried on against us for the last two years. We desire that you will cause to retire to the western inner parts of that empire, La Deris, the chiefs who have served Abd-el-Kader; that you cause to be dispersed the regular troops, the Goums and Askers; that you admit no more the tribes who migrate from our territory, and that you immediately send away those who have taken refuge with you. We bind ourselves under the same obligations towards you, if any such occasion should arise. On these conditions we will be your friends, we will favour your commerce and the government of Muley Abd-el-Rahman as much as it shall be in our power. If you wish to act contrary to this, we shall be your enemies. Answer me immediately, and without evasion, for that I do not understand." "From El Guernami to Marshal Bugeaud, Jan. 16.—I have received your letter and have understood its contents. Know that I cannot approve of misunderstanding between us even although the provocation should be on your side. But we cannot go back upon what has passed, for to God belongs the direction of all things. You say that you are disposed to friendship and peace. So are we, and besides I have not received permission to go to war. We must both, therefore, on either side, regard as an insuperable provocation such or such a fact contrary to peace, so long as friendship shall exist between us, and maintain our old conditions which were established by our ancestors, and have been respected by their descendants. God does what he chooses and desires. I will not in any way depart from these conditions; on the contrary, by their execution will be confirmed friendship, peace, and the happiness of our people."

The dispatches of Marshal Bugeaud, dated the 24th and 27th do not announce any new fact of much importance. In the letter dated Oran-el-Ghazouat, he states that Abd-el-Kader had returned to a distance of seven or eight leagues from Ouadja, after having performed a marja upon the tribe of the Hamammas Cheggas, on the pretext of their having refused to follow him.

The Pluton steamer arrived on the 23rd ult., before Tangier, with despatches for the Consul of France, and the same day left for Oran to join the Prince de Joinville. At the moment of her departure from Tangier, the Consul-General of England at that place was preparing to set out for Larache, Mogador, and Morocco. It was generally supposed that the journey of the Consul related to the affairs between Spain and Morocco, and that at the same time he was proposed to recommend to Muley Abderrahman, to employ all his authority to put an end to the armed incursions of his subjects on the other side of the French frontier.

FRANCE.

The Dotation question is at an end; it will not be presented to the Chambers, but unfortunately the Opposition and Legitimists have made it the pretext for many unpleasant disclosures.

The Moniteur has just published the general results of the commerce of France, during the year 1843. If they be compared with those of preceding years, it will be found that commerce was more active in 1843 than in 1842, but not so much as in 1841. The general commerce, which had amounted to 2682 millions in 1842, and 2168 in 1843, was 2174 in 1843. The imports in 1843 have exceeded what they were during the two preceding years, but the exports were only 992 millions, in place of 1065, which they reached in 1841. The exportations of wines and brandies have gradually fallen off. The export of silk tissues, which had risen to 161 millions in 1841, amounted to only 129 millions in 1843. The exports of cotton have come down from 104 millions to 82. It is only the exports of woollen tissues which have presented an increase, as from 61 millions in 1841, to 79 millions in 1843.

Admiral Turpin, the Maritime Prefect of Toulon, has been appointed to succeed M. Lavar in the command of the naval station of the Levant.

M. Charles Lafitte has been again returned as Deputy for Louviers; he had 232 votes, his opponent only 51.

We continue to receive distressing accounts from various parts of France, particularly the south, of the damage done by the recent storms. In many places the crops are laid by the heavy rains to such an extent, that little hope is entertained of saving them. The electric fluid fell on Saturday at Balagnolle (suburb of Paris), and killed three persons and a horse.

The following are the number of passengers and the amount of receipts of the Paris railways during the month of June:—

	Passengers.	Receipts.
Saint Germain .....	132,509	133,565.
Versailles, Right Bank .....	105,528	106,000.
Left Bank .....	102,400	117,551.
Orléans and Corbeil .....	148,238	615,565.
Rouen .....	78,215	819,000.

The Harve Regatta, under the patronage of the Prince de Joinville, will take place on the 26th and 27th of the present month. There are to be six races each day, the prizes for which amount to 7000 francs in money, and 500 francs in plate. Boats of every country will be permitted to contend.

A few days since, as some workmen employed on the canal of Marseilles were extracting stone from a quarry, an enormous portion of rock gave way, and falling upon them, killed five, and so seriously injured four others, that their lives are despaired of.

In April last, the daily number of legitimist journals sent through the Post-office did not amount to 36,000. They were thus divided:—Actes Français, 2230; La France, 1110; Gazette de France, 3793; Nation, 485; and Quelqu'un, 2705; in all 9335.

A stuporous, measuring seven feet eight inches, and weighing 270 lbs., was lately caught in the river Loire, at Bellevue, opposite St. Sébastien. Preparations are being made for dissolving the Champs Elysées for the fides of July. Pyramids are to be raised at certain distances from the Place de la Concorde up to the Barrière de l'Étoile, on which will appear, in coloured lamps, the names of all the departments of France.

We have little fresh in the musical circles. Carlotta Grisi has recovered from her serious indisposition, and will re-appear towards the end of the month. Eugénie Garcia has been engaged for the Opera Comique. Pauline Viardot-Garcia is expected in Paris, from Vienna, about the 8th of July. The celebrated Louis Spontini arrived in Paris last week. Anna Thillon made her reappearance at the Opera Comique in Coriolanus. The benefit of Taghioni produced 21,000 francs. Madlle. Saline Reimster is singing with great success at Weisbaden. Freybrock has quitted the banks of the Rhine for Prague. M. G. Preyer has been named Director of the Conservatory of Vienna. Desvetti, the brother of the celebrated Maestro and leader of the music to the Sultan, has quitted Constantinople for Vienna.

Two new German operas have been brought out at Brunswick: "Fino di Porto," by George Müller, and the "Substitute," by Wernthal. At Weimar, the "Emancipation of Women," by Chelard, has met with great success.

PORTUGAL.

Accounts from Lisbon, to the 2nd instant, state that the financial embarrassments of the Government have increased so much as to render probable the formation of a new Ministry, which it was thought would be headed by Palmella. There is no other political news.

WEST INDIES.

The royal mail-steam-packet Thames has arrived from the West Indies. The new dates are—St. James, June 6; Bar Adon, June 4; St. Thomas, June 14. Much excitement prevailed among the English at Mexico, in consequence of an English gentleman, of the name of Lloyd, having been shot through the arm by one of the sentinels on duty at the Palace, for no other cause than his waiting on the pavement before the Palace—a walk not prohibited to the Mexicans. Our Minister, Mr. Hamilton, had with great promptitude interfered, and the soldier, as well as the officer on guard, had been placed in arrest.

There have been some disturbances of a serious character at Dominica, originating in opposition, on the part of the black population, to the census which was ordered to be taken on the 3rd of June, and which they imagined to be a preliminary step to re-establishing slavery. About 100 persons were in goal, on the departure of the packet, waiting their trial.

BRASIL.

Accounts from Rio to May 12 bring the speech of the Emperor of Brazil on opening the session. The topics relate chiefly to local matters. The speech also announces that the rebellion in Rio Grande is not entirely suppressed, but that an amnesty had been granted to all concerned in the Paulo and Minas Geraes outbreaks.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts have been received from New York to the 17th ultimo. The only subject of interest relates to the Philadelphia riots. The Grand Jury had presented their report relating to them. Their origin they attribute to the imperfect manner in which the laws had been executed by the authorities of both city and county. They returned 161 true bills out of 299 which had been brought before them.

The money market is described to be in an unsatisfactory state.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Bishop of Exeter, in allusion to the Charitable Bequests Bill, stated some objections to the eleventh clause, on the ground that it would increase the jurisdiction of the Pope, and would thus be contrary to the oath of supremacy. —Lord Wharncliffe seemed to admit that this would be the effect of the clause, and therefore postponed the second reading till Tuesday next, the 15th, in order that he might have the opportunity of considering the clause.

Lord Wodehouse complained of some statements which he alleged to be calumnious, which imputed that several persons of Norfolk and Suffolk had, by their severity in the administration of the Poor-law, been the cause of the late incendiary fires in those counties. Lord Wodehouse recognised the individuals in question, and said it was impossible to name men who were more beloved by every class. The noble lord, in an excited tone, appealed to the "gentlemen of the press," as he said they called themselves, and invited them to go with him to the poorhouses. He added that he should like to put questions to every individual pauper, and to hear the answer which would be given. Then there would be an exposure of these infamous scandals by these base and infamous calumniators—for they deserved no other name—for there never had been anything more base and calumnious than the late accounts which had been brought forward in this way. If they would do him the favour to meet him, he would put these questions, and they would see that the Poor-law was well administered, and that the labourers would tell them that they are better off under the present than they were under the old law.

It was ordered that a message be sent to the Commons, requesting that Lord

John Russell and Sir James Graham should be allowed to attend the Lords' Committee on the Post office, and leave was given to Lord Melbourne to attend the Commons' Committee.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. Smith and Sir C. Napier successively put some questions to Sir Robert Peel upon the subject of the occupation of Algeria by the French, and the recent dispute between the latter government and the Emperor of Morocco.—In answer to Mr. Smith, the right hon. baronet made an explanation, which indeed has been given before, that the Earl of Aberdeen had never said he had no "objection" to make to the occupation of Algeria by the French, but that the expression was, that he had no "objection" to make. Sir R. Peel also said, that the British Consul at Algiers did not remain there under coverture from the French Government, but that he had precisely the same authority as when Mr. Sted was Vice-President of the Board of Trade. In reference to the dispute between France and Morocco, Sir R. Peel denied that the Emperor of Morocco had refused all mediation. He said he should not disclose whether the Government intended to increase the naval force in the Mediterranean; but he added, that there never was a period when England could make a greater naval demonstration in a very short time, should it be considered necessary. Whenever the Government thought it desirable to increase our naval force, it would make a proposition with that object to the House of Commons.

The rest of the night was occupied with a discussion upon the Government Railway Bill. An ineffectual attempt was made to postpone the order of the day for the second reading, after which, Mr. Gladstone, in moving it, argued upon the necessity of giving the Government the power of interfering with railways, an interference which was advocated by the committee. Mr. Gladstone explained that the bill did not, as some supposed, give the Government the power of purchasing the forces railways, but merely enabled directors of them to make bargains with the Government. At present, the public paid to the railways between £1,000,000 and £6,000,000 sterling, and in a few years the amount would probably be £18,000,000, and when there was such an amount involved, it was surely desirable that the Government should have the means of interfering. Mr. Stowe moved as an amendment that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—In the course of a discussion which ensued, Colonel Sturtevant, who supported the bill, repeated some of his accustomed distasteful remarks against railways, which he said he hated as much as he did pickpockets and assassins. Colonel Sturtevant also explained that he did not mean to deny the right to convey the idea that he had withdrawn his confidence from the Government generally, but only from Sir James Graham, in regard to the Poor-law Bill. Colonel Sturtevant admitted, that although he advocated that bill, he was not partial to the general measures of the President of the Board of Trade, which he called the Board of Free Trade. Ultimately, the debate upon the bill was adjourned till Thursday. The house sat till half-past one o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The business to-day was unimportant. The Bank Charter Bill was read a second time, with the understanding that the discussion should take place on the third reading. The Bishop of Exeter withdrew his Bill for the Protection of Young Females, the Duke of Wellington having intimated that the Government would perhaps take up the subject of the bill next session. Adjourned at a quarter to seven.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The house met to-day at twelve o'clock. The Motion Ballot Suspension Bill, the Stock in Trade Bill, and the Turnpike Act Continuance Bill, were read a third time and passed. The Solicitor-General moved the second reading of the Salford Disfranchisement Bill.—Mr. M. B. Hill, Q.C., who has been heard against the bill. He contended that sufficient grounds had not been shown for the disfranchisement of a whole community.—The Solicitor-General gave his opinion that Mr. Hill had not made out a case which could justify the house in refusing to assent to the bill.—After some discussion it was read a second time.

At the evening sitting Mr. Curzon brought on the often agitated question of the Danish claims. His motion, for an address to her Majesty on the subject, was, as usual, rejected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.—On a division, however, the motion was defeated by a majority of four only, the number in its favour being 68, and against it 72.

Mr. Lubbock brought the subject of dog-stealing under the consideration of the house, and moved for a resolution to inquire into the prevalence of the offence.—Sir James Graham consented to the committee principally on the ground that this was the month of July.

Mr. Hume attempted to submit a motion respecting the constitution of the Royal Academy, but, as he was proceeding, the house was counted out at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house again assembled at twelve o'clock, and much business was transacted, although of an unimportant character.

The Three-and-a-half per Cent. Exemption Bill was read a third time and passed, as was the Vagrants Removal Bill.

The Joint Stock Companies Regulation Bill, and the Joint Stock Companies Remedial Bill, &c., &c., were read through committee.

Mr. Hume took occasion to condemn the course pursued in counting him out on the previous evening, and characterised it as an "ungentlemanly" act.—The SPEAKERS: The hon. member will please to withdraw that expression.—Mr. Hume: Well, Sir, I am ashamed to see, then, (laughter.) So long as we were talking about dogs the house was not counted, but when I came to talk about men, it was counted directly. I shall bring forward my motion on going into committee of supply.

Some discussion ensued on the Field Gardens Bill, which is based on the recommendations of the committee on allotments, and proposes to create a machinery for appropriating to the labouring population portions of land, to be cultivated for their own use.—The bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on Wednesday.

On the proposal that the house should resolve into committee on the Actions for Gaming Disfranchisement Bill (the measure for suspending the further progress of the put law actions against certain leading members of the tariff), Mr. CHRISTIE proposed that Mr. Russell, in whose name the actions were brought, should be heard by counsel against the bill. This motion having been rejected, Mr. CHRISTIE moved that the bill be committed that day six months.—This amendment elicited a discussion upon gaming generally, and some reference to the late trial.—Captain BRANKER said (he could easily understand and fully feel the objection which attached to those who had been concerned in transactions recently exposed; but as a member of the committee he must say, the house would have been relieved from all difficulty in this case, if they had heard from themselves the reasons which had induced parties to bring these actions. He felt some reluctance that such heavy penalties as had been named should go into the pockets of such characters, although the noble lord opposite (Lord G. Bentinck) had gallantly set them at defiance, and declared he would not screen himself under this bill. For himself, he would say he would rather take up the art of "book-making," and enter into all the chicanery and dirty work that must ensue to those who meddled with such transactions.—Col. PAKE made the following explanation in reference to the emphatic remarks made by Baron Alderson in the Running Rein case. He said, the expressions made use of by a learned judge on a late occasion, that "if gentlemen associated and betted with blackguards they must expect to be cheated," had been quoted in the course of this debate, and if that learned judge meant by "associating" keeping company in the usual acceptation of the term, the observation was a most unfortunate one. For himself, he could say that he had never seen any of the parties referred to in the late case until they entered the court; and, as to their meeting him in a public place, he could as soon prevent that as their walking over Westminster-bridge. (Hear, hear.) It was because his noble friend (Lord G. Bentinck) had not not mixed himself up with those parties—because he did not associate with them—because he had been exerting himself with an ability only equal to his success—that he had been made the subject of a most unkind and unjustifiable attack. The Gallant Colonel then condemned the conduct of Mr. Gibson in holding communication with Mr. Russell.—Mr. GIBSON defended himself, and said his only object was to elicit the truth.—Lord G. Bentinck repeated the accusation, and entered into some particulars. He said, that of thirty-four writs which had been served, declarations had been delivered against only two individuals, and one of them was a gentleman of the name of Hill, for penalties amounting to £12,000, in consideration of a bet of £30,000 to £3000, alleged by the plaintiff in the action to have been laid by him against a horse, "Gasper," which belonged to him (Lord G. Bentinck). The noble lord used some expressions in regard to Mr. Gibson, whom he accused "of associating with persons who had robbed their own uncle's hall." These expressions earned some commentary from his members.—Mr. Christie's amendment was negatived, and the bill passed through committee.

Upon the order of the day for the committee upon the Salford Disfranchisement Bill being read, Mr. BLACKSTONE complained of the late period of the session at which the bill was brought forward, and mentioned the cases of Hare, with Nottingham, &c., in which, he maintained, bribery as flagitious as that at Salford had been committed. He moved, as an amendment, that instead of disfranchising the borough, the right of voting should be extended to the adjacent hundreds.—Captain HANCOCK seconded the amendment, and was supported by Mr. CECILIAN. In Nottingham no less than £12,000 had been expended in an election, and yet upon proof that £250 had been spent among 5000 electors in Mr. Walter's behalf, that gentleman had been unseated.—This was a most monstrous case; and upon the grounds on which Mr. Walter had been deprived of his seat, every member of the house might be believed, he declared, to be declared.—The Solicitor-General entered into another defence of the bill. On a division, only one vote was recorded for the amendment, and thirty-seven for going into committee. The bill was committed immediately.

The LORD ADVOCATE then rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to diminish the expense of trade investigations at Scotland, when Mr. HUME, perhaps by way of reprisal for the course adopted towards him on the previous evening, remarked that there were not forty members present. The house was counted, and the fact being as Mr. Hume suggested, an adjournment took place at a quarter before twelve.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Lord St. Leonards appeared at the bar with a message from the Commons, praying their lordships to allow the Earl of Fortescue to attend and give evidence before the Postage Committee of the House of Commons.—Leave given.

A number of petitions were then presented for and against the Dissenters' Chapels Bill.

Earl Powis intimated, that as the Duke of Wellington had stated that her Majesty's consent to his bill for preventing the consolidation of the Seas of St. Asaph and Bangor had not been obtained, and as the report of the committee was adverse to him, he should withdraw the bill.—The Bishop of Salisbury recommended her Majesty's Government to reconsider this question. He very much regretted that the noble earl had been compelled to withdraw this bill, for he felt that if it had been passed it would have been found to be a very beneficial measure. He trusted, however, that the Government would in the next session of Parliament introduce a bill themselves upon this subject.

Lord Montagu then brought forward his motion with respect to the management of pauper lunatics in Ireland. After some discussion he withdrew it, on the assurance of Lord Wharfedale, that the Government would take the matter into consideration. Their lordships adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Mr. T. Denham presented a petition from Mr. Masini, stating that he had been informed that certain accusations were likely to be brought against him before a Select Committee of that House then sitting upon the subject of opening letters. He felt it due to himself to state that he was prepared to repel any charge which might be brought against him, and he hoped that if such charges should be brought against him, that he would be allowed to be examined before the Committee.

The Amended Taxes Composition Bill, and the Colonial Postage Bill, were read a third time, and passed.

The adjourned debate on the Railways Bill was next proceeded with. Mr. Bright insisted that the object of Mr. Gladstone's long speech was to disguise instead of to explain the intention of the bill. The principle sanctioning the purchase of railways was a most erroneous one, and although Mr. Gladstone had stated that this power was not given to the Government, he (Mr. B.) was certain that the bill was intended to confer it. Mr. Bright then remarked upon the admirable management of railways, which establishments he said were conducted on a better system than any Government establishment. Another objection involved a point of great political consequence. He meant the influence which Government would have if it monopolised railways. Some railway companies paid immense sums to their servants, and if all this influence fell into the hands of the Executive Government, would it not affect the freedom of the constituents of those places through which the railways passed? In illustration of his argument, Mr. Bright mentioned the case of a railway guard at Kendal who had been taken from his duty that he might vote for the Government candidate. He should certainly support the amendment.—Lord St. Leonards defended the provisions of the bill, and combated some of the objections of Mr. Bright.—Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Colclough opposed the bill.—Mr. Charles Buller and Mr. Glynne also spoke strongly against the measure.—Sir R. Peel then addressed the house, and from the tone of his speech it appeared that the Government was willing to make considerable modifications in the bill; the second reading, though put to a division, was carried by 195 to 98. It is to be committed on Saturday.

The Report on the Law Courts (Ireland) Compensation Bill, was received. The Turnpike Trusts (South Wales) Bill was read a second time. The report on the Horse Racing Penalties Bill was received, after a short personal discussion, and the house adjourned at half-past one.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Earl of Rarok presented a petition from Mr. Masini, complaining of the opening of his letters at the Post-office, and gave notice that on Monday he should move that the petition be referred to the committee. The Marquis of Clanricarde alluded to reports that a large army had been collected on the western territory of India, under Sir Charles Napier, and wished to know if it was intended to commence hostilities. He also asked if there existed an intention to obtain an extension of territory on the banks of the Indus.—The Earl of Ripon said there were exaggerations in the reports about an enormous army. There was not an army to the extent of 80,000 men on the Panjab, nor was Sir C. Napier to command it. In the north-western provinces it was necessary to assemble a large force, for the purpose of meeting any emergency that might arise. The Government had no desire to obtain an extension of territory, but he could not answer for what we might be called upon to do for our own defence or protection. It was not possible during the Session to lay on the table any information respecting the state of India.

A long discussion ensued upon the order of the day for going into committee on the Bank Charter Bill. The bill ultimately went into committee, pro forma, and the house adjourned at half-past ten o'clock. It was remarked, as somewhat curious, that notwithstanding the importance of the bill, merely a dozen peers were present during the evening.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

Petitions were presented on various subjects. Sir G. Clerk gave notice that he should in Committee of Supply, this day week, move the education grant for Maynooth College. Mr. M. Gibson put a question to Sir R. Peel upon the subject of the alleged arrival of the new Brazilian tariff, but the right hon. baronet said that no information of the tariff having arrived, had reached the Foreign Office.

In answer to Mr. S. Westley, Sir James Graham said he was compelled to abandon the County Courts Bill for this session.

The house went into committee on the New Poor Law Bill. Clause 21, 22, and 23 were agreed to. On clause 24 being proposed, Captain Keble moved an amendment to the effect that justices of the peace appointed under the Municipal Act shall be, ex officio, members of the board of guardians. The amendment was, however, rejected.

The whole night was consumed in discussing the clauses of the bill, but nothing of importance occurred. Several amendments were proposed, but the Government was successful in carrying the clauses. At midnight, the committee having got as far as the 34th clause, the Chairman reported progress.—The house resumed, and, after some discussion, it was arranged that the house should meet again to-day at twelve o'clock (Saturday), to proceed with the bill.—Mr. Wankley protested against this course, but Sir R. Peel said, that if the hon. gent. wished to get away for grouse shooting on the 12th of August (a laugh), he (Sir R. Peel) saw no chance of it unless they proceeded with this bill at once.

The house adjourned at one o'clock till twelve o'clock to-day (Saturday).

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.

THE WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS.—O'CONNELL AND THE REPEALERS.

The House of Lords met again on Saturday to hear the argument of Counsel on behalf of the plaintiff in error in the O'Connell case. Very few lords were present. The arguments turned chiefly upon technical legal points.

Mr. F. Kelly addressed the House on behalf of Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Ray, and Dr. Gray. He contended that the jury had found three offences where only one was charged, and also complained of the direction of the learned judge, which was the very reverse of that of Baron Raffe in the case of Mr. Pargus O'Connor. Mr. Kelly proceeded to say it was clear that the traversers had been found guilty of a greater number of offences than the Grand Jury had directed them to be put upon their trial for. Here a man was convicted of two conspiracies as to which he had never been put upon his trial—as to which he had never pleaded—as to which the jury had no power to give an opinion. With respect to the findings, they could not return one and reject another. They must stand together or they must fall together. Each, taken respectively, was good as a count—all, taken together, were good as counts—but on them the parties were brought in guilty of too much. When Mr. Kelly had concluded, the further hearing of the case was postponed till Monday.

MONDAY.

On Monday Mr. Kelly resumed his argument. He submitted that every count in the indictment was bad, but particularly the sixth and eighth. These terms, he contended, were too general to constitute a legal offence: for, in order to constitute a legal offence of conspiracy, it must be expressly alleged that the conspiracy was for some unlawful object, and if for an unlawful object the object must be shown to be unlawful, and not merely called so, or described as such; or at least it must be shown that the intention was to obtain an object, whether lawful or unlawful, by means which must be shown to be unlawful. When Mr. Kelly had concluded, the Attorney-General addressed their lordships on the part of the Crown. The learned gentleman cited various cases in refutation of the argument used by the counsel in support of the writ of error, and said that where there were different counts and a general verdict the judgment would not be erroneous, although some of the counts turned out to be defective. Supposing that the second count was defective for want of venue, the judgment would be the same, for the first count, being good, would support the judgment though the second count would not.—Lord Campbell: Suppose the second count had been for a perjury, and that it was defective either by omitting something material or for want of venue, would the same reasoning apply?—The Attorney-General: Yes, my lord; it is quite impossible to make any distinction.—The Attorney-General then maintained that the sentence was no question for a Court of Error, and argued for some time in support of the finding of the jury. The Attorney-General was much exhausted during his address to the house, and an adjournment till Tuesday took place in consequence of this circumstance.

TUESDAY.

On Tuesday morning their lordships met again as a Court of Appeal, and the Attorney-General concluded his argument in support of the conviction. Mr. Smith (the Attorney-General for Ireland) then followed on the same side, but the arguments were so purely of a legal character, that a recapitulation of them could not be interesting to the general reader. Mr. Smith finished his speech in the evening after the House of Lords had adjourned.—Sir Thomas Wilde requested permission to address the Court in reply, without appearing in his legal costume. He always experienced considerable inconvenience from wearing his wig.—Lord Denham remarked, that this indulgence was generally accorded to Sir Thomas Wilde.—The Lord Chancellor: I wish the same indulgence could be extended to me. This is not to be taken as a precedent Sir Thomas; and what you curtail from your wig is not to be added to your argument. (Laughter.)—Sir Thomas Wilde was followed by Mr. F. Kelly, and the proceedings were adjourned till Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY.

On Wednesday Mr. F. Kelly continued his argument at considerable length. The Lord Chancellor then said he had prepared several questions, which he, in conjunction with his noble and learned friends, wished to submit to the consideration of the Queen's Judges. The Lord Chancellor here handed the questions to Lord Chief Justice Tindal. The following is an accurate copy of them:—

"The attention of the judges is requested to the record and proceedings hereafter subjoined, with reference to the following questions:—

"1. Are all, or any, and if any, which of the counts in the indictment bad in law, so that, if such count or counts stood alone in the indictment, no judgment against the defendants could properly be entered upon them?

"2. Is there any, and if any, what defect in the finding of the jury upon the trial of the said indictment, and in entering of such finding?

"3. Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the indictment, by means of any defect in the indictment, or of the finding, or entering of the findings of the jury upon the said indictment?

"4. Is there any sufficient ground to reverse the judgment by reason of the matters stated in the pleas in abatement, or any of them, or in the judgment upon such pleas?

"5. Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment on account of the continuing the trial in the vacation, or of the order of the Court for that purpose?

"6. Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment on account of the judgment of the Court overruling and disallowing the challenge to the array, or any or either of them; or of the matters stated in such challenge?

"7. Is there any sufficient ground to reverse the judgment by reason of any defect in the entry of continuances from the said trial to the 13th day of April, regard being also had to the appearances of the defendants on the said last-named day?

"8. Is there any sufficient ground to reverse or vary the judgment on account of the sentences, or any, or either of them, passed on the respective defendants, regard being had particularly to the recognizances required, and to the period of imprisonment dependent on the entering into such recognizances?

"9. Is there any sufficient ground to reverse the judgment on account of the judgments in the assignments of error coram nobis, or any or either of them, or of the matters stated in such assignments of error, or any or either of them?

"10. Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment by reason of its not containing any entry as to the verdicts of acquittal?

"11. In an indictment consisting of counts A, B, C, where the verdict is guilty of all generally, and the counts A, B are good, and the count C is bad, the judgment being, that the defendants, for the offences aforesaid, be fined and imprisoned, which judgment would be sufficient, in point of law, if confined expressly to counts A and B, can such judgment be reversed on a writ of error? Will it make any difference whether the punishment be discretionary, as above suggested, or a punishment fixed by law?"

Lord Chief Justice Tindal said, on behalf of himself and the other Judges, he had to request that their lordships would allow them time to consider the questions which had been submitted to them.

The Lord Chancellor.—Certainly. You are entitled to all reasonable time. The Attorney-General for England said, on the part of the Crown he had the right of final reply, but he should not avail himself of it on the present occasion. He only mentioned the matter, that no precedent might be drawn from it.

The house then immediately adjourned. It having been erroneously stated in the morning papers, that the judgment would be given on Thursday morning, great numbers of persons went to the house, and much disappointment was experienced by them on learning that the decision was postponed for the present.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN.

On Wednesday the annual distribution of prizes of the Spitalfields branch of the Government School of Design, took place at Crosby-hall, Bishopsgate-street. The ceremony appeared to excite considerable interest. The Marquis of Normandy, on taking the chair, expatiated on the advantages which the school was calculated to confer, and expressed his gratification at the great increase in the number of pupils. The Rev. W. Stone read the annual report, which showed that since the last report of the committee the amount of attendance had increased to a degree which has rendered it necessary to provide more convenient accommodation for the students. The total number of pupils in attendance during the month of April, in the present year, was 210, which exceeds by 122 that reported in the same month of the preceding year. The report also showed that through the liberal exertions of Richard Dainton, Esq., and a numerous body of silk-merchants and lookers, a fund has been created amounting already to £450, the interest of which is to be appropriated annually to the distribution of prizes to meritorious students.

When the prizes had been distributed by the Marquis of Normandy, several resolutions connected with the objects of the school were agreed to. Mr. Dillon, in proposing one of them, expressed an opinion in which we are disposed to concur, that the superiority of French workmen in regard to patterns, is not so much to be attributed to any superiority of talent on their part, as to the greater degree of encouragement afforded by the French Government to such institutions.

We have not space for the entire list of prizes, but have engraved three of them.

No. 1.—Charles Sturges, for the best design for a 600 cord figured silk garment, £2 2s. 6d. This pupil, aged twelve, is the son of a Spitalfields weaver.

No. 2.—Joseph Bridges, for the second best design for a 600 cord figured silk garment, £1 1s. 6d. This pupil, aged twelve, is also the son of a silk-weaver, has been two years in the school, and had no knowledge of drawing when he first entered.

No. 3.—Henry Cole Soper, for the best design for a paraol border, £1 1s. 6d. This pupil, aged fourteen, is the son of Mr. H. Soper, silk manufacturer, Spital-square; he has been in the school two years.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

RIGHT OF BILL BROKERS TO RAISE MONEY UPON COLLATERAL SECURITIES.—A case has been tried in the Court of Exchequer, Aschman v. Cooper and others, which involved an important question to the commercial world. It was an action of trover, to recover £10,500, the alleged value of the scrip receipt for 300 shares in the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. The defendants, who are bankers, claimed a lien upon the scrip for advances made upon this and other securities, deposited with them by Colls, Thompson, and Co., the plaintiff's bill brokers. A verdict was returned for the defendants, thus marking the opinion of the jury, that the bankers had a right to recover their advances, but, at the same time, they gave an intimation that they considered it a dangerous practice for the mercantile world to raise money upon collateral securities, while the original securities were still running.

THE CLAIM OF SIR AUGUSTUS D'ESTE TO THE DUKEDOM OF SUMMER.—The House of Lords sat in a Committee for Privileges on Tuesday and gave their judgment on the claim of Sir Augustus D'Este to the Dukedom of Summer. Chief Justice Tindal read the opinion of the Judges, which was to the effect that no marriage of any branch of the royal family was valid unless the consent of the Crown was previously obtained, and as this was not the case with the marriage of the Duke of Summer with Lady Augusta Murray, the judges were of opinion that the claim of Sir Augustus D'Este to the Dukedom of Summer should not be allowed. The House of Lords affirmed the opinion of the Judges, and rejected the claim of Sir Augustus D'Este.

ALDERMAN GIBBS AND THE PARISH ACCOUNTS.—At the Rolls Court on Monday argument was heard on an information at the instance of William Frederick Rock, on behalf of himself and other the inhabitants of the parish of St. Stephen's Walbrook, London, against Michael Gibbs and others, praying for an account of all money, stock, and personal estate, vested in Gibbs in trust for the parish, and of all sums received by him, and his application of the same. Alderman Gibbs admitted that he had received the amount, and a decree was made as prayed.

SUSPENSION OF A CERTIFICATE FOR TWELVE MONTHS.—In the Court of Bankruptcy on Tuesday, in the case of T. W. Palmer, the bankrupt's application for a certificate was opposed on the ground that he had carried on business as a broker without a certificate and without having taken the necessary oath. Also upon the ground that he had made purchases to a large amount when in a state of insolvency. The Court, thinking the allegations proved, suspended the certificate for twelve months.

POLICE.

REVIVAL OF MONOMANIA.—A gentlemanly-looking young man, the Hon. William Ross Touchet, has been examined at Bow-street on a charge of shooting Thomas Smith, a gunsmith, at 288, High Holborn, with intent to murder him. Alfred Smith stated that he resided at 208, High Holborn, and was assistant to his father, a gunsmith. About half-past twelve o'clock on Saturday last, the prisoner came into the shooting gallery at the back of the shop, and inquired whether he could have a few shots with a pistol at the target? Witness's father replied that he could, and immediately proceeded to load a brace of pistols. He gave them to the prisoner, who, after the second shot, observed, that the trigger pulled very hard. Witness's father said he could set the hair-triggers if the prisoner wished, on which the latter said he did not want them to go off so easily as that, and would shoot with them as they were. On receiving a pistol for the third shot, the prisoner, without saying a word, turned round, and while Mr. Smith was loading another pistol, with his back towards him, he fired the pistol at him, and wounded him in the loins. Witness's father immediately exclaimed, "Good God, I am shot through the back," and then, turning to the prisoner, asked him what he did it for, but he made no answer. The prisoner smiled at the time he fired the shot. Mr. Smith continued, with witness's assistance, to walk up stairs. On witness descending to the shooting gallery, he found Mr. Touchet in the custody of a policeman, who told witness that the prisoner had said he was tired of his life, and had shot Mr. Smith on purpose, as he wished to be hanged. The prisoner also repeated the same words to witness, adding, that he bore no animosity to his father. He was then removed in custody to the station-house, and Mr. Smith was conveyed to Bartholomew's Hospital, where it was discovered that the bullet had lodged in the right side of his back. Witness saw the prisoner about three months ago at his father's shooting gallery, when he had some shots at the target. On examination by Mr. Telford, the prisoner admitted that he did the deed on purpose, and repeated that it was because he wished to be hanged. He was treated very badly, he said, and was very unhappy. It was not for want of money. The prisoner, who resides at 95, Weymouth-street, Portland-place, is the younger brother of Lord Audley. The surgeon at Bartholomew's Hospital pronounced the wound to be a dangerous one.—Mr. Telford remanded the prisoner.—These instances of monomania, as it is styled, are really alarming. But a few months since the public were deeply excited by the deplorable death of Mr. Drummond, but as the man who committed the act was pronounced to be insane, the perpetrator escaped punishment. Still more recently, Holmes, whom a jury pronounced guilty of murder, has been released, and we are told that it was solely upon the ground of his insanity. It is to be remembered, however, that his insanity has not been proved by the intervention of a jury, as in the former case. It is far from our desire to excite prejudice, but, to say the least, when insanity assumes such a shape as to be dangerous to her Majesty's subjects, it does seem time either to come to some more perfect definition of the law, or to provide some means of restraining persons who are, or affect to be, insane.—We have also to record another instance of an offence committed by a person labouring under this malady. At Worsnop-street, on Monday, a Mr. Grove was charged with having committed a violent assault upon two constables on the Eastern Counties Railway, because they would not allow him to endanger his life by walking along the rails. The defendant admitted the charge, but behaved in a very incoherent way. Mr. Hingham told the defendant that if it were proved he was labouring under a delusion when he committed the act, it would be his duty not to punish him. Acting in conformity with this view, the magistrate detained the defendant till his friends could be apprised of his situation. When the defendant was removed from the office, he wrote a letter to Sir R. Peel, in which he said he would leave her Majesty faithfully, if she would give him the Colony of the Grenadier Guards.—[Mr. Hingham may be correct in his view that the law will not punish persons who commit crime while labouring under a delusion; but we cannot help thinking it would be highly desirable for the Legislature to take some steps to compel the friends of such deluded people to take care of them, on the principle that "prevention is better than cure."]

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM ELECTION.—There are three candidates in the field to supply the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Scholefield, viz., Mr. Spooner, a Conservative, and Mr. Sturge, and Mr. Scholefield, son of the late member, in the Whig interest.

ACCIDENT AT LEWES.—On Tuesday morning a young man named Garham, in the employ of Messrs. Wood, brewers, overbalanced himself whilst at work, and fell into a coper of boiling liquor nearly seven feet deep. Assistance was immediately procured and he was extricated from his perilous situation, but in a dreadfully scalded condition. The poor fellow expired at four o'clock in the afternoon.

THE EXPLOSION AT BOLTON.—After an inquiry, which lasted three days, the jury returned the following verdict:—"We are unanimously of opinion that the death of James Swift, Bridget Hart, and James McDonald, was caused by an explosion of the steam-boiler at Mr. Brooks's mill. That the said boiler exploded from the pressure of the steam being too great; and that George Branscombe has caused the explosion. We are also of opinion that our care has not been used in the general superintendence of the steam engines and boilers." George Branscombe was thereupon committed to take his trial for manslaughter.

MURDER IN BECCLES.—On Monday a murder was committed at the village of Rose Beckhill, near the town of Newport Pagnell, Buckinghamshire. The victim was a man named Joseph Leach, and the supposed perpetrators of the horrid deed are two young men named Joseph Keen and William Stephens, both belonging to the same neighbourhood, who have absconded, and for whose apprehension warrants have been issued.

INCENDIARIES IN ESSEX.—On Wednesday week an incendiary fire took place on a farm called Lindridge, the property of S. M. Raymond, Esq., and occupied by Mr. Chinery. A barn, stabling, byres, and sheds, were destroyed. The barn contained a large quantity of wheat. The women joined the men while they worked the engines to extinguish the fire. This crime appears to have been committed because Mr. Chinery used a dressing-machine on his farm, and is a maker of machinery.

THE PITMEN AND THE COALOWNERS.—The Pitmen of the North appear determined to continue the strike, for we find by the Times Mercury, that an immense meeting, consisting of upwards of 20,000, took place on Monday, on Shaden Hill. They were perfectly peaceable. Resolutions were agreed to deprecating the most angry expressions of the masters, and pledging themselves to continue the contest until their just claims are accorded to.

CONFESSION OF MURDER.—At the Lincoln Assizes, held in March, 1843 Elizabeth Joyce was indicted for poisoning her step-son, William Edward Joyce, aged 14, at Boston, on the 17th September, 1842, by administering arsenic to him which she had purchased under the pretence of poisoning mice. After the examination of several witnesses, Mr. Baron Gurney stopped the case, because the indictment charged the prisoner with administering poison to "William," instead of to "William Edward" Joyce. At the July Assizes, Mrs. Joyce was again arraigned, when much evidence was heard, and after an able defence the jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." The husband felt so confident of his wife's guilt, that on her liberation he refused to live with her, and she has been for some time in Boston Union-house, where she is now suffering from severe illness. On Monday last (probably under the fear of approaching death) she made a full confession of her guilt in the horrid deed for which she has been twice arraigned at Lincoln.

TRIAL OF THE RIOTERS AT LEEDS.—This extraordinary trial has terminated, having occupied four days of the borough sessions, and twice as long as the other 35 cases put together. Twice the Court sat until between ten and eleven o'clock at night. Of the military, four were found guilty and eight not guilty; of the civilians, four were found guilty and three not guilty. The sentences on the former were different periods of imprisonment; of the latter, one was fined £4, the others were sentenced to short periods of imprisonment.

IRELAND.

At the close of the meeting of the Repeal Association, held at Dublin on Monday, the weekly return of the rent was £2106. This was the sixth weekly return of a similar large amount, since the incarceration of Mr. O'Connell.

A SECOND STATE PROSECUTION.—According to the Irish papers, an indictment is to be preferred at the next Lincoln Assizes, against the proprietor of the Liverpool Reporter, for an article in which the writer calls upon the people to purchase arms and register them. After giving this advice the article concludes thus:—"With arms in your hands you will more effectually plead for your rights; and if persecution should proceed further in its career (and it must either advance or retreat), you will have those means of self-defence which the constitution has provided. A nation unarmed is a nation of slaves, to be trodden down by a military despotism. And what Government, we ask, could resist the demand of a nation thus unanimously and armed for her rights?"

STEAM-BOAT ACCIDENT.—It was very generally rumoured in town on Monday, that a steamer, which left Derry on Saturday, for Belfast, having on board a large number of ministers of the General Assembly, had met with an accident on her passage, attended with loss of life. The fact, we believe to be, that the steamer (we have not ascertained her name) left Derry on Saturday for Belfast, and on her passage down Lough Foyle, when nearly abreast of Moville, the boiler burst with considerable noise. One man on board, a seaman belonging to the vessel, was severely injured; but, with this exception, we are gratified to learn that no other casualty of consequence occurred. The vessel was brought to Moville, where she remains, and the passengers returned to Derry.

ANOTHER DREADFUL MURDER.—The Cork Reporter gives an account of another revolting murder, which took place a few nights ago. A man named William Colman, residing at a place called Mayfield, between Clonm and Ballincotton, was found mangled in his bed in a most shocking manner, his head being literally smashed to pieces with a pickaxe. An inquest has been held, and a verdict of Willful Murder returned. No person has yet been arrested, but there are strong suspicions involving some near relatives of Coleman's.

THE LONDON BRIDGE STEAM WHARF.

STEAM NAVIGATION OF THE THAMES.

There is no port in the kingdom which has profited more than London through the application of Steam Navigation. A great number of the steam-vessels that arrive and depart, carry passengers only, and are, therefore, not required to make entry at the Custom-house; and with regard to such as carry goods, no distinction is made between them and sailing-vessels, for which reason, no accurate account of the number of this class of ships that enter and leave the port can be given.

The spirited scene represented in the engraving—the Steam Packet Wharf at London-bridge—may be regarded as the main focus of this extensive means of transit. The number of arrivals and departures at this spot during the day, is truly astonishing; and at the present high steam season, is a constant source of attraction. The vessels are of all degrees of tonnage; and from thence and the adjoining Fresh Wharf, and Cox and Hammond's Quays, steamers start for Greenwich, Woolwich, Sheerness, Gravesend, Herne Bay, Margate, Deal and Dover, Calais, Boulogne, and Ostend; and other places. Although the width of the river is here nearly 700 feet, the constant arrivals and departures occupy a considerable portion of this extent.

Little more than thirty years have elapsed since the Thames was first navigated by steam, and that experimentally. We find it stated, that in 1812, a Mr. Lawrence constructed a steam-boat at Bristol, which he brought to London to ply on the Thames for passengers; but such was the clamour raised against him by the Company of Watermen, that he was compelled to return with his steamer to Bristol; others soon succeeded, and in twenty years the Thames was ploughed by 100 steam-boats.

The London-bridge wharf is one of the handsomest and most convenient constructions of its class on the Thames; and the bustling crowd, with one of the beautiful arches of the bridge, as a framework for our engraving, is a very picturesque scene. Indeed, comparatively few Londoners are aware of the effective scene, especially when viewed from the river.

London-bridge Wharf is the main point for the Herne Bay and Margate steam-boats. It is curious to turn to the statistics of Steam Navigation to this favourite watering-place. It appears that the first steamboat, the Thames, 90 tons, left London for Margate in 1815; in 1817, the fares were 11s. and 15s. each person. The passage was then made in ten or twelve hours, whereas it is now effected with ease in less than half that time. The old sailing packets were occasionally thirty and even thirty-six hours on the same passage. And, such was the popular apprehension of explosion on board the first built Margate steamboats, that we remember a scientific friend addressing a long letter to the Times newspaper, to prove the safety of the new triumph of man's ingenuity.

Margate, almost within the present century, was "a poor, inconsiderable fishing-town, built for the most part in the valley adjoining the harbour, the houses of which were, in general, mean and low; one dirty, narrow lane, called King-street, being the principal street of it." The town is now well built and paved, and lit with gas; and an esplanade, squares, &c., are among its public accommodations. The shore is well adapted to sea-bathing, and to this circumstance, and the facility of communication with the metropolis, by means of steam-vessels, must be attributed the rapid increase in the population of the parish of St. John, which amounts to about 11,000. Nor, among the public improvements of Margate, must we forget the stone pier, 900 feet long, erected at a cost of £100,000. This structure has added greatly to the utility of the harbour, which is much exposed to winds from the north-east.

GRAND FIELD-DAY IN HYDE PARK.—On Monday there was a grand brigade field-day in the large space of ground generally used on such occasions in Hyde-park. The troops on the ground consisted of the 1st and 2nd battalions of the Coldstream Guards, making the full strength of that distinguished corps—about 800 men; the 2nd and 3rd battalions of the Grenadier Guards, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Grant. The first battalion of this regiment is now at Winchester. Including the bands of both, there were about 1500 men present, and all were under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Walton, of the Coldstream Guards, a gallant officer, who, in addition to many other glorious scenes, witnessed that of Waterloo. The Duke of Cambridge, Colonel of the Coldstream Guards, arrived on the ground at the appointed time. The Duke was mounted on a grey charger, and was attired in the regimentals of the corps. A grand review of all the troops stationed in London or adjoining, will take place shortly, and preparations are now being made very extensively in anticipation of the affair.

"How long," exclaimed a tradesman, as he applied the lash to an incorrigibly bad apprentice, "how long will you continue to serve the devil?" "Not more than three months sir—my indenture will be out then."

AMERICAN REFINEMENT.—The New York Herald says, "In extra polite circles the night-wore is now termed 'the nocturnal hose of the feminine gender.'"

Call not the grey hairs of age the snows of winter—call them not the frosts of time! They are white—spring-blossoms, betokening the Eternal spring-time of Heaven.—American Paper.

HAPPINESS.—Happiness! that glorious crown which all the jewels of the world cannot enrich; which studded with the diamonds of the heart, can receive no additional lustre from such paltry things as power, or wealth, or station.

MARGATE.

WILLIAM COTTON, ESQ., GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

This excellent gentleman has recently acquired additional public importance from his connection with "the Bank Charter," now under discussion in Parliament.

Mr. William Cotton is the third son of Mr. Joseph Cotton, for many years a Director of the East India Company; and Deputy-Master of the Trinity House. He is also a grandson of Dr. Cotton, of St. Alban's, of whom such honourable mention is made by the poet Cowper. Mr. W. Cotton was born in London, in 1786. In 1827, he joined the firm of Huddart and Co., and enjoyed the advantage of a long friendship with Capt. Huddart, of which distinguished philosopher and mathematician Mr. Cotton has contributed a brief memoir to the Transactions of the Royal Institute of Civil Engineers.

In 1822, Mr. Cotton became a Director of the Bank of England; Deputy-Governor in 1841; he has served two years as Governor, and has been requested to continue in office in consequence of the negotiation for the renewal of the Charter. His eldest brother, Mr. John Cotton, was last year Chairman of the East India Company; so that the two brothers were, at the same period, at the head of two great Corporations of the City of London.

THE GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

Mr. W. Cotton is distinguished for his extensive acquaintance with practical science; and, last year, he invented a very ingenious machine for weighing sovereigns, and separating the light ones from those of standard weight. This machine is so delicate, that it detects a variation of the 12,500th part of the weight of a sovereign; and the invention is declared to be one of the most satisfactory instances of automaton labour.

NEW MUSIC.

FORGET THEM! Ballad. The Words by the Rev. J. MOULTREY, M.A. &c., the music by J. CALVERT. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

A graceful flowing melody, but there is some incongruity between its rhythm and that of the words. The dragging of the monosyllable upon a dotted crotchet, quaver and crotchet, which so frequently occurs throughout, produces a painful effect; besides there is some very loose grammar in the words, as the following lines will show:

If this thou call'st forgetting
Thou indeed shalt be forgot!

I NEVER CAST A FLOWER AWAY. Cavatina composed by JOHN CALVERT. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

The only objection we have to this cavatina is the indecision or uncertainty of its accent. The composer may probably have intended this as a beauty; but there is as much rhyming in music as there is in poetry, and when the observance of it is neglected, the ear is seriously offended. The notation after the two pauses on page 3, is, with respect to time, rather strange and defective.

CARACTACUS BEFORE CLAUDIUS CÆSAR.

THE BURIAL OF THE PRINCES IN THE TOWER.

THE EXHIBITION AT WESTMINSTER HALL.

The Exhibition of "Works of Art sent in, pursuant to notices issued by her Majesty's Commissioners on the Fine Arts," is daily attracting crowds to Westminster Hall. The effect on entering this vast apartment is strikingly beautiful; and, as the thoughtful spectator advances up the door of the Hall, and looks upon its walls decorated with cartoons and frescoes, and the double row of statues that divides the apartment into two aisles, perchance his mind's eye may be carried through the vista of nearly eight hundred years, or from the aspirations of British art in the nineteenth, to the crudities of Anglo-Norman civilisations in the eleventh, century—the latter being the period of the foundation of the Hall itself.

The catalogue comprises about 100 specimens of sculpture, and 54 frescoes, cartoons, and oil-paintings. We do not intend to travel by the record, but to confine ourselves, for the present, at least, to the subjects here engraved.

First is a fresco of extraordinary merit, 3 feet 11 inches wide, and 6 feet 2 inches high, executed by Richard Redgrave. The subject is termed in the catalogue—

"Loyalty: Catherine Douglas barring the door with her arm, to withstand the assassins of James I. of Scotland." "Unattended even by a body guard, and confiding in the love of his subjects, James was residing within the walls of the Carthusian Monastery at Scone, which he had founded and endowed. Graham, of Strathearn, seized the occasion, and brought down a party by night to the neighbourhood. Seconded by traitors within, he gained possession of the gates and interior passages. The King's first intimation was from his cup-bearer, William Straton, who, on leaving the chamber in which the King and Queen were at supper, found the passage crowded with armed men, who answered his cry of alarm by striking him dead. The noise reached the royal chamber, a rush of the assassins followed, and Catherine Douglas, one of the Queen's maids of honour, springing forward to bolt the door of the outer apartment, found the bar had been clandestinely removed; with resolute self-devotion she supplied the place with her naked arm." This is one of the most vigorously executed of all the frescoes in the exhibition.

The second subject is a fine group of sculpture, by J. D. H. Brown— "Caractacus before Claudius Cæsar;" wherein the British chief reproves the Roman conqueror with the memorable words: "Though you may wish to rule all, it does not follow that all will submit to slavery." (See "Annals of Tacitus," Book 12.)

The next subject, a truly classic production, by James Legrew, is—

"The Last Prayer of Ajax," impersonated, the lines from Sophocles, (Potter's Translation):—

"Oh, Jove! thou father of my ancestors!
First let me crush this wily juggling foe,
And the two chiefs that, with imperial power,
Command the Grecian host, then let me die."

The fourth subject is a finely executed group by H. C. Whiston, jun.:—

"The Burial of the Princes in the Tower of London."
"The tyrannous and bloody act is done;
The most arch deed of piteous massacre,
That ever yet this land was guilty of."

"We smothered
The most replenished sweet work of nature
That, from the prime creation, e'er she framed."
Vide Shakespeare's Richard III., Act 4, Scene 3.

The fifth and last subject is a characteristic figure of "A Falconer," by John E. Carew; it is, altogether, a production of great merit.

THE LAST PRAYER OF AJAX.

LOYALTY: CATHERINE DOUGLAS BARRING THE DOOR, AT SCONE.

A FALCONER.

Her Majesty, the Queen, has been pleased to send the munificent donation of £500 to that excellent institution, the Association for the Aid and Relief of Dressmakers and Milliners.

ROYAL VISITS TO BAIGORRY.—We believe there is very little doubt that the King of the French intends to visit her Majesty some time during September; and as the long-talked-of purchase of Normandy has been abandoned, there is no place so likely as the Pavilion to be chosen for the reception of the royal visitor. The King of the French has been expected for some time at Epsom, where his Majesty's horses and carriages arrived several days ago. We hear that the Duke of Devonshire is waiting the King's arrival at his estate, to pay a visit to his Majesty, for the purpose, it is said, of receiving instructions relative to the King's intended visit to our most gracious sovereign.

THE QUEEN'S DOWRY.—Orders have been received at Marlborough House to prepare for the reception of her Majesty, who is now expected to arrive in London on Saturday, the 17th inst.

RETURN OF THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—The Duchess of Kent returned to England on Wednesday. Her Royal Highness embarked at Ostend, on board the Princess Alice, at half-past six o'clock, and arrived at Woolwich at half-past four o'clock in the afternoon. Her Royal Highness appeared in the enjoyment of excellent health. She reached Frogmore Lodge at eight o'clock in the evening.

THE KING OF SAXONY.—On Sunday his Majesty the King of Saxony, attended by his usual suite, visited the city of Bristol, and proceeded to the Bath Hotel, Clifton. His Majesty, after attending divine service, went to view the various beauties of Clifton, and was particularly struck with the romantic grandeur of St. Vincent's rocks. On Monday morning he proceeded to view the steamship Great Britain, on board which his Majesty was received by the Right Worshipful the Mayor (Mr. W. L. Clarke), Captain Claxton, R.N., Mr. T. R. Guppy, Civil Engineer, and Captain Elliot, by whom his Majesty was conducted through every portion of the ship, which excited the most marked commendations from the royal passenger. His Majesty then proceeded to Leigh Court, the seat of Mr. P. J. Miles, which has been so often visited by royalty.

THE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE gave a dinner-party, on Thursday, at Cambridge-house. There were present—the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, the Marquis of Granby, the Earl and Countess of Chesterfield, the Earl and Countess Grosvenor, the Earl and Countess of Dunmore, the Earl and Countess Delaware, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lord A. Paget, Count de Noailles, Count de Jarnac, Mr. F. Villiers, and Mr. Keats. In the evening the Duchess of Cambridge had an assembly.

We understand that preparations have been made at Windsor Castle, in anticipation of the event which naturally excites great interest, and her Majesty's health is such that its occurrence may be expected within a very short interval.

On Monday afternoon the Duchess of Barclay gave a princely fete champetre at Montagu-house, at which about 1200 persons of rank congregated, including the leading members of the corps diplomatique, and distinguished foreigners visiting this capital.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Waterford have left town for Hamburg.

On Tuesday morning Lord Charles Wellesley, son of the Duke of Wellington, was married to the Hon. Miss Pierrepont, at St. George's, Hanover-square. The Duke arrived with his son at seven o'clock, and a distinguished company, after the ceremony, partook of a déjeuner à la fourchette at Aspley House.

On Wednesday, the Dowager Duchess of Bedford gave her fourth été champetre for the present season, at Bedford-lodge, Camden-hill, on which occasion her grace was honoured with the presence of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, her Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and about 600 members of the aristocracy.

Lord and Lady Brougham entertained the Duke of Wellington, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Countess of Essex and Lady Amelia Capel, Countess of Westmoreland, Earl and Countess of Montagu, Hon. A. Capel, Mr. Repton, Hon. Cecil Foxcroft, Sir P. Crampton, Miss Copley, and a large party, at dinner on Monday last. Lady Brougham had a select party afterwards.

BLENHEIM PALACE.—The infant Earl of Sunderland, the first born of the Marquis and Marchioness of Blandford, was baptised at the palace chapel, Blenheim, last week. The Marchioness of Londonderry presented the child at the font, who was named George Charles, the names of his paternal and maternal grandfathers. Besides the sponsors, there were also present the Duchess of Marlborough and Lady Louisa Spencer Churchill, Lady Caroline Stewart, Lord A. Churchill, and Lord Seaham. The font, richly embossed silver gilt, was presented by the Marquis of Londonderry to the infant earl, his first grandson.

The Earl and Countess of Cardigan have arrived in Portman-square from Ireland, and are expected to remain in town for three weeks before going to Deane Park, Northamptonshire.

We hear that Lord Claude Hamilton, the member for Tyrone, is about to be married to Miss Pryor, the daughter of General Pryor.

G. Bellairs, Esq., of Leicester, has had the Sockerton estate, Leicestershire, bequeathed to him by the will of Messrs. W. and N. C. Stevenson, of Stamford. The value of the real and personal estate of the deceased gentleman is supposed to be £200,000, of which £75,000 is left in numerous legacies, and the residue to the Rev. P. Wilson, rector of Newmarket; Rev. H. Bellairs, rector of Brighthelm; and James, George, and William Bellairs, Esqrs., sons of Mr. A. W. Bellairs, formerly a banker of Leicester.

Sir Robert Peel's son has arrived at Lisbon on his way to Madrid, and has been received by the Queen of Portugal with great cordiality. Her Majesty made him an offer of one of her carriages during his stay at Lisbon, but he politely declined to accept it.

A Cabinet Council was held on Monday at the Foreign Office, which was attended by all the Ministers. The Council sat three hours.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Warpite, 50, Captain Wallis, was the only ship of war at Gibraltar on the 22d June, but an imposing force was proceeding to that point for the effectual protection of British interests.

The Callington, 50, Captain Eden, flag-ship of Rear-Admiral Sir G. Seymour, will go out of harbour in a few days, and be available for any service required. She will not proceed to the Pacific until the middle of August.

The Amazon, 100, and the Vernon, 50, both at Sheerness, are ordered to be prepared for commission. It is reported the President, 20, at this port, is also to be got ready.

Vice-Admiral Sir W. Parker is shortly looked for in the flag-ship Cornwallis, 72, Capt. Richards. Letters from her, of the 19th April, report the belief that she would reach England about the end of July, and proceed to Plymouth to be paid off. The cases of sickness which prevailed on board at Hong Kong had entirely disappeared. She was at Madras at the above date, under reef, and replenishing provisions and water for the homeward voyage. It was thought she would remain a fortnight at the Cape.

The St. Vincent, 120, Captain Rowley, was hurried away from Spithead on Monday, by Admiralty orders, to join the squadron assembling at Gibraltar for the purpose of closely watching the movements of the French Admiral. The Campanella, 104, Captain Martin, arrived here on Monday from the eastward; she came into this harbour on Tuesday evening to be paid off.

The Queen, 110, Captain Sir Charles Sullivan, is still in commission in the harbour, and can be sent to sea on a short notice. Her present orders are to be paid off all standing.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The fair week, at the close of which we write, lavish in gorgeous weather, was also rich with good things for such as have their pleasure in food and field. To give the latter the precedence in our catalogue, we come to speak of the turf—whose chief event was the July meeting at Newmarket. Since the great increase, both in consequence and numbers, of the provincial meetings, those at the metropolis of racing have been on the decline. Of the seven there held annually, three—the Second Spring, the July, and the First October—are on their last legs. That to which this notice applies was not the shadow of a shade of its former self. The first day produced a single race? and what more had we a right to expect? The town was full of horses, but not such as people thought it prudent to expose to the casualties of Fifty Pound Plates, with the prospect before them. Another fortnight brings us to Goodwood—that El Dorado of the turf—where one stroke of fortune decides his fate for a year at the least. As a sample of a Two-Year-Old Stake, let us take the Ham, with its 42 subscribers at 100 sovereigns each. With its half forfeit this will very probably be worth £2000; and then the Gratwicke, for three-year-olds, 100 sovereigns, half forfeit, with 66 subscribers! Here for a walk over there would be £2550!—a fortune, by Jupiter Olympus! But this is enticing us wide of Newmarket. The July Stakes—the only affair of any account of the meeting, so far as regards any possible effect on coming events—was won by Old England, beating three miserable rears, not worth the gear they ran in. The off of the racing circle was present; and the exercise-grounds, during the morning promenade à cheval, were alive with couriers of price; but the present sport belated, and "left no mark." In cricket, too, the current so might be below its recent averages.

Better things await us on the food. The Royal Thames Yacht Club Match for a hundred guineas Cup, presented by Captain Cockedge, was sailed on Wednesday, and in spite of an untoward commencement—in a stark calm—it was as exciting a finish as ever was witnessed. Half-a-dozen of the Club's best clippers started, but very soon the contest was left to a pair—Lord Alfred Paget's Mystery and Mr. Wilkinson's Phantom. The Phantom kept together like a couple of quail through the Pelka all the way down to Coal-house Point, and all the way back again to Greenwich, the Phantom winning by some seven minutes, though the lowest in tonnage of the six. This club is remarkable for its close of wagers, restricted to cutters of 25 tons: in fact and all vessels of that class it is unrivalled in the world. The best of the rowing was that exhibited at the Duke of Bedford's regatta, on Monday, at Montagu House. It had one great drawback, however, and that was, the regatta, in the conditions of the matches, of the old custom of "fouling." This unfair and unseemly practice has been discontinued by the amateur clubs, and it does no credit to the professionals.

To the business returns of racing—from the official sources some matters of interest were announced. The first of them was the fact of a testimonial being about to be presented to Lord George Bentinck for his services in exposing the intended robbery disclosed in the celebrated Running Rein case. The subscriptions are near £600 already, and no doubt they will be greatly increased. The plate won by Running Rein in October at Newmarket, has been awarded to the Duke of Rutland; and it is said there are hopes of justice being done on the conspirators jointly and severally concerned in the horse—or rather the horse which purported to be him. The evidence published in the last number of the Street Racing Calendar, in which he was allowed to start for the Derby, discloses a tissue of untruth—to use a courteous figure of speech, rarely to be seen in a similar stage.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The subscribers mustered in large numbers this afternoon, with the intention, we presume, of proceeding with the "settling." They must have been woefully disappointed; for in all our experience we cannot call to mind an occasion to which the term was so grossly misapplied. Many were present who had not the means, and not a few who possessed the wherewithal, but lacked the disposition to pay; others did not condescend to show at all, amongst whom were two or three whose station in society must, we take it, free them from the suspicion of being either unfeeling or unable to meet their engagements. In the absence class we must include some half-dozen individuals who may be fairly pronounced "hopeless." Of course this untoward state of affairs has awfully crippled the ring, and we not calculated to encourage "book-making" on future events. Of the little business transacted we subjoin the averages:—

6 to 4 agst Alice Hawthorn	10 to 1 agst The Spectator (1)	12 to 1 agst Andler (1)
7 to 1 agst Franchise (1)	12 to 1 agst Cannon	18 to 1 agst Elegance Lily

20 to 1 agst Yirago (1)	14 to 1 agst Mistletoe (1)	40 to 1 agst Lycamore (1)

THURSDAY.—There was an average meeting this afternoon, but nothing was done towards improving the "settling," and so little on the race to come, that the alterations were confined to the Liverpool Cup, for which The Era rose to 5 to 1, and The Poor Soldier to 1. The closing quotations were as follow:—

6 to 1 agst Franchise	12 to 1 agst The Courier	14 to 1 agst Trokey

THE THAMES YACHT CLUB.—The boats which form the squadron of this club, or rather that portion of them which usually contest for the prizes, sailed on Wednesday for a silver-gilt cup, presented by Captain Cockedge, and of which the value intrinsically was much beyond what is usually given on occasions of the sort. At a quarter past eleven the start took place, from Greenwich, in the following order:—There was no wind, and it was only the tide which could float the boats down to the accustomed point. The start was thus:—Phantom, 1st; Mystery, 2nd; Gallie, 3rd; Enigma, 4th; Gnome, 5th; Champion, 6th. The boats, after floating down the river as far as Coal-house Point, rounded the buoy in the following order:—Phantom, 17 minutes to four, p.m.; Mystery, second; and the rest in good places. The want of wind, and the state of the atmosphere, rendered this a very dull and tedious match.

CATCER.—The Marylebone Club and the County of Hants, with Fitch and Good.—This match excited considerable interest, and occupied Monday, Tuesday, and part of Wednesday. Lord's was very well attended. The odds, which had been in favour of the Marylebone Club, on Monday morning were much increased on that evening so soon as it was intimated that Box was unable, in consequence of the indisposition of his wife, to come up. Another player, Good, was substituted. The first innings was well fought for; whilst the Marylebone scored 118, their opponents made 90. In the second hands, however, the former completely ran away with the match. Everything was against the country eleven. The Marylebones having won the toss, went in first, and scored 118. The Marylebones, in the second innings, fetched 175, and won by 140 runs.

THE RUNNING REIN DISPUTE.—A day or two ago Mr. Norton, the landlord of the Fir Tree, in Whitechapel, went to Lambeth-street to ask Mr. Norton's advice respecting this affair. It appears that a Derby Sweep had been established at his house, and not well understanding the decision of the Court of Exchequer, the parties who had drawn Running Rein, insisted upon receiving the money, on the ground that that horse had come in first, and threatened an action. Mr. Norton told the applicant that he doubted whether the threatened action could be brought after the decision of a judge and jury, there being such things as verdicts for the defendants, and plaintiffs being saddled with enormous costs. He advised the applicant to pay the money to the holders of Orlando, only taking care to receive a guarantee from the parties that they would hold him harmless.

It is reported that Running Rein has been destroyed to prevent any further discoveries.—Morning Post.

At a general meeting of the Jockey Club held on Saturday last, it was resolved:—"That it being now proved that Running Rein was three years old when he ran for the Two-year-old Plate at Newmarket, Cresswell must be considered the winner of that race, and that the Duke of Rutland is entitled to the Plate.—That the thanks of the Jockey Club are sincerely due, and are hereby offered to Lord George Bentinck, for the energy, perseverance, and skill which he has displayed in detecting, exposing, and defeating the atrocious frauds which have been brought to light during the recent trial respecting the Derby Stakes.—That it is the opinion of this meeting that no publication of the proceedings of the Jockey Club should be made without the consent of the stewards."

POSTSCRIPT.

GRAND REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.—A grand review of all the household troops at present quartered in and near London is intended to take place this day (Saturday) on the ground generally appropriated to such purposes in Hyde Park, a communication having been issued from the Horse Guards to the several regiments to that effect. The troops will comprise the 1st Regiment of Life Guards (Colonel Marquis of Londonderry), the 2nd and 3rd battalions of the Grenadier Guards (Colonel Sir George Bampfey), the 1st and 2nd battalions, making the full force of the regiment, of the Coldstream Guards (Colonel Sir George Bampfey), and it is stated that there will be added a detachment of the Royal Artillery. The troops will arrive on the ground shortly after 10 o'clock. The infantry will be commanded by General Lord Saltoun, and the cavalry by Major-General Nugent. The ground will be kept by the 17th Lancers, of which regiment his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge is Colonel, and which are now stationed at Hounslow.

We understand that the marriage of Lady Elizabeth Georgiana Leveson Gower, the eldest daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, and the Marquis of Lorn, son of the Duke of Argyll, will be solemnised on the first of the ensuing month. The ceremony will take place at Trentham, the noble duke's seat in Staffordshire.

Mr. James Kelly has been elected M.P. for Limerick city, without opposition. Mr. Redington, the member for Dundalk, declines to resign his seat at the request of the Repeal portion of his constituents.

We regret to have to announce the death of John Travers, Esq., a gentleman well known as connected with the Whig interest. His death took place yesterday at half-past twelve o'clock, of a congestion of the brain. Mr. Travers was at the head of the eminent firm of Joseph Travers and Sons, St. Martin's-lane. He was 57 years of age.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.—We understand that no day has yet been appointed by the House of Lords for giving judgment in the writ of error, in the case of Mr. D. O'Connell and the other traversers. It is thought, however, that the opinion of the judges will be delivered in the course of next week.

In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday, William Bromley underwent another examination, which disclosed facts of a most painful nature, and friends to an enormous extent. The debts and liabilities amount in round numbers to about £140,000, principally through breaches of trust, and some of them appeared to have extended as far back as 1824.

POLICE.—BOW-STREET.—THE ATTEMPT TO MURDER IN A SHOOTING GALLERY.—Yesterday (Friday), the young man who was examined on Saturday last, charged with having attempted to commit murder in a Shooting Gallery, was brought before Mr. Twyford for further examination. He was charged under the name of the Hon. William Ross Touchet, with discharging a loaded pistol at William Smith, of 203, High Holborn, with intent to kill and murder him. The prisoner appeared at the bar in deep black, and much paler and more dejected than when first examined. A solicitor attended for the prosecution, and Mr. Clarkson, barrister, appeared with the family solicitor of Lord Audley, the prisoner's elder brother, for the defence. Police constable Lansdale F. deposed that he had been to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where the unfortunate wounded man was lying, and had received the following certificate from Mr. Bayle, the house surgeon, as to the state of his condition:—

I certify that the patient Mr. Smith, although having some on feverishly up to last night is not so well this morning, and I cannot pronounce him out of danger.
St. Bartholomew's Hospital,
Friday, July 12, 1844.
GEOFFREY BAYLE, House-surgeon.

Mr. Twyford said that under these circumstances he had no option but to remand the prisoner for further examination, and he ordered him to be brought up again on a fortnight. Mr. Clarkson remarked that he should have little trouble in clearly proving that the prisoner was of sound mind, and perfectly unconscious of the enormity of the act at the time he committed it. The family of Lord Audley were deeply affected at the occurrence, and had done their utmost to sympathise with the wounded man's family in his misfortune. Mr. Clarkson, applied to have the permission of visiting the prisoner in prison, or that his clerks should do so, for the purpose of preparing his defence. Mr. Romilly, the chief clerk, said there would be no difficulty, as he would be sent to the New Prison. Mr. Twyford said, if there was any difficulty he would remedy it. The prisoner bowed to the court, and was removed from the dock. The hall has entered Mr. Smith's back, close to the spine, and is still in his body, which has rendered his treatment by the surgeons most difficult and dangerous.

ADULTERATION OF BEANS.—The Liverpool Mercury of yesterday contains an account of the detection of a miller in the neighbourhood of Runcorn (Cheshire), to whom large quantities of gypsum (plaster of Paris) had been consigned, for the purpose of mixing with flour, for bread. The officers detected him in the act of mixing it, and flour which was purchased from him was found adulterated with gypsum. They found and seized twenty-three bags of that article, and some further charges for mixing and selling it are to come on at the next meeting of the magistrates. The magistrates are determined to put down this atrocious offence.

On Wednesday night, in consequence of the disturbed state of the colliers in the neighbourhood of Sheffield, a detachment of the 15th Lancers was ordered out on duty, headed by Wilson Overend, Esq., a magistrate of the West Riding.

THE LATE WILL FORDYCE CARR.—On Thursday Mr. Peckham, Barrister-at-law, received the following document, which has been forwarded to Sir James Graham:—"I, William Sanders, now under sentence of transportation for seven years, and about to leave my country, am desirous of retesting all my former statements of my firm belief and conviction of the complete innocence of William Henry Barber of any participation or guilty knowledge whatever of the late transactions in which I or my wife, Lydia Sanders, were concerned, or that he received one farthing more than his professional remuneration. William Henry Barber was an utter stranger to me, until introduced to him by Joshua Fletcher as Thomas Hunt; nor did I after see him, or have any subsequent communication with him until my examination at the Mansion House. I make this declaration from an unfeigned desire of doing all the justice that in my power lies to one whom I have been instrumental in placing in a position of the honour of which I am now too painfully acquainted. W. SANDERS, ship Lord Auckland, off Woolwich, July 10th, 1844." Signed and declared in my presence, this 10th day of July, 1844, on board the Lord Auckland, JOHN J. LANCASTER, Surgeon Superintendent."

SCANDAL AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—A discovery was made at Buckingham Palace, on Thursday morning, that a man employed in the upholstery department of the Lord Chamberlain's office, had committed suicide in one of the store rooms. The deceased was of regular and sober habits, and the cause which has led to the sad catastrophe was unknown.

FOREIGN.

The latest accounts from Paris state that the Spanish Government is at length seriously preparing to make war against Morocco. An army of 6000 men is under immediate orders for Cuba.

THE UNITED STATES.—The packet ship Rockester has arrived at Liverpool with accounts from New York to the 22nd ult. Their contents relate chiefly to Texas, about which, however, nothing of consequence had transpired. The Session of Congress has been brought to a close; but previous to the adjournment of the Senate, Caleb Cushing was confirmed as minister to China, and J. G. Clemens as Charge to Belgium; J. C. Spencer was nominated a second time as Judge of the Supreme Court, and again rejected, the nomination having been laid on the table.

The royal mail steamship, Aeolia, Captain Jenkins, arrived out at Boston on the 20th. Her arrival had an unfavourable effect upon the markets, which were in anything but a flourishing condition.

THE WAVERLEY BALL.

The object of this truly superb ball, was to raise a fund in aid of the general subscription for completing the beautiful Gothic monument in course of erection in the city of Edinburgh, to the memory of Sir Walter Scott; an engraving of which appeared in No. 46, of our journal.

It is difficult to name the identical person with whom the idea originated of embodying in a fancy ball the characters of that great novelist and poet; but to whoever the credit is due, we have only to say, the most sanguine expectations must have been surpassed by the gorgeous and brilliant spectacle the arena of Willis's Rooms presented on Monday night. The object of the promoters of this magnificent assembly has been fully gained. There were between 1200 and 1300 persons of rank and distinction at the ball; no less than 1438 tickets were actually entered, so that upwards of £1000 will pass into the exchequer of the committee.

In an early stage of the arrangements, the Ladies Patronesses were unanimous in their desire to limit the issue of vouchers; but, owing to the extensive demand, it was judged almost a necessity to increase the original number named by 500. On Monday afternoon, vouchers could not be procured for either love or money.

The carriages began to set down company at both entrances to the rooms, at nine o'clock, and there was an uninterrupted succession of arrivals until after one. The arrangements for the reception of the company were admirable.

On this occasion it was necessary, however, to increase the ordinary accommodation in order that the personal comfort of all present should be ensured. The supper-room on the ground-floor was appropriated for dancing, and the staircase leading from that room to the ballroom above was suitably decorated with exotics, &c., and access was gained with the greatest facility to both rooms. The grand ball-room had rows of raised seats arranged at the east end, covered with crimson, exclusively for the use of the Ladies Patronesses, and those beauties of our nobility who were to take part in the fancy quadrilles. The five costly chandeliers, and the girandoles, from which the room was illuminated by hundreds of wax lights, were tastefully ornamented with roses and camellias. In the supper-room an extended table was supplied with the choicest refreshments, and two rooms up stairs were set apart for refectations of a lighter description. Several of the rooms, as well as the staircases, were abundantly embellished by flowering plants and exotics.

The Ladies Patronesses were conducted to the "Card-room." The Tea-room was the locale for the congregation of the ladies and gentlemen taking characters in the Waverley quadrille (the Marchioness of Londonderry's) so that not the slightest confusion arose.

The Duchess of Gloucester arrived at ten o'clock, the leading Ladies Patronesses advancing to meet her Royal Highness.

The Duke of Cambridge, attended by Major Stephens, came shortly after his Royal sister. The Royal Duke wore the uniform of Colonel of the Coldstream Guards, and the riband of the Order of the Garter. The Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz arrived at eleven.

By half-past ten, the Ball-room was crowded to excess. After Teulouque's powerful orchestra had played the National Anthem, the folding doors of the Tea-room were thrown open, and the procession advanced in the following order, the annexed programme setting forth the names and assumed characters of the Marchioness of Londonderry's monster quadrille, the leading attraction of the evening:—

Deplanque, the Master of the Ceremonies, having gained the desired room for the dance, Tolbecque's band brought forward an exquisite quadrille, composed by that artist expressly for the ball, denominated the "Waverley Quadrille," and dancing commenced.

The following position was taken up by the quadrille:—

The fancy quadrilles of Lady Caroline Sandford and the Hon. Mrs. Leicester Stanhope were next danced in succession. They were most effective in all respects, but want of space prevents us from giving the lists.

The Duke of Cambridge and Duchess of Gloucester remained for these quadrilles, and then retired, the intense heat of the room, no doubt, accelerating their departure. The Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz left about the same time.

The Duke of Wellington, as usual at all the balls he now attends, retired early. On leaving the staircase, the noble and gallant Duke was asked his opinion of the ball as a spectacle. His Grace's answer was brief, but to the point—"It is the most beautiful ball I ever saw."

The Ladies Patronesses, after the three fancy quadrilles were finished, demanded a Polka from the orchestra, and then descended to the supper-room, where Scotch reels and country dances were gone through, an extra band being stationed there.

Dancing was prolonged until five o'clock in the morning, no less than twenty-six sets having been danced in the principal ball-room.

The dresses of the Waverley quadrille were scrupulously correct; and it is due to the Marchioness of Londonderry to remark that to her ladyship's exquisite taste in costume are attributed the above accuracy, as well as the success of the entertainment generally. All who remember the Marchioness's magnificent costume ball (the Court of Queen Elizabeth), at Hilderness House, some years since, will appreciate her ladyship's influence in the Waverley "gathering."

In many respects the dresses were equal, if not superior, to those worn at the Queen's last masque.

Our engraving glances at the magnificent assembly, which may be said to have included all the leading personages of rank and distinction. The dresses were as various as they were superb; and even the very names of the great Novelists' productions will suggest the fitness of this statement. We are happy to record that the raising of a memorial to his genius will be extensively aided by means so pleasurable as the Waverley Ball.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

This year Edwin Landseer may be said to have assumed a new and higher style. The neat finish and elaborate handling of his well-known pictures have given way to a breadth, boldness, and free generealisation of manner which indicates an extraordinary advance in the ideal greatness of his art. Of this change (which we have not yet seen noticed) the pictures before us are remarkable specimens. In one of them we see an "Otter Speared" surrounded by a host of its natural enemies (with a portrait of the Earl of Aberdeen's favourite otter-hound, ready to avenger their instinct in his blood. This is a marvellous picture, painted in the rich, splashing, but most graphic style of Snyders. In the second we have a jealous stag, of the elk family, who, sniffing on the gale the approach of a rival lover, prepares, by "inly ruminating on the coming danger," to take the first, and fatal, advantage of his adversary. This picture is full of the poetry of art—that great power which invests the most trifling events in the great drama of Nature with interest, or even sublimity. The sensation of intense cold conveyed by this picture is very extraordinary. The white mountainous horizon is admirably relieved by the deep sky, spangled with stars, and the entire scene reminds us of Byron's "clear, but oh! how cold." The deep shadow of the elk is very effective, and the wintry desolation of the entire scene leaves upon the spectator an impression which not readily passes away.

Other pictures by the same artist exhibit even more strongly the peculiar ability of which we have spoken.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE FINE ARTS.—On Saturday last, there was a sale of valuable pictures at Messrs. Christie and Manson's. Mr. Eastlake upon this occasion purchased, on account of the Government, "The Judgment of Paris," a splendid picture, by Rubens, for which no less than four thousand guineas were given. This picture is remarkable for the brilliancy and transparency of the flesh. The background is most richly coloured. For the other picture—a Guide—Lot and his Daughters, the liberal sum of sixteen hundred guineas was paid. This picture possesses a grandeur of design and an intensity of expression never exceeded. Both these treasures were placed in the National Gallery on Monday, and excited much attention.

The last-received American papers say that the Polka dance had just been introduced into New York, and that it is extremely popular with a portion of the citizens in its near association with the name of one of the Presidential candidates (Polk).

A RIVAL TO LORD ROSS'S TELESCOPE.—A New York paper states that a vessel is shortly expected from Bremen with an immense telescope, which has been manufactured in that country for the National Observatory at Washington. Some idea of its magnitude may be formed when it is known that it is contained in fifteen boxes, three of which are sixteen feet in length. The telescope that is now in use at the observatory, was manufactured by the same optician, and though not half the size of the one on its way to this country, is of great power.

"THE OTTER SPEARED." PAINTED BY E. LANDSEER, R.A.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.—The New York papers contain some curious particulars of the transmission of intelligence between Washington and Baltimore, 34 miles, by the magnetic telegraph. A large number of gentlemen were present to see the operations of this truly astonishing contrivance. Many admitted to the room had their names sent down, and in less than a second the apparatus in Baltimore was put in operation by the attendant in Washington, and before the lapse of a half-minute the same names were returned plainly written. At half-past eleven o'clock, A.M., the question being asked "What the news was at Washington?" the answer was almost instantaneously returned—"Van Buren stock is rising." It was also asked how many persons were spectators to the telegraphic experiments in Washington? The answer was "sixteen;" after which a variety of names were sent up from Washington, some with their compliments to their friends in Baltimore, whose names had just been transmitted to them. Several items of private intelligence were also transmitted backwards and forwards, one of which was an order to an agent in Baltimore not to pay a certain bill. The electric fluid proved too slow, for it had been paid a few minutes before.

POST-OFFICE ESPIONAGE.—The excitement respecting the opening of letters at the post-office is by no means diminished, and as so much public curiosity has been created on the subject, it may not be amiss to give the following amusing anecdote from the Spectator. It may also serve as a hint to Secretaries of State disposed to favour the practice. "Some years ago," says a correspondent, "in conversation with the late Sir Robert L. Stan, I asked him the reason of all the public dispatches to our embassies being sent by special couriers. He said that it was because every dispatch sent by the ordinary post was opened at the Foreign office—and he told me that when he was Secretary of State, our ambassador one day sent for him, gave him a copy of a dispatch from our Secretary for the Foreign Department, evidently written by a Spaniard, and desired him to go to the Minister and ask an explanation of the letter containing the dispatch having been opened. When Sir Robert gave the copy to the Spanish Minister, he without saying a word, rang a bell, and when his Secretary appeared, the Minister gave him the copy, and said in a very angry tone—'How, Sir, could you be so stupid—give the gentleman his dispatch,' and then bowed Sir Robert out of the room." Another Scotch paper also contains a reasonable intimation on the subject. It says "On Thursday last, a Criminal Court was held by Sheriff Jameson, when Ann Troup, daughter of James Troup, manufacturer and postmaster, Strathmiglo, was charged at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal of the county, with having, on or about the 8th of May last, opened a post letter, which had been posted a short time previously by a young man, an inhabitant of the village. She pleaded guilty to the charge, and was sentenced to pay a fine of £1, or to be imprisoned in Cupar gaol for sixty days." It is noticed as a curious coincidence, that Lord Ellenborough has recently been performing the same character of Post-office spy in India, where he is alleged to have commenced a system of secret letter opening at the Post-office, in order to discover who are the correspondents who send saluadvertisements upon his acts to the public newspapers.

RAILWAYS IN ITALY.—The railroad between Turin and Genoa, with two branches between that city and Milan, has obtained the royal sanction. By this road, and those being laid down in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, the north of Italy will be covered with railroads uniting all the principal towns of this portion of the Italian peninsula.

A NEW GUANO ISLAND.—The ship Leo has arrived at the port of Berwick with a complete cargo of guano from Chircha, or the Bug Islands. The captain states that he loaded his vessel (about 435 tons) in 48 hours, the guano lying as thick as 300 feet; and that, had it not been for the trouble of stowing, it might have been done in four or five hours. The Bug Islands are three in number, about fifteen miles off Pisco, in latitude 14 degrees 23 minutes S., longitude 76 degrees 13 minutes.

THE LOSS OF THE MANCHESTER.—The body of Mr. Smith, of Drogheda, wrecked in the ill-fated Manchester, has been picked up; and also the body of a man, supposed to have been one of the crew. The wreck has gradually disappeared, by the breakers washing over it and destroying it.

CANNIBALISM.—A letter from Akaroa, in New Zealand, dated January 28, states that the Mahoris, a tribe of Zealanders, have killed thirty English of the colony, and eaten them. They showed the heads of their victims in triumph. Among them was that of Captain Wakefield, a distinguished inhabitant of Port Nicholson.

A MARVELLOUS SHOWER.—We have heard of its raining cats and dogs—a phenomenon of rare occurrence—but according to the Halifax Guardian of Saturday last, frogs were rained during the late thunder storm, at the breeching festivities of Messrs. Watson, Oates, and Simpson, Crompton, near Kewborough. During the prevalence of the storm, small frogs in abundance actually fell from the aerial regions! The Guardian adds, that notwithstanding the improbability of this relation, it can be attested by several of the workmen who witnessed the fact.

THE GIRLS.—They think of Hymen and can't help sighing. When their lovers forsake them they can't help crying. They sit at the window and can't help spying. Into private matters they can't help prying. To get each a beau they can't help trying. When together their tongues they can't help plying. At the mirror they can't help twisting, and turning, and trying. They screw up their corsets, bring on the consumption, and can't help dying.—American paper.

A GOOD SWALLOW.—A proof of the voracity of the rod may be adduced from what follows:—One was caught at Invergoron last week, in the stomach of which was found a silver-handled pen-knife in the best state of preservation, the carving on the handle being of beautiful workmanship in silver, and not at all injured by its encasement in the belly of the fish.

A PARALLEL.—"By gosh, Pompey," said a nigger to a brother goggle-eyed black—"You should see what I hab bought, such a splendidous particular walking-stick—him so fine, him nearly walk alone." "What de debil wonderful about dat, Massa Cato, for I can tell you I hab got at home a black leopard what run."

THE POET'S GRAVE!

A DRAMATIC SKETCH.

Scene: The Interior of Westminster Abbey, by Moonlight.

Chorus of Enshrined Spirits.

Why hold ye here this Feast of midnight Mirth
Disturbing all our ancient quiet tombs?

(Semi-Chorus.)

See! through the glimmering distance something comes,
A Stranger from the Earth!

(A Spectre appears.)

It is the Bard of Hops whose gentle smile
Lights his own footsteps through the aisle!

Chorus.

Then hail him, hail! since 'tis to greet
A kindred shade that here we meet;
We'll not repine to break our rest;
When CAMERON comes to be our guest!
"Immortal amaranth" is wreath'd
Around his head—he's doom'd to be,
Like us, of Mind's eternity!
A Poet's breath he always breath'd;
Wake! Handel, wake! and let the organ's swell,
With strains undying, this our welcome tell!

First Voice.

When in the lap of Poesie
I was a babe, I chanc'd to spy
A star, precursor of the morn,
Gently lighting every thorn
That had a dew-drop to reflect
The beauty of its mild aspect!
I ne'er had English to bestow
Upon its name, but now I know
'Twas Hope, for here its Genius comes
With self-same light to guide our tombs!

Second Voice.

Certes, I would have held on my sweet sleep,
Un'customed to the duties of the morn!—
But waking up, I have no cause to weep,
Now that I find Death's minister hath shorn
One of Dan Phubus' sunniest locks and sent
The golden ringlet here to deck our graves—
A laurel branch with many a tear besprinkled
It doth appear, and high around these waves
That scarce of beauty which the clouds put on.
Horn's symbol—the mist rainbow, whose blent hues
So softly paint the circuit of the scene
Wide-arch'd across the eastern sky when dews
Of evening weep to see his early fall—
Welcome, Great Poet! to our Sacred Hall!

Third Voice.

Substance, not semblance of that alchymy
By which strange things unite in harmony,
While to the future did thy Muse intend
Fond Memory behind, a faithful friend,
Follow'd and wept a consecrating tear,
Embalming thee with us for ever here!

Fourth Voice.

Ye old Cathedral aisles,
On whom new lustre's shed
By this unmet-for Poet's smiles,
Lay his head
By those kindred spirits he Rival'd so in witchery
Of magic, spell-wrought Poesy!

Chorus.

Sleep! gentle shade!
Within thy honour'd Tomb!
The wreath that Fame bestow'd on Thee
Is doom'd to live eternally—
It cannot fade.
For every Muse has hid it ever bloom!

(The Moon becomes obscured—Silence and darkness fill the Abbey walls.)

FRENCH PRESUMPTION!

AN IMPROVISED.

Incipit optare, et totis Quinquaginta optat.

The Prince de Joinville longs to have a shot
At our old British tars he says:—
Has he the Shannon's Chesapeake forgot
Or Villeneuve in Nelson's days?
If that he wish for something rare to treat him,
We'll say not max our herring boats and beat him,
Bind him then afterwards apprentice to
Some collier's mate to teach him what to do
On that proud element which but obeys
Old England's Flag as Sovereign of the Seas!

LITERATURE.

THE MAGAZINE OF SCIENCE AND SCHOOL OF ARTS. Vol. V. Britain.

This volume contains the collected numbers for the several weeks of a year, illustrated with upwards of 200 wood-cuts. It includes notices of the leading inventions and scientific novelties of the day, and a host of new facts in natural history and experimental philosophy, artistic processes, ornamental manufactures, and the arts of life. The work is soundly edited by Mr. G. Francis, F.L.S.; and the information is popularly conveyed: perhaps, the best feature of the magazine is its great number of processes and practical instructions in the operative arts. It is published at such a rate as to be a marvel of cheapness.

POCKET CHART OF FOREIGN ARCHITECTURE. By ARCHIBALD BARRINGTON, M.D. Bell.

In this chart, the exemplars are arranged chronologically, so as, by a pictured representation, to show the relative antiquity of the architecture of different nations; and to give examples of the Grecian and Roman orders, and of the several styles of architecture which have successively prevailed in various countries. Thus, as Egyptian specimens, we have portions of the temples of Tentyra and Latopolis, one of the Carnac obelisks, a Memnonium statue, and the colossal head of the Sphinx; as Indian, the Caves of Elephanta; as Celtic and Cyclopean, Carnac, Stonehenge, Avebury, and Kist's Coty House. The Grecian is represented by the Parthenon, at Athens; the Roman, by the Arch of Trajan; Byzantine and Romanesque, by Churches at Ancona and Worms; Pointed, or Gothic, by the Church of St. Ouen, at Rouen; and Italian, by the Gondi and Michelozzi Palaces at Florence. Appended to the key to the chart is a list of buildings in London, in which the different styles are exemplified. Altogether, this must be regarded as a very useful little aid for the inquiring traveller.

COMMUNICATIONS ON COAL MINES. By JOHN MURRAY, Ph.D. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

This pamphlet contains a series of sensible letters, addressed to the South Shields Committee for investigating the causes of Accidents in Coal Mines. The topics are the "After-damp, and its remedies; scientific instruments; ventilation; safety-lamps; and a substitute for gunpowder, in blasting coal." There is, likewise, a Supplement of useful hints on warming and ventilating churches, and other public buildings. Dr. Murray's unwearying scientific benevolence deserves honourable mention; and this production of a few pages is a portion of his wisdom-tempered scheme.

FACTORIES AND THE FACTORY SYSTEM. By W. COOKE TAYLOR, LL.D. How.

This well-timed brochure may serve to enlighten "the plain country gentlemen" of a certain house upon "that form of industrial organization which is usually called 'The Factory System,'" which, however, it neither attacks nor defends; but it explains what its nature is, and what are its results. The question is, at this moment, of paramount importance; and, as Dr. Taylor's is not a partisan pamphlet, but has been drawn up from parliamentary documents and personal examination, its circulation will, doubtless, effect great good.

A GUIDE TO LIFE ASSURANCE. By A. YOUNG, Groombridge.

A pamphlet, containing the origin and progress of the system of Life Assurance, its working and benefits, with directions for effecting a policy—matters of considerable importance in a community of saving habits, such as are the English people.

REMEDIES SUGGESTED FOR SOME OF THE EVILS WHICH CONSTITUTE "THE PERILS OF THE NATION." Seeley and Co.

We have little faith in state doctors, even when regularly "called in;" and crotchety schemes upon paper are not a whit less valuable in our sight. The present volume, however, of nearly 300 pages, appears by its goodly store of facts illustrating the author's position, to be worthy of careful examination. It is divided into two sections—the State of the Nation and Remedies Suggested. The author sets out by showing the vast wealth and capability of the country, whilst the great bulk of the population is immersed in misery and disaffection. He next aims to prove the root of the evil to be the neglect of the Bible, and the setting up of the writings of political economists instead; the growth of the evil to be the idolatry of wealth and money-making; and the evil in its fruit, to be selfishness and oppression, as shown in our agricultural, factory, and trading districts. The remedies suggested are the restoration of God's Word to paramount authority; church extension and national colonization; the lightening of the labour-market; the cottage allotment system; improvement of the dwellings of the poor; amelioration of the New Poor Law; and the advancement of morals. In the latter, the state of the marriage law, beer and gin shops, cigar shops, neglect of Sabbath observance, and railway travelling on Sundays, come in for the author's several animadversions. Nevertheless, he does not probe the wound and leave it to heal of itself; but he suggests a remedy, which, with his recapitulation, fills one hundred pages. Of course, the examination of their soundness would far exceed our limits; but, we repeat that the book is well stored with facts and authorities, so that the reader may judge how far the author's inferences are correct. Usually, books of this class are made up of opinions unsupported by other than the writer's ipse dixit, and accordingly of little worth.

RECORDS OF ISRAEL. By GRACE AGUILAR. Mortimer.

These "Records" consist of two tales "of a people of whose modern history so little is generally known, that the word Jew is associated only with biblical and ancient recollections, or as connected with characteristics, feelings, and spiritual incitements, wholly distinct from those which relate to man in general." The first is a story of the celebrated Edict of 1492, made at the instigation of the inquisitor, Torquemada, by which from half a million to eight hundred thousand unconverted Jews were banished from Spain; this being the heaviest affliction which had befallen the Jews since the destruction of their Temple, and final dispersion. In the second tale, of 1755—"The Escape"—the incidents and actors are taken from the history of the Jews during their secret existence in Portugal and Spain. The author is evidently of the people whose cause she so zealously and gracefully advocates in this little volume; and, as its general object is to correct some vulgar errors concerning Jewish feelings, faith, and character, we hope the work may be extensively circulated.

A BRIEF HISTORICAL ACCOUNT OF THE CASTLE AND MANOR OF SUDELEY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE. Okell, Tewkesbury.

In No. 99 of our journal appeared a view of Sudeley Castle, with some descriptive details, which appear to have been borrowed, by a Correspondent, without acknowledgment, from the little work before us. This explanation is due to its author; and we are pleased to gather from him that not only is the castle being architecturally restored, but the walls are to be re-bung with tapestry, the windows refilled with ancient stained glass; and some very interesting additions to the pictures have been made from the celebrated Strawberry Hill collection. The "brief account" is carefully compiled, and is indispensable to the visitor of taste to Sudeley.

SPRING BUDS, SUMMER FLOWERS, AUTUMN LEAVES, AND WINTER HOURS. By SAMUEL SHEPHERD, F.S.A. Hatchard and Son.

A small volume of poems and sonnets, written at various periods during the space of thirty years; and now published under distinguished patronage, to which, by their religious and moral tone, they are entitled.

THE HAND-BOOK TO PARIS. Eighth Edition, Enlarged. Strange.

The great merit of this guide is, that it contains much practical information upon matters likely to be serviceable to the traveller in France; and, as the author has lived in that country more than 20 years, and gone over the ground which he describes at least fifty times, his little volume is entitled to special mention.

ELECTRICAL EXPERIMENTS. By S. FRANCIS, F.L.S. D. Francis.

This is a cleverly arranged collection of some five hundred experiments in the science of Electricity, assembled from various accredited sources, as well as from the author's own practice; he having been accustomed to make all his own apparatus, and to lecture on natural philosophy, for many years. His treatise is stated in the preface to contain more experiments and illustrations than any other work upon the subject; and all the facts that are known with certainty, relative to frictional electricity. When we consider the importance of electricity during the last few years, and its daily increasing attractiveness in explanation of the most stupendous phenomena, we need scarcely recommend this work to the reader's attention: it is neatly printed, and liberally illustrated with wood-cuts.

A TREATISE UPON THE PRACTICAL DRAINAGE OF LAND. By HENRY HUTCHINSON. Houlston and Stoneman.

Draining, as one of the first principles of Agriculture, has, of late years, excited considerable attention, both as to its importance and the mode of executing it. The volume before us is the work of a practical drainer: it is well arranged in sections treating of the several varieties of drainage, that on Boring Artesian Wells, or "bore-holes," as the author terms them, is very striking, from the utility of boring having been as yet but very little considered in connection with drainage.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW. No. I. W. P. Kennedy.

The object of this new appearance in the "Periodical" field is "to meet the increased intelligence, in connexion with the strong religious feelings of the age." Nevertheless, it is not intended to be a theological journal: "no subject that can occupy the interest of a well-cultivated mind will be excluded. But topics of every kind will be treated by individuals accustomed to view them in their highest relations; and papers of a more strictly religious character will be frequently introduced," though without advocating the distinguishing peculiarities of any particular sect, and merely by referring to those great principles upon which all the evangelical communions are agreed. Such are the principles of this new Review, just issued from Edinburgh. Its table of contents presents a most attractive array of first-class subjects, as Cuvier—Ethiopia—the Corn Trade—Mrs. Grant's Letters—the Crusades—Tractarian Poetry—Domestic Life in Sweden—Sewell's Christian Morals—the Policy of Party—and Lord Jeffrey's contributions to the "Edinburgh Review." The opening paper contains an analysis of the brilliant Eloge Historique de Baron Cuvier, by M. Flourens, Secretary to the French Academy of Sciences, and includes a brief history of the life of Cuvier, his labours in natural science, and the splendid discoveries to which they conducted him; for, "it was reserved for Cuvier," says the reviewer, "to show that the laws of classification, and the philosophy of natural history, could rest on no other foundation but an intimate knowledge of the structure and organization of natural bodies. In this manner, Comparative Anatomy became the handmaid of Zoology; and on these two sciences did Cuvier erect the new science of Fossil Remains, which has itself become the basis of Geology, and thus revealed to us so many wonders."

The second paper is a resumé of Major Harris's Journey to the Christian Court of Shoa, in Abyssinia. The article on the Crusades has for its text-book Michaud's celebrated Histoire des Croisades, the interest of which has been resuscitated of late by a disposition among the writers of La Jeune France to applaud the Crusades, and to overawe the suffrages of all history against them. The Poems of the Rev. Mr. Faber and Lord John Manners, "ardent and accomplished disciples of the Oxford school of theology," are the pro of the paper on Tractarian Poetry; and Miss Bremer's novels, those of the article on Swedish life. The concluding paper on Lord Jeffrey and the Edinburgh Reviewers is a sparkling piece of criticism.

FACTS AND FANCIES. By GEORGE GODWIN, F.R.S., &amp;c.

A volume of gracefully written tales and sketches, as its title implies, alternating fiction with truth; replete with good, taste, and forming a very pleasing acquisition for the drawing-room table. Here is a specimen:—

POMPEII.

And this is Pompeii? Magnificent devastation! Before me, in solemn majesty, stands the Temple of the Goddess Fortune; behind me lies that which was once a city, lifeless and motionless—a body without a soul. The rosy sun blazes fiercely in the heavens; the world is up and stirring, but here it is still as night; not a bird, not a thing of life is there to break the melancholy, sepulchral silence.

Two thousand years ago, a countless multitude occupied this place, full of life, hope, and joy—possessing the same powers, prejudices, and passions which now rule us; nay, on this very spot may Cæsar have stood, surrounded by listening crowds; who have all perished, leaving little save these stones to tell of the things that were. I feel awe-stricken and heart-sick; and dare not to move, lest my own footsteps should make more dreadful the stillness which exists. Whence comes this sickness, this involuntary yearning of the heart? It is from sympathy with those who are as I would be; it is from innate knowledge of mine own evanescent nothingness.

On a heap of rubbish at my feet lies a small ring, which once perhaps decked the finger of some proud Pompeian dame; that little worthless trifle has been laid buried, while twenty generations of the rich and miserable, the virtuous and the bad, have passed from off the earth. That is unimpaired; of them there is no trace; the elements which composed their bodies have entered into other combinations, and their original form is lost. Stay! In nature nothing is or can be destroyed; it may be changed by commixture in proportion and in appearance; it may be now as air and then as water; still the same particles are in being, and ever will be until the end. Here then I see consolation; their minds (whether in heaven, whether in paradise with the hosts, or whether animating some other form upon the earth) must also still exist; and those whom I have deplored are not dead; they have merely changed their dwelling-place.

FRENCH—SPANISH—GERMAN—ITALIAN—&amp;c., WITHOUT A MASTER. Gilbert, Paternoster-row.

We have heard of hand-books to the Continent without a guide, but we very much oppose that the ear is not so fit to go alone as the eye, or we should not have so much patois in every language all over the earth. What becomes of the phrases, "Castilian purity," "Parisian accent"—"lingua Toscana in bocca Romana," if like one bird learning another's song, the ear be not the informant of the peculiar music or harshness of a language? Moreover, no language possesses all the sounds of all others, and therefore it is vain to attempt their description by any visual combinations. The Spanish, for instance, to represent which there is no equivalent sound in our language; and the Englishman is referred to another pronunciation of which he knows nothing at all. With this exception, the works in question are admirably conceived, and will serve as capital companions to even a little oral instruction.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS CONVERTED INTO AN EPIC POEM. By C. C. V. G. Shields and Son, Parsonstown.

This paraphrase has been undertaken at the suggestion of the late Dr. Adam Clarke, in his "Postscript to a Life of John Bunyan." The Doctor was of opinion that "The Pilgrim's Progress" would be more generally read, and more abundantly useful to a particular class of readers, were it turned into decent verse. The whole body of the dialogue and description might be preserved perfect and entire; and the task would not be difficult, as the work has the complete form of an epic poem, the versification alone excepted. But a poet, and a poet only, could do this work; and such a poet, too, as is experimentally acquainted with the work of God on his own soul. Whether C. C. V. G. possesses these high qualifications may be a matter of dispute. Here is a specimen:—

Then saw I in my dream, while thus they speak,
A miry slough the scene's fair prospect break;
Sunk in the middle plain its slime appear'd,
They mark'd it not until its banks they near'd:
This slough was nam'd Despond, and suddenly
Amid its mire, our travellers struggling lie:
There wallowing, begm'd with mud and dirt,
And grievously by gathering perils girt;
Christian, by reason of the load he bore,
Began to sink, o'ercome by drear despair;
Then Pliable, with taunting tone of woe,
Cried, "Neighbour Christian, where, pray, art thou now?"
"Truly I know not," Christian meekly said,
While troubled thoughts oppress'd his heart and head.

The book is, certainly, a curiosity in its way: the paraphrase is preceded by a Life of Bunyan, by R. H. Wetherell, Esq.; and the volume concludes with a Key to the Pilgrim's Progress, by the paraphraser, in which he notes: "It is a curious fact, and one not generally known, that a complete design of a Pilgrim's Progress is to be found in Lucian's 'Hermotimus'; it is not to be imagined that Bunyan could have seen it there, from the limited educational advantages he possessed; yet the obvious allusion occurred to his mind, untaught as it was, in a similar arrangement with that suggested by Lucian."

THOUGHTS ON DUELING, AND ITS ABOLITION. Nickisson.

A well-timed pamphlet, recommending, as the only possible, effectual step to prevent Duelling—"the establishment of a Court of Honour, for the trial and cognizance of those affairs for which gentlemen now demand of each other satisfaction; one which will give them an opportunity of appealing to their peers, to judge whether their conduct or that of their antagonist has been that of a gentleman, or unworthy of a gentleman, instead of having to appeal, as at present, to the pistol-barrel." Still, the writer thinks Government must act as the central power.

THE HAND-BOOK TO GIBRALTAR. By an Old Inhabitant. Cowie.

A guide-book to the Rock of Gibraltar, with lithographic illustrations, is a true sign of these locomotive times. The powers of steam have, indeed, enlarged our sphere of observation. "Steamers," says our hand-book writer, "run to Spain and Portugal; and the Rock of Gibraltar, being restored to its former dignity of a city, and possessing, for the first time, a bishop (there are now two), with a cathedral, tempts our metropolitan to become a cosmopolite, to undergo the horrors of an eight days' voyage, with the advantage of seeing both Lisbon and Cadiz." The country is well described in the Hand-book; and all the information that a tourist can require, is there very neatly given.

BACKGAMMON: ITS HISTORY AND PRACTICE. By the Author of "Whist." Bogue.

A smart, ironical preface, ushers in this neat little manual of the "brave winter's sport," teeming with "the dainty delicacies of Kenny Meadows' pencil"—each design a little history. The author divides his subject into Preliminary, History, Instructions, Chances, Technicalities, and Laws; and each chapter is as lively and rattling as the box and dice itself. Here is a humorous outline of the game:—

Backgammon has always been a domestic, a conjugal game; it is not so abstract as to banish conversation on general topics; it does not, like chess, or love, or art, or science, require the entire man, whilst the ever-recurring rattle of the dice keeps the ear alert and the attention alive; it has often been found an anodyne to the gout, the rheumatism, the azure devils, or "the yellow spleen." Pains and physicians, slims and law suits are forgotten when—

The quick dice
In thunder leap from the box, awake
The sounding gammon.

RE-OPENING OF YORK MINSTER.—York Minster was re-opened on Friday week, after having undergone a complete restoration. The Very Rev. W. Cockburn, D.D., the Dean, preached on the occasion.

THE BRAZILIAN TARIFF.—According to the Manchester Guardian, a copy of the new Brazilian tariff has reached town, although it has not been officially promulgated, and it is stated that it will cause a very large increase in the duties on all the principal articles of export from this country. It is pretty generally known, that the duties levied on articles of British manufacture, at the present time, though nominally at a uniform rate of 15 per cent., amount in reality to 21 per cent. ad valorem, but, by the tariff proposed, these duties will vary in amount; those articles which constitute the bulk of the exports from this country will be subjected to duties, varying from 30 to 60 per cent. ad valorem, which will, no doubt, have a very serious effect upon British commerce. For this result we have only to blame the restriction which our own laws have placed upon the trade of Brazil, by prohibitory duties upon her staple articles of produce.

A NEW COMET.—The discovery of a new comet, in the constellation of Hercules, was announced on Tuesday at the sitting of the Paris Academy of Sciences. It is slightly nebulous, but the observations appear to have been as yet imperfect. At the same sitting, M. Gauthier gave an account of some new observations of the spots on the sun's disk. He is of opinion that the years in which the greater number of these spots exist, are sensibly colder than when they are comparatively few in number.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

On Thursday night last that old and deserving favourite of not only the musical public, but also of a large circle of private friends, Puzzi, il primo cornista del mondo, took his benefit at this house, and if we were to judge by appearances, a benefit in the full sense of the word it was. The opera was "Anna Bolena," with the magnificent cast of Anna Bolena, Grisi; Henry VIII., Lablache; Percy, Moriani; the page, Sweeten, Fuvanti; and Jane Seymour, by a Signora Giuseppina Rosetti, from the Grand Opera at Vienna, who, if she be not first-rate, is a singer of very distinguished physical and cultivated powers. Her aria in the second act was very brilliantly executed, and her duet with Grisi deserved the highest praise. Moriani sang divinely in the part of Percy, particularly in the duet with Grisi in the second act, and the trio with her and Lablache. The impersonation of Henry, by this last mentioned truly great artist, is beyond all eulogy. He seemed to have stepped out of an old Holbein frame. The désœuvré played his delightful Fantasia on Bellini's beautiful quartetto, from the "Partisan," "A te o cara," and another trava from the "Lucia." Next came the second act of "Guillaume Tell," with Persiani and Mario, the whole winding up with "La Vivandière," forming altogether one of the most delightful evening's treats that could be enjoyed by musician or accomplished amateur. A word en passant to Mr. Lumley; let him select a more chic list of box-keepers, or correct the manners of those in his present employ. The house was crowded to excess.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Gennaro, in "Lucrezia Borgia," is the next part, and unfortunately the last, in which Moriani will appear before the English public. The tragic nature of the character is said to suit admirably his dramatic style of singing, and already has created the utmost enthusiasm by the earnestness of his manner, and the beauty of his intonation in this part.

It is said that Mr. Webster, of the Haymarket, is about selecting a play from the rejected of those sent in by the competitors of the prize comedy, of £500. He is so to it that Webster will select a play far superior to "Quid pro Quo."

THE ATTEMPT TO CREATE A DISTURBANCE AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The two individuals who a short time since caused a disturbance by distributing bills at her Majesty's Theatre, with a view to force Mr. Lumley to engage Signor Salvi, having consented to pay £50 each to stop proceedings, the lesser has kindly consented to do so on condition that the money shall be distributed to ten different hospitals to be named by him.

QUID PRO QUID.—A brief correspondence has taken place between Mr. C. Mathews and Mrs. Gore on the subject of the allotment of the characters in this comedy. Mrs. Mathews having stated that Mrs. Gore had expressed her regret that there was no part in the comedy which she could offer to Mrs. Mathews, and that Mrs. Gore had suggested that Miss Julia Bennett should play the character originally assigned to herself. The fair authoress in her answer considers the letter of Mr. Mathews contradictory of the statement in the preface that he had refused the part offered to him, on the plea that he was too old for it. Mrs. Gore adds rather naively, and probably by way of quid pro quo for the letter, that perhaps the same reason determined Mrs. Mathews to decline the part marked down for her.

THE MODEL OF VENICE.—This beautiful work of art has been purchased by Mr. Tyler, the catering proprietor of the Surrey Zoological Gardens, where it is to be exhibited, and where, no doubt, it will prove an attractive feature.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The ground between the eastern front of the New Royal Exchange, and the rear of the houses in Finch-lane, is being now built upon by the direction of the trustees of Magdalen College, to whom the property belongs. There will be a line of houses from Cornhill to Threadneedle-street, for which purpose the church of St. Street Fink will be pulled down, the brick of which it is said will be transferred to a church which will be erected on the site of what was formerly Criplegate workhouse, Moor-lane. In excavating for the foundation of the new houses, at a depth of about twelve feet, a large quantity of common Roman and of Roman tessellated pavement was found. This noble edifice is rapidly approaching completion, and at present no obstacle is apprehended that will delay its being opened beyond the early part of September. The Grassham Committee have not as yet appointed the day, although preparations are going on to celebrate the event, so as to render the ceremony of an imposing and interesting character, it being clearly understood that her Majesty, accompanied by her august consort, will honour the city of London by opening it in person. The exact arrangements have not been as yet determined.

POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.—The Secret Committee on the Post-office, at again on Thursday at twelve o'clock, Lord Sandon, Chairman. The Earl of Aberdeen, we understand, was the first witness examined.

ASSOCIATION OF IRELANDERS.—The meeting to which we alluded last week to form a society to promote social and intellectual intercourse among the Irish, took place on Saturday last, at the Freemasons' Tavern. The Marquis of Clanricarde presided. Mr. Emerson Tennent, M.P., who moved the first resolution, remarked, that whilst the Welsh and the Scotch, and even numerous counties of England, had each some point of reunion, Ireland was without the enjoyment of any such association of her resident natives in the Metropolis. He observed that multitudes of young Irishmen of genius and education came to seek for employment in England, and yet could hardly calculate upon any assistance from their own countrymen. With a view, therefore, of promoting the association of

COLONEL PEEL'S "ORLANDO," THE WINNER OF THE DERBY. DRAWN BY J. F. HERRING, SEN., ESQ.

And Wood replies, I've been no doubt
Imposed on by that bad man, Goodman.

The Judge then cries this cause has failed,
And every one I think must see by;
Goody is bad; so in your hands
Jury! defendant's verdict leave I!

With this remark, which here to make,
Justice—too much disgusted—begs;
That Lords perform a blackguard feat,
When they begin to bet with Legs!

With this Peel's counsel turns and says,
We've gained, now what are you going to stand O?
What, but a very feast of gold,
Part of stakes that won Orlando!

The great interest excited by "The Running Rein Case," and the verdict for the proprietor of "Orlando," induces us to present to our readers the above portrait, from a drawing by Mr. J. F. Herring, sen.

Orlando stands 15 hands 1 inch high; and his colour is a bright bay; he has a white face, and white hind legs; is a wiry animal, and very blood-looking; his head is lean, and full of character; his neck light; shoulders oblique; good fore and back ribs; deep in the brisket; good arms and thighs, and flat legs; rather long pasterns, with capital feet; he is one of the best tempered animals perhaps, as a race horse, that we have ever seen.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, ST. JAMES'S.

Many readers of the Court Circular may remember "the early service," "the daily service," and "the afternoon service," at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, which, during the London season, are attended by many persons of distinction:

the Duke of Wellington and Sir Frederick Trench, for example, are regular attendants at the early service. The history and details of the establishment, are not, however, so well known.

The Chapel Royal, then, is believed to be the same that belonged to the ancient hospital, suppressed by Henry VIII. It was retained, in accordance with the good old custom of attaching a place of worship to all noble residences, beneath whose roof the lord of the manor and his humblest ploughman might meet to worship the God of rich and poor, in whose sight each had equal claims to regard. It is a Royal Peculiar, and, as such, is exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction. Divine service is performed here in the same manner as at our various cathedrals. Its establishment consists of a Dean, usually the Bishop of London, who has a salary of £200 per annum; a Lord High Almoner; a Sub-Almoner, whose salary is £57 11s. 8d. per annum; a Clerk of the Queen's Closet, who has beneath his jurisdiction three deputy clerks, and a closet keeper, the latter of whom is allowed £43 per annum, besides £10 for necessities, and £31 5s. for linen and washing. Besides these, there are one or two inferior officers, such as choristers, &c.

This is not the only ecclesiastical foundation belonging to what is termed the Queen's household. There are in all forty-eight chaplains, that preach in turn before the Royal Family, though of that number but few of them perform service in the Chapel Royal, and we know not that all have salaries. In addition to those chaplains, there are ten priests in ordinary; but several of these offices are held by one and the same person.

There is one relic of the old Papal times still lingering among these officers, or, if now abolished, was in existence as late as 1815, when the Rev. Dr. Henry Fly held the office. It is that of Confessor to the Royal Household: of course, as auricular confession is not a tenet of our church, the situation is happily a sinecure. It brings a salary of thirty-six pounds ten shillings only to its holder: the reverend gentleman who held the office in 1815, was also one of the ten priests in ordinary.

There are, in addition to those officers, sixteen gentlemen of the Chapel Royal, who have each a salary of £73 yearly; and five Clergymen, and eight Gentlemen in Waiting.

The organist and composer has a salary of £146 yearly; the ordinary organist, £41 10s.; the violist, £48, and the lutanist, £41 10s. yearly; but, as these instruments form so part of the modern choir, these places are sinecures, generally held by two Gentlemen of the Chapel. The musical service of the Chapel has been famed, probably, from the time of the founder, Henry VIII., we know, was not only a lover of music, but himself an accomplished musician; and we infer this part of his household to have been on a scale of grandeur and magnificence in accordance with his well-known taste for splendour and display.

The sergeant of the vestry has a salary of £182 2s. per annum; the groom of the vestry, £51 12s.; the yeoman of the vestry, £54 15s.; and there is also paid for maintaining and teaching ten children of the Chapel Royal (choristers), £320 per annum.

In the time of George III., the King, when in town, was always preceded to the Chapel Royal by a nobleman carrying the sword of state, and attended by the Lords and Grooms of the Bedchamber, the Gold Staff Officer, and other officers in waiting; accompanied by the various members of the Royal Family, and such of the foreign and native nobility as happened to be in the palace at the period. The heralds and pursuivants at arms also attended, the procession being closed by the band of gentlemen pensioners.

The King was indeed a most regular attendant. Madame d'Arblay, in her memoirs, recently published, describes the perseverance with which he continued his religious duties there during 1747, at the time when he was in the prime of life, and she was one of the robing-women. According to her account he perseveringly attended prayers in November, until the Queen and family, dropping off one by one, used to leave the King, the parson, and his Majesty's equery, to "freeze it out together."

Previous to the addition of a Chapel to Buckingham Palace, her Majesty and the Court were constant attendants at the Chapel Royal, St. James's.

The chapel is situated on the western side of the court-yard of the palace. It is a small square in plan, possessing few striking features, being altogether plain and unostentatious. In this point, it is in perfect keeping with the palace itself. A gallery runs round one half of the building, the centre portion of which, immediately over the entrance doorway, is appropriated to her Majesty and suite. The ceiling is very superb, and is one of the earliest specimens of the new style, introduced by Holbein into England, in 1546. The form of the whole is flat, with a slight curve or rise, at the two long sides; the rib-mouldings are of wooden frame work, suspended to the roof above; the panels have plaster grounds, and on these are painted various heraldic subjects, the centres being Tudor emblems. The subject is gilt, shaded boldly with bistre; the roses glazed with a red colour, and the arms emblazoned in their proper colours; leaves painted dark green, ornamented each subject; and the general ground of the whole was light blue. The mouldings of the ribs are painted green, and some are gilt; the under-side, dark blue, with a running gilt ornament. This ceiling has undergone several repairs; in one of which the blue ground was painted white. In 1836, when the chapel was enlarged, under the direction of Sir Robert Smirke, the blue ground was discovered, as were some of the mottoes in the small panels.

This ancient building is celebrated for its association with the fortunes of Charles I. during that ill-fated Sovereign's sojourn in the Isle of Wight. It is still used as a school-house, and is exteriorly built of the soft freestone found in the island, shaped into rough resemblance of bricks; but, at the angles of the building, the stones are neatly squared: parts of the stacks of chimneys shown in the engraving are built of brick. The school-room is the apartment in which Charles and the Commissioners met: it is panelled with oak, which is generally in a dilapidated condition. At the east end of the room, within the memory of a very old man, was a canopy, beneath which, tradition says, the King's chair was placed. On the north side of the room, and near the canopy, are two doors, through one of which—that nearest to the window—Charles had communication with his partisans; though it is more probable that the King entered the room by this door. The room below has some tolerably ornamental carving, but of a later date than the main building.

MEETING OF THE IMPROVED ORDER OF OLD FRIENDS, IN FINSBURY-SQUARE.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE IMPROVED ORDER OF OLD FRIENDS.

Monday was the day appointed for the celebration of the anniversary of this institution, which is stated to number in its list nearly 40,000 members. The place of muster was Finsbury-square, and thither the several lodges passed in procession, each accompanied by its banner and band of music, committee bearing ornamented wands, and wearing their insignia of office. The weather was brilliant, and the appearance of the banners very splendid, there being no lack of gold and silver upon these huge floating sheets of emblazonry. The bands played lively airs, and, making allowance for the vast numbers, the line of procession was well kept. At the place of muster, represented in our engraving, the scene was that of a general holiday, and there seemed to be but one feeling of satisfaction and joy pervading the "Old Friends," and the vast assemblage of spectators. The several lodges having formed in the square, proceeded to the large tavern known as Highbury Barn, and there passed the day in festivity. There were in the entire procession nearly 2000 persons, 74 banners, and 30 bands of music; and the moving masses of spectators were astounding.

The respectable appearance of the "Old Friends" could scarcely fail to impress the spectator with associations of full employment, and the very healthy condition of "well-to-do." The "Order" is an improved Friendly Society, one of those institutions which, when founded upon correct principles, and prudently conducted, are beneficial both to their members and to the community at large. Like most of that which is excellent in English habits, these societies are of very ancient origin, for the guilds, or social corporations of the Anglo Saxons, seem on the whole to have been friendly associations, made for mutual aid and contribution to meet the pecuniary exigencies which were perpetually arising from burials, legal exactions, penal mulcts, and other payments or compensations. The quality of the members of these societies was not, however, confined to the operative classes. And it is now no longer necessary to establish a mutual guarantee against legal exactions and penal mulcts; and the objects of friendly societies are limited to an insurance against the natural contingencies of sickness, infirmity, and death. Nevertheless, they are clearly to be traced to the customs of our ancestors a thousand years since.

GREAT PUBLIC MEETING AT GUERNSEY, TO ADDRESS THE QUEEN.

Our readers may remember that certain injurious and unfounded imputations have lately been cast upon the loyalty of the inhabitants of the island of Guernsey; inasmuch that the Government were induced, by the representations of the Governor, to despatch a number of troops to the island to suppress the imaginary insurrection. To repudiate altogether this insinuation, the islanders met in great numbers on the 2nd instant, to assure the Queen of their unshaken attachment and allegiance to her Majesty's person and Government. The day will hereafter be a memorable one in the history of the island; for up to this period a general public meeting of the inhabitants of Guernsey was a thing unknown. At all former times, and under the most urgent circumstances, the opinions of the people of the island had no other organs of expression than the States, the Court, and parochial meetings of the rate-payers. By many, indeed, it was maintained that by such means only could the public wishes be proclaimed in a constitutional manner, and that a general meeting of the inhabitants would be subversive of constitutional order. There were others, however, who could not subscribe to this opinion. The question was mooted by this party as an experiment; and, it being hailed by respectable persons of all classes, Tuesday was the day fixed for this "novel and interesting event."

As early as three o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the island were on the alert, as if in preparation for a national holiday. In the town of St. Peter-Port, workmen were busy in every direction hanging flags and garlands, and raising arches of evergreens and flowers brought in cart-loads from the country.

The public promenade, known as "the New Ground," was judiciously fixed on as the place of meeting, where a substantial and capacious building, which afterwards gave accommodation to upwards of 200 persons, was erected by Mr. Daniel de Putron. The centre was ornamented with the Royal Standard of England, whilst the Union Jack floated at each corner.

Twelve o'clock was the hour appointed for the meeting, but long before this the crowd commenced to pour in, and by noon there was collected such an assemblage of both sexes as was never before witnessed in Guernsey. Some have estimated them at 10,000 and others at 16,000, but they may safely be stated at from 12,000 to 15,000.

The assemblage consisted of both sexes, and of all classes, and as the meeting was considered almost as a religious solemnity, all were dressed in their holiday attire, so that the mass presented a most animating appearance. Punctually at twelve o'clock, the gallant and venerable General Sir Thomas Saumarez, who the day previous had completed his 84th year, ascended the hustings, and was loudly cheered by the multitude, the band, which was placed on a platform in front of that construction, at the same time playing the national anthem, and the whole of the assemblage being uncovered. There were on the hustings the Very Reverend the Dean, the Reverend Thomas Brock, Commissary of Guernsey, and the greater part of the Clergy and Ministers of the island, the bailiff and most of the magistrates, Sir Thomas Mansell, R.N., Lieut.-Col. Lane, Major Rynd, and a very considerable number of naval and military officers, both native and British, together with Colonels and Officers of the Militia, and many of the most respectable of the inhabitants.

The business of the meeting having been opened by the venerable chairman, resolutions were passed, and a dutiful and loyal address voted to her Majesty, and the enthusiastic shouts of the multitude; after which the meeting was addressed by several gentlemen. The platform was then vacated, the signing of the address commenced, and in a short time 500 signatures were affixed to it. From the New Ground, the vast assembly dispersed, to witness the decorations in the town; at about seven o'clock, a vessel, of about 150 tons, was launched from the building-yard of Mr. Machon; the Independent Club-house was brilliantly illuminated, fireworks were displayed, and the rejoicings were kept up till midnight.

Our engraving, from an artistical sketch, obligingly forwarded by a correspondent at Guernsey, represents the New Ground during the meeting.

GREAT MEETING AT THE NEW GROUND, GUERNSEY.

FITZ-STEPHEN.

BY
"THE OLD SAILOR."

"The great King of Kings
Hath in the table of his law counsailed,
That thou shalt do no murder.
Take heed, for he holds vengeance in his hand,
To hurt upon those heads that break his law.—SHAKESPEARE.

From the earliest period of English naval history, the name of Fitz-Stephen stands recorded as belonging to the bravest and most skilful mariners of the British Isles. When William the Norman invaded England, a Fitz-Stephen steered the gorgeous vessel that conveyed the Conqueror to his future kingdom, and it was the grandson of this man who commanded the White Ship, which was wrecked on the Cote du Raz, when Prince William, the worshipped of his father's heart, together with the flower of the English and Norman nobility, perished in the ocean, and found at the same moment, a death of violence and an unblest grave. Fitz-Stephen was not himself to be blamed for this—the catastrophe was owing to the intoxication of his pilots, who had drunk deep of the ruddy wine, in honour of their royal and noble freight. But the devoted commander would not survive the lost heir to the throne of England—he had gone down with his vessel when she first sank, but rose again buoyant on the waters and gained the mast of the wreck, whose top was above the surface—here he might have remained in safety, but on enquiring for the Prince, of a Rouen butcher, who was the only person saved, and learning that he was drowned, he flung himself back into the sea and settled down beneath the waves a voluntary, but a useless sacrifice.

Was the hand of retributive justice displayed in this disaster? The proud monarch, who had usurped his brother's throne and deprived him of his sight, had anticipated a long succession of his own lineal descendants to rule over the dominions which he had seized; he had embarked for England after obtaining the oath of fealty from the Norman barons to his son—that son, who in the midst of severity and joyous mirth, whilst sky and sea were beautifully serene, was untimely and suddenly summoned into the presence of the King of Kings, and the worldly ambition of his father, which had urged him into the perpetration of crime, was crushed and annihilated. "He never smiled again."

After this event the family of Fitz-Stephen became unknown to the court and to the nobility. Their presence awakened in the breasts of bereaved parents painful recollections that could not be subdued—recollections of the young, the brave, and the beautiful, who would never return, and whose bodies the greedy waves had not restored for Christian burial. Death is at all seasons appalling, and brings regret and sorrow to the survivors; yet there is a melancholy satisfaction in bearing the last utterance of the dying, closing the eyes of the dead, and aying the perishing remains within the silent sepulchre. But oh! how greatly the heart agonized when separated for ever from those whom we have loved—no voice to scold and cheer the departing spirit, but suddenly cut off when hope was brightest, and home, with all its dear delights and sweet enjoyments, was daily getting nearer. Oh! how the mind's eye dwells with appalling interest upon the ghastly corpse dashed about at the mercy of the winds and waves! There is something consolatory in having witnessed the depositing of the coffin in its narrow prison-house; it gives a locality to the departed; remembrance revives the funeral scene, and there is a certainty that the inanimate body is mingling with its kindred earth. But dreadfully distressing it is when even these melancholy consolations are denied, and imagination pictures the sorrow and blighted body rolled over and over by the billows, or becoming a prey to the monsters of the deep.

Fitz-Stephen was a bold, generous, and chivalrous youth, much valued and esteemed by his relatives, who now, in addition to their sorrow for his loss, found themselves compelled to withdraw for a time into partial obscurity that implied disgrace. In the reign of Henry the First, however, they appear to have regained favour, for we find one of them acting in the capacity of Secretary to the great prelate Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, whose unjustifiable assassination caused him to be canonized as a saint; and we also see another of the family, Robert Fitz-Stephen, at the head of a body of retainers subjugating Ireland to the supreme control of the King, King of Leinster, who had been exiled by his subjects. But Dermot did not long survive his success, and the whole dominion of Ireland devolved on Richard, Earl of Stirling, who had married Dermot's daughter. The adventures who had achieved this conquest appeared to themselves as their share of the spoil certain portions of the country, over which they exercised a princely authority and rule, till Henry, growing jealous of their proceedings, repaired to Ireland in person, and received the submission of the usurpers, who offered to hold their acquisitions in vassalage to the crown; he restored some of the Irish chieftains to their possessions, gave confirmatory grants of territory to several of the English, and created Earl Richard Seneschal of Ireland.

Fitz-Stephen the warrior acquired considerable tracts of land in Wexford; while his brother, a sea-captain who traded with Spain, having been driven by stress of weather upon the western coast, entered Galway Bay, and found shelter in the river through which Lough Corrib flows into the sea. Gratified by the safety afforded to him, as well as pleased with the appearance of the country, the ship-master determined to remove thither and establish a commercial intercourse with the continent. His design succeeded; the commodiousness of the port attracted the notice of mercantile speculators; a handsome town was built after the Spanish model (the streets crossing each other at right angles) and a brisk commerce was opened with Spain, Portugal, and the Mediterranean. For many succeeding years the family of Fitz-Stephen successively filled the highest and most important stations; and when a Parliament was summoned, one of them sat as a member of the lower house. Their fame as merchants and mariners continued to be widely diffused; but more so on account of the character they bore for stern and rigid integrity.

THE LIBRETTO OF DON CARLOS,

THE NEW OPERA PERFORMING AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.
(With poetical translations, written exclusively for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Previous to the appearance of the new opera of "Don Carlos," which has raised up Costa, and knocked up Mario and Lablache, "we fell upon" the Italian Libretto, and have taken the opportunity of careful perusal, to award it a literary notice apart from the musical criticism, which appears in another column. It is amusing enough to read these "libretti" before they pass from the hands of the poet, and assume the garb of song. You are in the blacksmith's shop, and you see the naked iron before it is forged into the shoe. You have the mould without the metal—the die without the coin—but you cannot get the mint-sterling, until all the accessories are brought round to fill up the measure of the original charm. You read a libretto, and you sink your poor poet into a nonentity. He has fair thoughts, pretty sentiments, and a sweet or horrible romance, but you cannot appreciate him properly till he is fairly drowned—not Like mandarin Cassene in his mahogany hut, but in sweets full as delicious and intoxicating; in bright scenery, brilliant costume, "heavenly music, and the delirium of angel voices." You take him to the Opera, you know that he is of no use in your study, and you not only put flesh upon the skeleton, but array him in a goodly suit of fashionable attire. Or, if you like, he is the foundation of a house, and nothing more; Costa builds up the tenement—Lumley puts on the roof—Grievous paints papers and decorates, while Lablache, Grisi, Bellini, Mario, Forasanni, and Giubilei come in as the furniture. You have other enchantments around you, and in the meanwhile your poet is out of sight. But for all this there is no reason why a libretto should not be as good as any other of the elements which compose an Opera. In dramatic outline, in fertile incident, in strength of purpose and poetic feature, it should be the very spring of all the fountain; and genius and originality ought to shine like stars from the heaven that surrounds them. The story should make itself felt; not in the way of excuse or as filling an hiatus; not as who should say—but by its intrinsic interest, by the emotion it is capable of exciting. With our English operas this is rarely the case; you seldom get a glimpse of poetry in an English libretto, and the nouvellette is generally worked out by the scene-painter, the blue fire, and the trap-door. All the spirituel of the affair lies with composer and singers.

Story, Lord bless you I have none to tell,

The Italian libretti are better; there is some natural flourish about their language, and a gentle current of flowing unobtrusive poetry that reminds one of improvisation, so facile it is, and so free. The poets too usually select lofty themes, or such as are wild in their romance, or touching and tender in their simplicity. The disadvantage in England is that they are generally abominably translated for those who do not know Italian; but if you see them upon the stage, there is something to be gathered from them after all.

The story of M. Costa's new opera is before us, in the form of a "Lyric Tragedy," from the pen of Signor Leopoldo Tarantini. The subject is one of those absorbing crises of history which have lived in mystery and died in blood. It involves the destinies of Philip II. and Don Carlos of Spain, and Isabella of Valois—the creature of sudden passion, though implied crime—who, having warmly loved and been betrothed to the son, was forced by the exigencies of state policy to wed the father, and reaped the bitterness of her frightful destiny in the tragic harvest of sorrow, which the Moors in the libretto before us have sent forth their ambassador to glean. The poet has in some measure departed from history, and from still more familiar romance—for it will be remembered that both Alfieri and Schiller have woven it into the fair embroidery of their fame: the one painting in Philip and Carlos the bigot and the enthusiast, with all the glow and fervour of deep and dark Italian portraiture; and the other, diverging into the path of friendship, and quitting passion and love, to shadow forth the devoted affection and fidelity of the afflicted Princess's friend. In the version before us that friendship is a feature, but not a prominent one; and the interest of the tragedy is centred in the King, his unhappy son, and still more unhappy wife. The father is haughty, distrustful, and tyrannical—the son, wretched, passionate, and enthusiastic—the wife miserable utterly, in her unnatural position; loving the son enduringly, but dreading the husband with a wild and wondering awe.

The framework of the plot may be easily imagined from these "bearing-places;" but there are two or three of the situations which we have made the experiment of rendering from Italian poetry into lyrical English. One of the best points of the opera is the pretty introduction of the beautiful Isabella, with the Chorus of Court Ladies sounding her praises as she emerges from the Shrubbery and Royal Gardens up the Palace Steps.

Chorus.

Si vada al bella
Nel fior dell'età
Non s'è a' leucilla
Poi cara bella
Del verde che brilla
Sospiciale sul crin
Più puro stavilla
Quel guardo sereno
Quel guardo che splende
Di d'oro candore
Quel guardo la rende
Regina del cor.
D'Isabella le meste
Quante meste,
K an angel celeste
Ed io le deo.

Chorus.
In her beauty glowing there,
Rimful and suppling fair,
Who can wear her charms so well
As the lovely Isabella?
Not the violet that doth shine
Brilliant on her brow divine,
With a sparkle half as bright
As her eyes, when shading light?
In those tender eyes we see
Stars of heaven's purity.

That with love proclaims her still
Queen of every heart and will?
Spain was desolate, and preyed—
So, when her complaint was made,
Heaven, indignant, lent him grace,
This sweet soul, to soothe and save.

Soon the chorus subsides, and the fair courtiers are in the presence of her whose praises have hardly died upon their lips. One Duchessa de Monleone welcomes her, and the scene which ensues reminds us of Mary's farewell to France, though taking in the sequel a sadder aspect. The Duchessa and Queen converse:—

Duch. Qui t'asidit
Regina: il primo spiro
Della tua vita
Che sa destando i cupidi fieri
Dalle tenebre del malumori albori.

Reg. Ah si—ero e al mio core Quanto loco, quante ore—
Quanto tempo in mio
Mi chiamava di Francia all' aure amiche,
Farmi fruire ancora—

Duch. Ognor Francia ti rammenta?

Reg. Ognora, ognora
Quando, o bel mio di Francia,
Ritornai al mio pensiero,
Per te non di che faro
Per che rianza il cor.

Per te rivivo all' estasi
Del mio primier amor.

Parmi sull' ale ai arditi
Volare di sfere in sfere,
Del caro ben l'immagine
Lieve mi segue a voi.

Ah! scordo allor gli spauriti
Di questo basso suolo.

Chorus.
Miser! oh qual nell' anima
Rinchiuso acerbo duol.

Reg. Ricordo del suo abbandono,
Delirio delirio orrendo!
Tutto, ah tutto è colpa in me.
E un arcano il mio dolore
Che morir con me dovè
E un martir che in quel core
Desta orrore a non perir.

Quel che aveva a cuore che gemo:
Il conforto della speme—
Fin la speme è in me delitto
Fin delitto è il soccorrer.

Duch. Sit here. Such breath as rephre h breathes,
And round the dewy flower waithes
The morning's sweet and scented gale
Is fair and fragrant to inhale.

Queen. Ah, yes, this calm and balmy spot,
Recalls me pleasures forgot,
And bids my bounding fancy dance,
Back to the hours of joyous France.

Duch. Still France remember'st thou?

Queen. Oh, yes!
Its cherish'd charms my memory bless,
And as in days long gone I seem
To live again in every dream
That floats around my heart, to prove
The bliss of all my early love.

I seem as though on rephre wing,
I flew about, a fairy thing,
And fondly caught, when glancing back,
Love's image lingering on my track!

Ah! all forgotten then my grief,
In joy so beautiful and brief!

Chorus.
Ah, wretched soul, in sadness drown'd,
How liest on it hath sorrow forw'd.

Queen (recalling her abasement).
I was delicious! fatal madness stole
Upon my spirit, and absorbed my soul.
All, all is gone with me; no mortal eye
May see the mystery that with me must die;
A grief that, once proclaimed, would only start
All hearts to horror—none to pity's part.

Even hope, that still is sorrow's gentlest bride,
Mid all my torture is to me denied;
For hope is crime to me, and Misery's pain
Cannot come gentler to my aching brain.

There is something exquisitely touching in the affliction which is by present circumstances forbidden even to remember its former love. It furnishes a key and clue to the whole tragedy, which has indeed a fatal termination, and plunges its hapless heroine among the flames of the Inquisition.

the play-ground large enough—and the walls in the fields more delightful, this part of the country having been always pre-eminently distinguished for its great salubrity, as well as for the beauty and diversity of its landscape. This establishment, which is distant about twenty miles from the city, is situated in a beautiful spot, and is well adapted to test their children, as access by omnibus is to be had at all hours of the day, and from the Bath and Glouster roads. Those who are really in quest of a good school, will find this establishment to require everything that can be wished, as the most instructive exercises are introduced, and the children are not only taught to read, but to write, and to take, under the mildest possible treatment. The most satisfactory references to the health and gentleness, residing in London and elsewhere, whose sons have been brought up at this establishment, will be found in the following list of names.

 the best of the series. The following was the programme:—

"Oberon"

rt, conducted by Mendelssohn, and led by T. Cooke way, conducted to more than half the effect by his previous leadership, went off beautifully. It will be seen by me that the directors are now acting more liberally than years; witness the production of Smart's "Scena" (a position), and the names of English vocalists in the is as it should be—a glorious change has taken place; in to "dare to have sense ourselves," and the happiest seen the consequence.

onia Eroica" was exquisitely performed. Standigl sang one of David's Psalms most admirably: he was in better e has been for some time back. Corelli's "Trio" is bea little tiresome. H. Smart's composition, which gained red by Mr. Macready two years ago for the best finale Like It," is full of chaste and beautiful writing.

nd part opened with a composition by Mendelssohn, so ry of the highest order that we cannot find words to describe it. Wildness, Strength, and Beauty seem to be composer's adopted Graces, while, on the other hand, ve multiplied the muses by their own number, for he y-nine times greater in this work than in any he has pro-
 e. He has gone hand-in-hand with his poet Goethe, and ample justice. The choruses are of a most impressive that of the Druid Guards "Disperse, disperse, ye gallant enthusiastically encored, and the reception of another, e said guards and the people feigning to be witches, cannot
 d. We never witnessed more delight on the part of an Standigl as a kind of Orchestra was magnificent, and the nated with a chorus of Druids worthy of the loftiest inspiration of Handel. Though the season be near its close, we mean work again. M. Sinton played a very clever concerto on the violin, his own composition, in a neat and finished style. Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," like the generality of his works, must be heard often before it can be duly appreciated; still many pieces excited considerable applause. Weber's overture, with which the concert terminated, was heard to the very echo of the last chord, when vehement cheering for Mendelssohn proved how highly his services are estimated by the subscribers to these now truly classic concerts.

tion of Grass before the lightning burst of Lablache's malediction is truly awful. We thought we almost heard the dreadful lines from "Troilus and Cressida" issue from the angry father's lips:

Now Hell's bluest plagues
 Receive her quick, with all her crimes upon her;
 Let her sink spotted down: let the dark host
 Make room, and point, and hiss her as she goes:
 Let the most branded Ghosts of all her sex
 Rejoice and cry, Here comes a blacker Fiend!

The terrible fierceness of Lablache is in those lines. Mario as the Moor serves but as an accessory to the picture: he cannot stand out in any great prominence against the other mighty portraits. Gargia was the only Otello who could have withstood Lablache's Elmo:
 but still Mario is very charming in the part and sings its music beautifully.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

A drama founded upon Box's "Martin Chuzzlewit" was produced at this house on Monday last, and was completely successful. To describe the intricate and ever-changing plot of the novelist would be needless, and that of the dramatist (Mr. E. Stirling) is pretty nearly the same thing. Suffice it to say, that the principal features in the narrative are made to stand out very prominently in its stage adaptation. Pecksniff and Tom Pinch are admirably personated by Messrs.
 P. Mathews and Meadows. Mary Graham is rendered still more interesting by Miss Fortescue's representation of her, and Master Bailey, the Boots at Mrs. Todgers' boarding-house, is irresistibly impudent and droll as performed by Mrs. Keeley. Keeley, himself, was immense in the part of Old Mother Gump, the monthly nurse.

And "carefully adapted to the stage;"

No grand romantic drama, deep and dire,
 Filled with "terrible combats" and red fire,
 Boast we to night. No dimmy plot shall trench
 Upon our scene "translated from the French;"
 But one in deep emotions far more rife,
 The powerful romance of common life.

We owe this story of the present hour
 To that great master hand, whose graphic power
 Can call up laughter, bid the tear-drop start,
 Or find an echoing chord in every heart.
 When we have learned to deem an household friend,
 Who, 'midst his varied writings, never pen'd
 One line that might his guileless pages spot,
 One word that "dying he would wish to blot."

We know there is around his simple name
 A prestige thrown, your sympathies to claim;
 But our poor playwright, feeling well his task,
 Has sent me forth your clemency to ask.
 And some old friends, selected from the rest,
 Of human kind the sweetest and the best,
 Crowd forth, your patient hearing to implore,
 Presuming on the fellowship of yore.

Good Mr. Pecksniff first with smiling face,
 And kindly heart implores your patient grace:
 Then arm in arm, led onwards by one will,
 The Brothers Cherryblossom endorse our bill,
 And warm by kindness ever both alike,
 The timid hopes of poor neglected Snake,
 Whilst not unmindful of your past kind deeds,
 Oliver Twist next for indulgence pleads.

SCENE FROM THE NEW DRAMA OF "MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

MADLE. FANNY ELSSLER DANCING "THE SARAGOSSA."
 IMPROMPTU TO MADLE. FANNY ELSSLER, ON HER DANCING THE SARAGOSSA.

With such a form of beauty and such face,
 'Twere easy to mistake thee for a Grace,
 But that one only of the Sisters Three
 Could not reveal thy various symmetry
 The air is musical where'er thy feet
 In many turnings cause vibrations sweet—
 Their echoes, than the sounds to which they move
 More exquisite—more soul-inspiring prove,
 And make us think that ev'n the Muses Nine
 To make Thee One their sister charms combine!

THE SLAVE TRADE.

HE debates towards the end of the session seldom touch on questions in which great principles are involved; they are mostly confined to the details of bills and measures that have been driven, as it were, into a corner by the discussions of an earlier period, and must be passed with most of their imperfections, or dropped altogether. Sometimes, however, a giant evil will make itself visible among the mass of petty enactments, and force itself on the attention even of unwilling Legislatures. There are some things that can not be hid, some from which it is vain for man to avert his gaze. They do not the less exist because we for a time cease to think of them, and when attention is re-awakened to their frightful evils, the prospect is often worse, the abuse has grown more terrible than when we last surveyed it.

On Tuesday evening the Slave Trade was brought under the notice of the house, and the effect of the discussion is what we have described; it produces a painful conviction that our exertions have been useless, and our efforts vain. We have spent masses of treasure, have lost to the country numbers of valuable lives—the fatal Niger expedition is an instance of it—and yet the hideous traffic, that stands a dark stain in the history not of one nation, but of mankind, is more active, more cruel, more unrelenting, destroys more human life, and causes more human misery in a year than at any former period! The truth is often mournful, and here is indeed an instance of it; how can it be accounted for? How is it that exertions so disinterestedly made, and, for the most part, so ably directed, have been not merely so useless, but absolutely so mischievous?

In the first place, the traffic, dreadful as it is, produces, it is said, enormous profits; and, as the efforts of those European nations that have declared themselves opposed to it, have reduced it to a smuggling trade, the increased risks are covered by increased profits. Every expedient that perverted ingenuity can discover has been brought to bear, to combine capacity for cargo and swiftness of sailing in the slaving vessels: to these human life is sacrificed with a coolness of calculation that is perfectly revolting. When the slaves are brought to the place of embarkation, it is stated as "a well-known fact, that whatever might be the size of the slave ship, the slave captain always took a fourth, or a third more than his ship was calculated to hold. This was done on a true arithmetical calculation, just as a person who was sending a pipe of wine round upon the Indian voyage always sent a quarter-cask, in order to make up for leakage and evaporation, so the slave captain took an extra number of slaves on board, to make up for the deaths he felt certain would occur during the passage."

The mass of human evil caused by the system of which the above extract describes but a portion of the details, is thus impressively placed before the mind, in the recent speech of Lord Palmerston. After estimating, on the authority of Mr. Blandine and Sir P. Buxton, the number of slaves annually deported from Africa at 150,000, he says, "What an enormous amount of human misery and human crime is shown by this simple statement to exist! Let any man consider to himself what 150,000 people are; let any man who has seen armies collected think, if it has ever fallen to his lot to see 150,000 men collected at once under his eye—let him imagine that he saw that number assembled together on a plain—that he was told, as they passed by him, that they were travelling fast towards their doom—that that living mass of human beings was doomed to a painful and premature death, under every variety of bodily and mental torture! Why, if he were told that it was not a single sight, but that every year, over the same spot of ground, an equal number were urged forward to the same melancholy doom, could any man, when he witnessed such a sight, fail to invoke the vengeance of Heaven on the authors of such enormities?"

The bringing all this amount of misery together, and concentrating the attention, as it were, upon it, is most effective. It reminds us of the passage in which all the gathered diseases of the future degenerate race of man are shown by Milton's Angel to our first parent, as the consequences of his transgression.

Sight so deform what mortal eye could long
Dry-eyed behold! Adam could not—but wept.

It must be a callous heart indeed that can contemplate such a number of his fellow beings doomed annually to be the victims of the unhallowed avarice of man. The world has been called "a vast Lazar-house of many woes;" but it exhibits no other evil like this—not even the carnage of war and battle—though these have in them sufficient of the horrible, for in these men meet on something like equal terms, and war itself is not without redeeming features in, at least, individual instances of mercy, generosity, and forbearance. But the Slave Trade is a perpetual war, in which all the advantage is on one side; it is like massacre without resistance, or cruelty without provocation.

But greater perhaps even than its physical evils, are its fatal moral effects; it is another melancholy fact, that the most cruel features of slavery have been the most strongly developed beneath European and Christian masters. Among the Mahometans cruelty to the domestic slave—the dweller beneath the same roof—is the exception rather than the rule. Where Christians are slave-owners, kindness has been the exception—the general esteemed by his relatives, who now, in addition to their sorrow for his loss, found themselves compelled to withdraw for a time into partial obscurity that implied disgrace. In the reign of Henry the First, however, they appear to have regained favour, for we find one of them acting in the capacity of Secretary to the great prelate Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, whose unjustifiable assassination caused him to be canonized as a saint; and we also see another of the family, Robert Fitz-Sigebert, at the head of a body of retainers subjugating Ireland to the supreme control of Dermot, King of Leinster, who had been called by his subjects. But Dermot did not long survive his success, and the whole dominion of Ireland devolved on Richard, Earl of Strigul, who had married Dermot's daughter. The adventurers who had achieved this conquest appropriated to themselves as their share of the spoil certain portions of the country, over which they exercised a princely authority and rule, till Henry, growing jealous of their proceedings, repaired to Ireland in person, and received the submission of the usurpers, who offered to hold their acquisitions in vassalage to the crown; he restored some of the Irish chieftains to their possessions, gave confirmatory grants of territory to several of the English, and created Earl Richard Seneschal of Ireland.

Fitz-Sigebert the warrior acquired considerable tracts of land in Wexford; while his brother, a sea-captain who traded with Spain, having been driven by stress of weather upon the western coast, entered Galway Bay, and found shelter in the river through which Lough Corrib flows into the sea. Gratiated by the safety afforded to him, as well as pleased with the appearance of the country, the ship-master determined to remove thither and establish a commercial intercourse with the continent. His design succeeded; the commodiousness of the port attracted the notice of mercantile speculators; a handsome town was built after the Spanish model (the streets crossing each other at right angles) and a brisk commerce was opened with Spain, Portugal, and the Mediterranean. For many succeeding years the family of Fitz-Sigebert occasionally filled the highest and most important stations; and when a Parliament was summoned, one of them sat as a member of the lower house. Their fame as merchants and mariners continued to be widely diffused; but more so on account of the character they bore for stern and rigid integrity.

THE LIBRETTO OF DON CARLOS.

THE NEW OPERA PERFORMING AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.
(With poetical translations, written exclusively for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Previous to the appearance of the new opera of "Don Carlos," which has raised up Costa, and knocked up Mario and Lablache, "we fell upon" the Italian Libretto, and have taken the opportunity of careful perusal, to award it a literary notice apart from the musical criticism, which appears in another column. It is amusing enough to read these "libretti" before they pass from the hands of the poet, and assume the garb of song. You are in the blacksmith's shop, and you see the naked iron before it is forged into the shoe. You have the mould without the metal—the die without the coin—but you cannot get the mint-sterling, until all the accessories are brought round to fill up the measure of the original charm. You read a libretto, and you sink your poor poet into a nonentity. He has fair thoughts, pretty sentiments, and a sweet or horrible romance, but you cannot appreciate him properly till he is fairly drowned—not

Like madman Clarence in his maimed butt, but in sweets full as delicious and intoxicating; in bright scenery, brilliant costume, "heavenly music, and the delirium of angel voices." You take him to the Opera, you know that he is of no use in your study, and you not only put flesh upon the skeleton, but array him in a goodly suit of fashionable attire. Or, if you like, he is the foundation of a house, and nothing more; Costa builds up the tenement—Lumley puts on the roof—Griever paints papers and decoration of Grist before the lightning-blast of the Libretto, and finished is truly awful. We thought we almost heard the dreadful lines from "Troilus and Cressida" issue from the angry father's lips:

Now Hell's blishest plague
Receive her quick, with all her crimes upon her!
Let her sink spotted down: let the dark Host
Make room, and point, and hiss her as she goes:
Let the most branded Ghosts of all her sex
Rejoice and cry, Here comes a blacker Fiend!

The terrible fierceness of Lablache is in those lines. Mario as the Moor serves but as an accessory to the picture: he cannot stand out in any great prominence against the other mighty portraits. Garcia was the only Otello who could have withstood Lablache's Elstro; but still Mario is very charming in the part and sings its music beautifully.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

A drama founded upon Box's "Martin Chuzzlewit" was produced at this house on Monday last, and was completely successful. To describe the intricate and ever-changing plot of the novelist would be needless, and that of the dramatist (Mr. E. Stirling) is pretty nearly the same thing. Suffice it to say, that the principal features in the narrative are made to stand out very prominently in its stage adaptation. Pecksniff and Tom Pinch are admirably personated by Messrs. F. Mathews and Meadows. Mary Graham is rendered still more interesting by Miss Fortescue's representation of her, and Master Bailey, the Boots at Mrs. Tugger's boarding-house, is irresistibly impudent and droll as performed by Mrs. Keeley. Keeley, himself, was immense in the part of Old Mother Gump, the monthly nurse,

That with love proclaim her still
Queen of every heart and will:
Spain was desolate, and prayed—
So, when her complaint was made,
Heaven, indulgent listening, gave
This sweet soul, to soothe and save.

Soon the chorus subsides, and the fair courtiers are in the presence of her whose praises have hardly died upon their lips. One Duchess de Mondecar welcomes her, and the scene which ensues reminds us of Mary's farewell to France, though taking in the sequel a sadder aspect. The Duchess and Queen converse:—

Duch. Quel t'asidit
Regina; il primo spiro
Della tepida brezza
Che va destando i rugiadosi fiori
Dolce è poter sui matutini albori.

Reg. Ah sì—certo è al mio core Questo loco, quest' ora—
Qui quanto intorno io miro
Mi richiama di Francia all' aure amiche,
Parmi fruirle ancora—

Duch. Ognor Francia rimembri?

Reg. Ognora, ognora
Quando, o bel vol di Francia,
Ritorni al mio pensiero,
Per te noi di che furono
Par che rimase il cor.

*Per te rivivo all' estel
Del mio primier serot.*

*Parmi sull' ale ai soffiri
Volar di sfere in sfere,
Del caro ben l' immagine
Lieve mi segue a voi.*

*Ah! accendo allor gli spazini
Di questo basso val.*

Coro.

*Misera! oh qual nell' anima
Rinchiude acerbo duol.*

Reg. Rimanendo dal suo obliando.

Delira! delira orrendo!

Tutto, ah tutto è colpa in me.

*E un arcano il mio dolore
Che morie con me dorme
E un martir che in ogni core Desta orrore e non pietà.*

*Quel che svanisce a ognun che geme:
Il conforto della speme—
Fin la speme è in me delitto
Fin delitto è il sovenir.*

Duch. Sit here. Such breath as zephyr's breathes,
And sound the dewy flower breathes
The morning's sweet and scented gale
Is fair and fragrant to inhale.

Queen. Ah, yes, this calm and balmy spot,
Recalls me pleasures unforgot,
And bids my bounding fancy dance,
Back to the homes of joyous France.

Duch. Still France remembers rest thou?

Queen. Oh, yes!

*Its cherish'd charms my memory bless,
And as in days long gone I seem
To live again in every dream
That floats around my heart, to prove
The bliss of all my early love!*

*I seem as though on nuptial wing,
I flew about, a fairy thing,
And fondly caught, when glancing back,
Love's image lingering on my track!*

THE SLAVE TRADE.

HE debates towards the end of the session seldom touch on questions in which great principles are involved; they are mostly confined to the details of bills and measures that have been driven, as it were, into a corner by the discussions of an earlier period, and must be passed with most of their imperfections, or dropped altogether. Sometimes, however, a giant evil will make itself visible among the mass of petty enactments, and force itself on the attention even of unwilling Legislatures. There are some things that can not be hid, some from which it is vain for man to avert his gaze. They do not the less exist because we for a time cease to think of them, and when attention is re-awakened to their frightful evils, the prospect is often worse, the abuse has grown more terrible than when we last surveyed it.

On Tuesday evening the Slave Trade was brought under the notice of the house, and the effect of the discussion is what we have described; it produces a painful conviction that our exertions have been useless, and our efforts vain. We have spent masses of treasure, have lost to the country numbers of valuable lives—the fatal Niger expedition is an instance of it—and yet the hideous traffic, that stands a dark stain in the history not of one nation, but of mankind, is more active, more cruel, more unrelenting, destroys more human life, and causes more human misery in a year than at any former period! The truth is often mournful, and here is indeed an instance of it; how can it be accounted for? How is it that exertions so disinterestedly made, and, for the most part, so ably directed, have been not merely so useless, but absolutely so mischievous?

In the first place, the traffic, dreadful as it is, produces, it is said, enormous profits; and, as the efforts of those European nations that have declared themselves opposed to it, have reduced it to a smuggling trade, the increased risks are covered by increased profits. Every expedient that perverted ingenuity can discover has been brought to bear, to combine capacity for cargo and swiftness of sailing in the slaving vessels: to these human life is sacrificed with a coolness of calculation that is perfectly revolting. When the slaves are brought to the place of embarkation, it is stated as "a well-known fact, that whatever might be the size of the slave ship, the slave captain always took a fourth, or a third more than his ship was calculated to hold. This was done on a true arithmetical calculation, just as a person who was sending a pipe of wine round upon the Indian voyage always sent a quarter-cask, in order to make up for leakage and evaporation, so the slave captain took an extra number of slaves on board, to make up for the deaths he felt certain would occur during the passage."

The mass of human evil caused by the system of which the above extract describes but a portion of the details, is thus impressively placed before the mind, in the recent speech of Lord Palmerston. After estimating, on the authority of Mr. Bandiell and Sir F. Buxton, the number of slaves annually deported from Africa at 150,000, he says, "What an enormous amount of human misery and human crime is shown by this simple statement to exist! Let any man consider to himself what 150,000 people are; let any man who has seen armies collected think, if it has ever fallen to his lot to see 150,000 men collected at once under his eye—let him imagine that he saw that number assembled together on a plain—that he was told, as they passed by him, that they were travelling fast towards their doom—that that living mass of human beings was doomed to a painful and premature death, under every variety of bodily and mental torture! Why, if he were told that it was not a single sight, but that every year, over the same spot of ground, an equal number were urged forward to the same melancholy doom, could any man, when he witnessed such a sight, fail to invoke the vengeance of Heaven on the authors of such enormities?"

The bringing all this amount of misery together, and concentrating the attention, as it were, upon it, is most effective. It reminds us of the passage in which all the gathered diseases of the future degenerate race of man are shown by Milton's Angel to our first parent, as the consequences of his transgression.

Sight so deform what mortal eye could long
Dry-eyed behold! Adam could not—but wept.

It must be a callous heart indeed that can contemplate such a number of his fellow beings doomed annually to be the victims of the unhallowed avarice of man. The world has been called "a vast Lazar-house of many woes;" but it exhibits no other evil like this—not even the carnage of war and battle—though these have in them sufficient of the horrible, for in these men meet on something like equal terms, and war itself is not without redeeming features in, at least, individual instances of mercy, generosity, and forbearance. But the Slave Trade is a perpetual war, in which all the advantage is on one side; it is like massacre without resistance, or cruelty without provocation.

But greater perhaps even than its physical evils, are its fatal moral effects; it is another melancholy fact, that the most cruel features of slavery have been the most strongly developed beneath European and Christian masters. Among the Mahometans cruelty to the domestic slave—the dweller beneath the same roof—is the exception rather than the rule. Where Christians are slave-owners, kindness has been the exception—the general rule, barbarity. The description applies to the masters of every European nation; and treating the English and the Americans as one race—as they have been and are at present the greatest slave holders of modern times—the heaviest amount of guilt lies upon them. Seeing what is the practice of Christian men, it was not likely to impress an ignorant and heathen people with anything but hatred of the race and suspicion of the creed of those who were guilty of such enormities. Thus centuries of intercourse between Africa and Europe have left the former as Pagan and idolatrous as she was centuries ago; and while the spiritual state of the people is no better now than it was then, their physical condition is far worse, from the continual internal wars the slavers encourage by giving a ready market for the prisoners, and the decrease of cultivation in consequence of the continual drain of the native population. The accounts of travellers in Africa two centuries ago, prove that whole districts are now deserts that were then well cultivated, populous, and flourishing. In both respects the blighting effect of the Slave Trade is manifest. Sir R. Peel says, "When I reflect on this subject, I cannot but imagine to myself the light in which the nations of Europe must appear to those unfortunate inhabitants of Africa who are made the victims of this crime—what must be their ideas of the Christian faith which they are taught to believe is professed by Europeans when they see them practising daily such dreadful cruelties, and when they witness so many thousands of their fellow-creatures falling victims to the avarice and cruelty of those who they are told call themselves Christians? Whilst such frightful crimes were daily committed amongst them, was it not to be expected that impediments to the spread of Christianity would be engendered thereby?"

The evils being so incontestably proved and conceded by all parties, what we must again ask is the reason that all the efforts made to check, have only increased them? Sir R. Peel says, and we believe says truly, that two nations only are mainly responsible for the failure of the exertions of the rest of the world. Spain, by its possession of Cuba, affords a market for the slaves; the Spanish Government share the profits of the Trade, and Spanish subjects are the agents in carrying it on. The Empire of Brazil is open to the same reproach; and as long as these two countries continue to uphold the system, the attempts to put it down will be ineffectual. France and England are the only two powers that do much towards its suppression; we might almost say that it is England alone that interferes to any appreciable extent, for France and America, by their overstrained sense of national honour on the "right of search," have thrown obstacles in the way of vigorous effort in this respect rather than assisted. America, too, is open to suspicion in the matter; against the spirit of her free constitution, she fosters within herself a system of slavery as foul as ever disgraced the world. The states of Europe who have declared against the Slave Trade—Norway, Sweden, Austria, Prussia, Russia, either have but little power, like the two first, or small naval forces, as Austria and Prussia, or no colonies, like Russia; they can do little more than protest against the traffic, and leave its suppression to others; and of the three powers, France, England, and the United States, who interfere the most actively, by far the greatest share of the work is done by England alone. It is a credit to us that we do so much; it is a misfortune that we cannot do more; but while the manner and extent of our interference is so fettered by the regard that must be paid to national rights, we fear that we have gone as far as we shall be able to go. The only mode would be to declare the traffic piracy, and take from those engaged in it the protection of every flag of every power. Till that is done, we must, according to Sir R. Peel, deal cautiously with criminals who are bold to effrontery, dexterous, and indefatigable. We must sit down and wish that the world was better, but take no strong means of making it so. He sees the evil in its full extent, and with his regrets for its existence, his cold, prudential reasons for not increasing the means of preventing it, contrast somewhat disappointingly.

SWAN-UPPING.

Yesterday the Lord Mayor and his civic friends proceeded in state to spend a festive day in the haunts of the regal and privileged swans of the Thames, previously to their more close inspection by the Dyers' Company, in August next. On this occasion, the state barge, followed by a gaily dressed shallop, conveying the company, were towed to Brentford Ark, a little above New-bridge, where the celebrated barge, the Maria Wood, was moored to receive them; his lordship disembarked and continued his "voyage" to Twickenham on board the barge Maria. A splendid banquet was served on board, and dancing kept up with much spirit on the ample deck.

The following particulars of the Swan, and the business of these pleasure "Upplings," will gratify our readers:—
"The Swan," says Mr. Yerrill, "is, perhaps, the most beautiful living ornament of our rivers and lakes. Poets of all ages and countries have made this bird the theme of their poems, and by none with more characteristic truth of expression than by our own Milton, who, in his 'Paradise Lost,' says:—
"The swan with arched neck
Between her white wings mounting,
Proudly rows
In the Thames, at present, the greatest number of swans belong to the Queen, and the Companies of Vintners and Dyers own the next largest proportion; but the birds are far less numerous than they used to be. They are marked upon the upper mandible with a knife or other sharp instrument. The "Swan-upping," or "Swan-hopping," as it is vulgarly termed, is the catching and taking up the swans to mark the cygnets, and renew that on the old birds, if obliterated, in the presence of the royal swan-herdman, which is still continued by the companies above mentioned. This was ostensibly the business of the civic excursion yesterday, but the birds are actually marked in the month of August. We subjoin a few of the marks.

a. The swan-mark of Eton College, who have the privilege of keeping swans on the Thames. It is intended to represent the armed point and feathered end of an arrow, and is represented by nail-heads on the door of one of the lanes rooms of the college.

b. c. Represent the swan-marks of the Dyers' and Vintners' Companies of the City of London, as used in the reign of Elizabeth. These two companies have long enjoyed the privilege of keeping swans on the Thames, from London to a considerable distance above Windsor; and they continue the ancient custom of proceeding with their friends and visitors, with the royal swan-herdman, and their own swanherds and assistants, on the first Monday in August in every year, from Lambeth, on their "swan voyage," for the purpose of catching and marking the birds as above. Mr. Kemp, F.S.A., who has taken great pains to collect the details of this ancient custom, states, that "the struggles of the swans, when caught by their pursuers, and the duckings which the latter receive in the contests, made this a diversion with our ancestors of no ordinary interest." The formation of the circles or amulets on the beak, as observed in these two ancient marks, being considered to inflict more severe pain upon the bird than straight lines, the rings are now omitted, and the lines doubled, as shown in the marks d, e, which are those of the Dyers' and Vintners' Companies, as used at this time; b, c, being the ancient and modern mark of the Dyers' Company. The two ticks in the swan-mark of the latter, which have so often been noticed, are probably intended for two half lozenges, or a demi-lozenge on each side; the V, is, perhaps, a chrism reversed, the arms of the company being sable, a chevron between three fess argent; for Mr. Kemp considers the true chrism could scarcely be cut on the beak of the bird, without each lateral branch drooping its elongated and tender nostril; and this, from a feeling of humanity, the marker would be disposed to avoid. Besides being heraldic, that many of these swan-marks have the additional adaptation of the initial letter of the word "Vintner," and form also the Roman numeral V, is supported by a custom at the hospitable entertainments of the Vintners' Company, where one of the regular stand-up toasts of the day is, "The Worshipful Company of Vintners, with Five!" Mr. Kemp discommends the popular notion that the sign of the Swan with Two Necks, has any reference to the "Two Necks."

f. Is the royal swan-mark of Queen Victoria, and has been used through the reigns of George III. and IV., and William IV. to the present time.

At the Swan-upping in August, 1841, the following number of old and young swans, belonged to her Majesty and the two civic companies:—

	Old Swans	Cygnets	Total
Her Majesty	185	47	232
The Vintners' Company	79	21	100
The Dyers' Company	91	14	105
	355	82	437

At one period, however, the Vintners' Company alone possessed 500 birds. In the language of the swanherds, the male swan is called a Cuck, the female a Pin.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Our accounts from France are of an interesting character. The dispute with Morocco is, of course, the principal political topic in the Paris papers; but there is also domestic news worthy of notice. The Duc de Nemours has given birth to a Prince, upon whom Louis Philippe has bestowed the title of Duke d'Alençon. The most extraordinary reports were in circulation in Paris, respecting the contest in which France is at present engaged with Morocco. On the one hand it is said the Prince de Joinville is about to be recalled from the Mediterranean with his fleet, but it is obvious from the accounts given in other French journals, that the Government do not expect to be able to settle the difference in so summary a manner. For instance, a Toulon paper of the 9th says:—"The four ships forming the squadron of Rear-Admiral Pasquier Desclaux have completed their provisions and stores for five months, and wait only the telegraphic order for sailing. Admiral Pasquier being of older rank than the Prince de Joinville, cannot be put under the command of his royal highness, and are credibly informed will remove his flag from the Ocean to the Nouvembre. The Minister of Marine has sent orders for the purchase on account of Government of the steamer Le Lionneux and Le Var, belonging to M. E. Gérard, and sent of the steamer Le Lionneux in carrying the mails between Toulon and Corsica, and which have been employed in carrying the mails between Toulon and Corsica. They are to be manned with crews of about thirty sailors, but their destination is not known." Some of the Paris papers too state that the aspect of affairs in Algeria was very warlike. The whole of the Prince de Joinville's squadron, consisting of the Buffard, Jemmapes, and Triton of the line, the Belle Poite frigate, and the Gascogne, Pluton, Anzoulet, and Phare steamers, were off the port of Oran.

The Chamber of Deputies has been occupied with the discussion of the Orleans and Bordeaux Railroad Bill. The seventh paragraph of the bill excluded members of the Legislature from all participation in railroad companies, either as contractors or managers. On the return of the bill to the Deputies, M. Cremieux again proposed the insertion of the clause; but after a long debate, it was rejected, and the measure passed in the form in which it had been sent down from the Peers. The numbers were—

For the bill	..	..	..	..	125
Against it	..	..	..	..	105

Majority .. .. . 20
It would seem, therefore, that the French Legislature, like the English House of Commons, is determined to have as much control as possible over Railways. In a previous sitting, the Chamber of Deputies passed, by a majority of 190 to 41, the bill for granting an extraordinary credit of 4,000,000 francs to the Navy Department, and immediately took into consideration the budget of expenses of the same department for 1845. Contrary to what was expected when the Prince de Joinville published his exciting "note," most of the estimates were voted in great haste, and with very little discussion. On this occasion Admiral Leroy read a long speech on the state of the navy, and M. Lherbette expressed a hope that the Emperor of Morocco would be made to pay the cost of the naval armament which had been sent to that country. M. Lherbette added, that 75 million francs were already due to France for various expeditions, namely, forty-three millions by Spain, six millions by Greece, two millions by Belgium, and 16 millions by Mexico. The Minister of Marine replied that the expedition to Morocco had cost nothing, and that there was every reason to believe that the arrangements which had been made would prove in every respect advantageous. The Courrier Français says:—"We understand that immediately on the close of the session Marshal Bugey will go to pass three months at his seat of Saint Amant; the Minister of Commerce will take a tour through the manufacturing districts; the Minister of Public Works will make a general inspection of the roads; the Minister of the Marine will visit Cherbourg and Brest; the Minister of Justice will pass a month with his family at Douai, and the Ministers of Finance and Public Instruction will go to take the benefit of some of the mineral waters."

The Séanceur de Moronville of the 13th inst. announces the demise of the celebrated M. Forbin Janson, Bishop of Nancy and Toul.

The Croiseur de Gibraltar of the 15th ultimo states that on the morning of that day, the Vauxsine steamer sailed for Toulon, for the purpose of taking on board the English Consul General and conveying him to Mogador. The consul was commissioned by his government to hand the Emperor a sealed dispatch, which had been brought to him by the Providence steamer.

A letter from Douai thus describes the celebration of the anniversary of the death of the Duke of Orleans:—"At half-past eleven the King, leading the Queen by the hand, entered the body of the chapel through the crypt. His Majesty took his station in the centre of the choir, before the altar, having the Queen on his right, and next to her the Queen of the Belgians, and the Duke de Montpensier. On his left was the Duchess of Orleans, between her Royal Highness Madame Adelaide and the Prince de Wurtemberg. The clergy followed the Royal Family from the crypt. It was impossible to see without emotion the august widow of the Prince Royal endeavouring to suppress the convulsive sobbings of her heart, prostrated and motionless on the earth by the weight of her grief, while the King and Queen were seeking resignation at the foot of the altar. One overwhelming feeling predominated in all who were present; the most lively sympathy with the weeping mourners was depicted in every countenance. After the absolution, the King and his family returned to the Palace, passing again through the crypt, where the Queen and the Duchess remained a long time kneeling before the tomb of the departed Prince."

CURIOUS TRIAL FOR MURDER.—The Paris papers contain long details of a trial resembling in some respects the celebrated Lafarge case. A Madame Lacoste and a Monsieur Joseph Melhan were indicted, under the following circumstances, before the Tribunal of Auch, near Toulouse, on the 16th inst. —Melhan was the first prisoner placed at the bar. He is a robust old man, with a countenance full of good nature and severity, and with features possessing little of the southern type. Madame Lacoste, who next entered the court, accompanied by her advocate, M. Alex. Rousseau, is described as an elegant woman, with large black eyes, regular features, and altogether an expressive face. Her dress was plain, but in excellent taste. She looked pale and melancholy, and her appearance contrasted singularly with the jovial features of her fellow-prisoner. Melhan, in answer to the various questions put to him, stated that his name was Joseph Odilon Melhan, that he was 70 years old, a native of Virey Fossenois, a schoolmaster by profession, and that his habitual residence was Nigrepes. Madame Lacoste replied that her maiden name was Euphémie Vergès, that she was 50 years old, a native of Montolieu, in the Upper Pyrenees, and that she resided at Nigrepes. All her replies were made in a mild and sweet voice, with a southern accent, and her manner was modest, unaffected, and interesting. The act of accusation states that, in 1841, Henry Lacoste, the deceased, although then 66 years old, married his grand-niece, Euphémie Vergès, that he was apparently in good health; but that, on the 15th of May, 1842, whilst at the fair of Nigrepes, he was suddenly attacked by illness, and that eight days afterwards he expired at his own home, after having experienced repeated attacks of colic and vomiting. A few days afterwards his widow produced a will, by which her husband had made her sole legatee, and bequeathed to her the whole of his fortune, amounting to 200,000 francs. Reports being current that Madame Lacoste and Melhan had conspired to defraud the widow, and were to the Procureur du Roi at Auch, requiring the exhumation of the body of the deceased. This took place on the 15th of December. The body was found to be the same as that of the deceased, and was accompanied by three pharmacists of Auch, who declared that they continued experiments. On the 16th of May Lacoste was at the fair of Nigrepes, where he drank some wine with Melhan; he was immediately afterwards taken ill, and declared that Melhan must have put something into his wine. On reaching home, Lacoste became worse, but his wife did not call in medical aid until within a few hours of his death. She alone attended him. She herself administered during his illness the medicine which he took, and in which it is declared there must have been added other portions of arsenic, which, it is presumed, were supplied by Melhan. The motives for this crime on the part of Madame Lacoste are stated to have been her knowledge that her husband, dissatisfied at being without children, and otherwise displeased with his wife, had signified his intention of revoking the will which he had made in her favour. Against Melhan it is charged that he was on very intimate terms with Madame Lacoste. He admitted having dined with her immediately after her husband's death; but this, he said, was the custom of the country, and other persons were invited as well as himself. The chief ground of suspicion against Melhan was that he had suddenly changed from poverty, and become possessor of a large sum of money. Madame Lacoste was asked by the President what her fortune was before she married Lacoste. She replied, from 30,000 fr. to 25,000 fr. It was then observed to her that she was charged with having kept up, after marriage, an intimacy with a young man at Tarbes, to whom she had been formerly attached. She replied emphatically, "That is not true!" but admitted that a month or six weeks after her husband's death she had received a young man of Tarbes, who was her suitor. Evidence was given that the marriage was unhappy. An immense deal of little-detailed evidence was admitted during the four days the trial lasted. Some of the sixty-eight witnesses who were said to have offered for Madame Lacoste were introduced into court and examined, without throwing the smallest gleam of light on the charge. It was fully established that M. Lacoste had a great aversion to medical men, and great need of them, for he was much diseased, and debilitated himself. Much of the interest of the trial was occasioned by the beauty of the lady. "She was," said her counsel, "all beauty, goodness, kindness. She had everything in her favour—she was charming!" At the end of the fourth day both the accused were acquitted.

A new opera by Halévy, "Les Quatre Filles Aymon," was produced at the Paris Opera Comique on Monday, and was entirely successful. It is founded on the old nursery tale of how some sons set out to seek their fortunes; how they fell in love with four beauties; how an old servant of the family deluded the Count of Beaumanoir to give his only daughter in marriage to the eldest of the sons, and how the said daughter contrived to get her three cousins married to the three other brothers. The music is charming; the overture is busy and well instrumented, and the opening song of the first act, "Sentinelle, prenez garde à vous," almost insures success for the piece. A new bass singer, Herman Leon, from Braccio, sang this air, and in doing justice to Mr. Halévy's music established his own reputation. The general character of the music is elegance and lightness, interspersed, however, with several passages which indicate the learned and scientific hand of a master.

The Lyons papers say that several persons have been arrested, charged with a French plot against the authorities of that place. Several grenades were found in their possession, with which, it is said, they intended, by a single discharge, to destroy the general in command, the mayor, and the prefect, when coming out of the church of St. John, after the solemn mass of the 1st of May.

SPAIN.

Our letters from Spain bring the important information of the dissolution of the Cortes, and the convocation of the new Legislature for the 15th of October next. Another decree prescribes the nomination, by the Basque provinces, of two commissioners for each, who are to repair to Madrid to settle with the Government the question of the fueros. A fourth decree orders the exhumation of the remains of Montes de Oca, former Minister of Marine, who was shot at Vitoria, in October, 1841, and their removal to the cemetery of Fuencarral, at Madrid.

The Ministry have addressed circular letters to all the Political Chiefs, inviting them to adopt the necessary measures for the elections of the deputies and one-third of the senators. The electoral lists are to be closed on the 2nd of August, and publicly posted up, on the 15th, during fifteen days. The elections are to commence throughout the provinces on the 3rd of September, and the general scrutiny to take place on the 14th.

The Gazette publishes the official return of the national property sold in June last, from which it appears that 439 lots were disposed of for 5,641,325 reals (upwards of £250,000). The entire of the property hitherto sold has produced 218,830,517 reals.

PORTUGAL.

We have advices from Lisbon to the 10th ult., but they are destitute of interest. The abstract of the revenue derived from the customs at Lisbon and Oporto for the first six months of this year, proves that there has been some improvement in trade, but it is not to any great extent, nor does it at all afford any reasonable prospect of financial improvement.

The Divorce of the 2nd instant contained the Queen's decree, authorizing the raising of the required loan from the new contractors.

HOLLAND.

The Staat's Courant of the 14th inst. prints a supplement of twenty-five columns with the project of law for introducing a new tariff of duties on importation, exportation, and transit, accompanied with the explanatory memorial, which has been sent to the members of both chambers of the States General, and which will be laid before the States General at the opening of the next session.

THE HAVRE, July 14.—The latest accounts from India (to the end of March) state, among other news, that a combat had taken place near the Thousand Islands, very near Batavia, with two piratical vessels, one of which was taken—the other escaped. The men of war of the more important expeditions against the pirates sailed from the roads of Bontabaya on the 15th of Feb. His Majesty's frigate the Palambang, Captain Koopje, had made a demonstration in January on the west coast of Sumatra. Major Van der Hart, resident at Aym Bantje, had been thereby enabled, at the head of a detachment, to confirm the authority of the Government in the Halls Lands without having recourse to arms.

TURKEY.

We have accounts from Constantinople to the 27th ult., but they bring nothing of importance. The Sultan had renewed to Sir Sturtevant Manning his promises in reference to the renegade question.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 30th ult. describe Greece as on the eve of becoming again the theatre of party strife. A few days previously some rioting took place in that capital. Crisis of "Down with the Ministry!" and "Five the Constitution!" were vociferated under the King's windows, and Callergis was obliged to order a body of cavalry to disperse the mob. Several persons were wounded in the affray, two of whom subsequently died. The elections were nearly over in the provinces, and had passed off quietly, except in Messenia, where five individuals lost their lives. On the 25th ult. the list of the senators, 35 in number, was published. Callergis, Metaxas, and Mitsas, would not permit their names to be enrolled on the list, which included the most eminent of the persons who took part in the political events of the last 25 years.

UNITED STATES.

The Aradia Mail steam-ship has arrived at Liverpool from Boston and Halifax, after a very rapid passage of only twelve days from the former and nine and a half from the latter port. The Royal Mail steamer Britannia, which sailed hence with the American mails on the 19th of June, arrived out at Halifax on the 1st inst.

By the Aradia we have received New York papers to the 16th ult., Boston to the 1st, and Halifax to the 3d inst., and from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, to correspondingly late dates. The political news is unimportant, and indeed the only topic which appears to have excited any interest in New York, and hence the last accounts came away, was the unexpected marriage of President Tyler. The worthy head of the American union has married a young lady, 25 years of age, represented as possessing great personal attractions. Her father was a Col. Gardiner, of the American militia, and was killed on board the steam-ship Princeton, at the time of the late unfortunate explosion. After the marriage ceremony had been performed the President, who is ex officio commander in chief of the navy and army, to give his fair bride a taste of the honours which would be paid her in his society, took her on a water excursion in a steam-boat through the harbour and bay of New York, in which were lying an 84-gun vessel, used as a receiving-ship for naval apprentices, a revenue cutter, two Monitor war-steamers, and the war-steamers Princeton. From all of these salutes were of course fired, even from the very ship in which the President's wife's father had so recently before met his death. We hardly need say there is very great sympathy between the arms of the happy pair, Mr. Tyler being almost of an age to be grandfather to the lady of his choice.

The Texas annexation question is rapidly losing its hold on the public mind; most parties evidently look at it as a more electing bait of Mr. Tyler.

The Canada papers mention another steam-boat explosion. On the 25th of June the steam-boat Gen. Vance, Captain Woodworth, burst her boiler at the wharf on the Canada side, and five persons, including General TYRRELL, are known to have lost their lives. The Vance was owned by Captain Woodworth. Captain W. was killed while in conversation with the engineer, who was severely, but not dangerously, wounded. The Detroit Advertiser says that Mr. Metherell, the engineer of the steam ferry-boat Union, who had just stepped on board the Vance, was among the killed, as also a man named George Seewey, of Canada West, formerly employed on board the British steamer Kent. Gen. Tyre was wounded in the head by a fragment, and died of his wounds. The two firemen were severely wounded. The engineer of the boat, who is represented as a careful and able officer, was, at the time of the accident, in conversation with the captain, remonstrating with him for not having given warning of his intention to stop at Windsor, and requesting him to make but a short stay, as the steam was well up. Upon leaving the wharf at Detroit the steam was low; and at the time of the accident the safety valve was up.

The great wheat harvest has commenced in many parts of America, and all accounts agree that it will be most abundant. Indeed, the crops of all descriptions are promising.

Exchange was rather dull at 109½.

A letter from New Helvetia mentions the arrival there of Lieutenant Fremont and the exploring expedition to Oregon. They found it impossible to pass over the Snowy Mountains into the Oregon, towards the Arkansas river, and he was obliged with his party to strike further south, and get to the above settlement in California.

THE COUNTESS DE NASSAU.—According to a letter from the Hague, the Countess de Nassau, widow of the late ex-King of the Netherlands, is on the point of taking for a second husband General Van Omphal, who was aide-de-camp to his late Majesty.

THE STATE APARTMENTS AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—It will be interesting to the public to know that the whole of the state rooms at Windsor Castle will remain open, during the stay of the Court, as heretofore, from eleven in the morning till six o'clock in the afternoon. On Tuesdays and Fridays the public will not be admitted, nor on Sundays until half-past one o'clock, P.M.

Twenty minutes or a quarter of

The pine plants in the West Indies, it appears, only bear for three years, and then the natives root them up to make room for other plantations. The plant is, as the reader may recollect, indigenous to some of the West India islands, and to South America. In its wild state, as at Eleuthera, it is found near the sea-shore, the sand accumulated there in downs serving for its growth, as well as for that of most of the species of the same family. Each plant, when put into the ground, yields one pine for three successive years, and then becomes exhausted. The sandy plains of Praya Velha, and Praya Grande, formed by the receding of the sea, and in which no other plant will thrive, are the spots where the pine-apple grows best.

At Eleuthera the business of culture has only just been commenced, by sending to that island a few of our finest varieties of the fruit. The pines just received are, unquestionably, superior to last year's importation. They may be purchased at from 2s. 6d. to 6s., and their average weight is two pounds; whereas, in England, from seven pounds to eight pounds is, by no means, an uncommon weight for a single fruit.

We have heard of pine-apples being so abundant in the West Indies, as to be used, when cut horizontally, for scrubbing ships' decks, the acid of the fruit serving to whiten the timbers.

Although the flavour of the West India pines is far inferior to pines of British growth, they are fine fruit; and Eleuthera should not be lost sight of, producing as it does, two prime luxuries of the table—pine-apples and turtles.

The engravings show the pines, as lotted for sale; and a specimen, with the crown, main-leaves, and stem; the varieties imported being the Birds-eye and Providence.

Two of the finest pines received by Messrs. Keeling and Hunt were forwarded as a present to her Majesty, for which the following courteous acknowledgment has been received:—

Windsor Castle, 14th July, 1844.

The Master of the Queen's Household presents his compliments to Messrs. Keeling and Hunt, and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of two pineapples, which arrived on Saturday evening, in perfect order, and have been served at her Majesty's table.

Messrs. Keeling and Hunt have just received a second cargo from Eleuthera, consisting of 12,000 pines, and 50 tons of block ice; the vessel having made the passage in 28 days.

By way of tail-piece, we subjoin a specimen of the Batata, or Sweet Potato, of which three boxes were sold on Monday, subsequently to the pines. It is a native of the Malayan archipelago, and was eaten much in the south of Europe before the cultivation of the potato, which both became a substitute for it, and appropriated its name. It is partially cultivated in the south of Spain and France, whence its roots are sent to the markets of Madrid and Paris, where they are held as a delicacy: they are mealy, sweet, and wholesome, but keep badly.

GREAT REPEAL MEETING AT WASHINGTON.

A vast meeting was held in Washington Hall, on the 25th ult., for the purpose of raising a fund for the payment of the fine of £2000 which Mr. O'Connell is sentenced to pay at the expiration of his imprisonment. The scene is described in the New York Herald to have "exceeded anything ever seen in this city since the memorable eve of October 29, 1841, when Bishop Hughes organized the thousands then assembled into a body pledged to carry his ticket. From all quarters of the city, and from the adjoining villages, the Irish, chiefly of the lower classes, poured in by hundreds and thousands to the place of meeting. Long before the time of meeting the large hall was densely crowded, and the scene was diversified, animated, and picturesque in the extreme." Mr. Hillard, the celebrated artist, has sketched this great demonstration for the annexed engraving.

There could not have been less than twelve thousand Irishmen present in the course of the evening, for the stream going out and entering the hall was kept up without intermission for nearly three hours. Every man seemed prepared to contribute; and the shouts, the tossing of hats in the air, the whirling about of coats and jackets, the waving of shillelahs, the almost frenzied excitement which universally prevailed, were certainly well fitted to astonish all who witnessed, for the first time, a lively Irish meeting. Crowds of passers-by in Broadway stopped in utter amazement to listen to the shouts of the multitudes which thronged and issued from the hall.

The Secretary, Bartholomew O'Connor, Esq., amid deafening applause, introduced Mr. Ganevoort Melville as Chairman, who briefly addressed the meeting amidst tumultuous applause, and bespoke their "substantial sympathy for the great—the illustrious—the indomitable patriot—O'Connell—the man whose energies have been devoted to human liberty all over the world; and who is now consigned to the gloom of the dungeon for Ireland." (Immense cheering which lasted for a considerable time.)

The Secretary, Mr. O'Connor, then read several communications from various Repealers in America, with accompanying subscriptions; and Mr. Harry Langton, the Receiver-General, announced seventy-seven dollars from "the Poigh-a-Hallagh of Waterford," for whom three lusty cheers were given. Other subscriptions were announced, and, says the New York Herald:—"The rapidity with which the money was poured in, and the jostling, bustling, struggling and pushing to get to the tables where it was received, were perfectly indescribable. It seemed as if every man felt that the salvation of his native land depended on his depositing his dollar."

After this part of the business had proceeded with spirit for some time, the meeting was addressed by Mr. H. Greeley with great vehemence, who stated that since the last meeting, there had taken place two events favourable to the cause of liberty:—"One is Daniel O'Connell's standing up with undaunted mien and resolution before his judges, to plead for the cause of his country and the cause of universal freedom, in a voice that spreads unchoked over the civilized world (great applause.) Yes, the trial of these great patriots, intended to be the death-blow of Repeal, has but given it a wider range, and one which no government can control. * * * The world, gentlemen, has seen Daniel O'Connell standing up before his judges, saying, 'I stand up for relief to the poor, prosperity to the humble, and liberty to the oppressed; for such a conspiracy as this I am indicted before you.' (A burst of applause followed this sentence, which took some moments to subside.) The cause of Repeal has had another honourable testimony from the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Earl of Aberdeen, who, in a correspondence with the British Minister in this country, says that his government is solicitous for the abolition of slavery all over the world—every place but Ireland. (Laughter.) Out of his own mouth we will show the justice of our cause. Our enemies ask us what we have to do with Repeal? I answer, just as much as the British have to do with the abolition of slavery out of their own dominions. (Prolonged cheering.) We have it under the sign manual of the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs—in the hand-writing of the Earl of Aberdeen, in a document coolly considered and skillfully penned, that they mean to abolish slavery in every place as soon as they can, but we tell them, if they are not prepared to begin, we will teach them a lesson in their own land." (Great applause.)

The Hon. John M'Kean then proposed seven or eight resolutions, of a very strong character.

The Chairman then proposed three cheers for "the ladies," which were heartily responded to.

For a considerable time, "the money came rolling in," and, at length, the meeting was adjourned to the following evening, after 1074 dollars 70 cents had been collected.

Next evening, according to the New York Herald, "the muster evidenced that a good deal of the steam had been let off by the previous evening's proceedings. At the time the meeting was organized, there were not as many hundreds present as there were thousands, on the previous night. Their conduct was much cooler—there was not that anxiety to bring out the needful." Nevertheless, numbers of persons came forward with different sums; many of them apparently only labourers, presented at what they no doubt thought the altar of liberty, their five, and some ten, dollars each, when all the apparel on their backs were not worth the same amount, and many who had subscribed the previous evening, repeated their subscriptions on this occasion, and some of them for the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh time. About nine o'clock the room was well filled. Considerable amusement was then caused by a jolly Irish tar attempting to sing the "Harp of Erin," whereas the meeting were more disposed for the cash.

One secretary then spoke, and concluded by calling for three cheers for "O'Connell, his speedy deliverance, and regeneration of Ireland."

The receiver-general continued to receive subscriptions, and "found it such hard, warm work, that he was obliged partially to strip to it;" he then announced that evening's collection to have been near upon 300 dollars, and the meeting adjourned.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

ANCIENT DOVE-COTS.

The regal, ecclesiastical, and military antiquities of the country have been fully explored; but those which throw a light on our domestic history—the manners and customs of our ancestors—have been seldom visited, and as seldom described, by those who profess to narrate the history of the people, as well as the rule of their more conspicuous leaders. The reason of this omission is to be found in the character of the locality of such monuments. They dwell in obscure places, and are found only in "nooks and corners." Such an object is exhibited in our cut. It is the ancient dove-cot of Codnor. An ordinary observer would pass it heedlessly, and number it in his note-book with those towers and walls of the castle devoted to military purposes, and thus lose an instructive opportunity of making himself acquainted with an interesting feature of the private, every-day life of the early founders and inhabitants of the place.

DOVE-COT TOWER, CODNOR CASTLE, DERBYSHIRE.

The keeping of doves was so extensively followed in the middle ages, that a house or "cot," for their preservation, became a distinct adjunct to the household arrangements of the humblest as well as of the most lordly dwelling. Those, however, which belonged to the poor have mostly perished, and with the changing spirit of the age, the practice itself has, with them, almost passed away; but those which belonged to the feudal castle, built, as they mostly are, of stone, remain to this day in a state of perfect preservation. The midland counties contain many good examples, but perhaps the one at Westonsay, in Kent, and that at Codnor, shown in our cut, may be taken as the finest specimens. These dove-cots were usually circular in form, of the length of forty or more feet, neatly and strongly built of "ashlar work," and fitted in the interior with parallel ranges of nest chambers for the accommodation of the birds.

Codnor is beautifully situated in the eastern part of Derbyshire, about nine miles from Derby, and two from Ripley. The castle, which was built in the early part of the thirteenth century, is now a mass of ruins. Richard de Grey, in the early part of the thirteenth century, had his chief seat here. In the 26th Edward III., the Lord Grey, of Codnor, was joined in commission with Wm. D'Euncourt, to command all the knights in Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, in case of an invasion. In the 3rd Henry V., the king sent the Lord Grey, of Codnor, to bring to England, Henry, the son of Hotspur, from Scotland. Henry, the last of the family, it is said, was much devoted to chemistry, and obtained a license for the transmutation of metals. Dying in the reign of Henry VIII., he left part of his lands to his two natural sons, Richard and Henry, the remainder of his estates went to his aunt Elizabeth, who was married to Sir John Zouch, younger son of William Lord Zouch, of Harringworth. Codnor remained in the hands of the Zouchs until 1822, when it was sold, and the family left the kingdom. Sir Kersabon Master, who resided here in 1712, is supposed to have been the last inhabitant. The castle and lands now belong to the celebrated Butterley Company, who in prosecuting their operations for getting iron ore, have undermined the ruins in many places, so that in a few years this, like many other of our most interesting relics of former ages, will be swept away from the face of the earth, and its site only known by tradition.

"LOVE TRIUMPHANT," BY MR. M'DOWELL, A., AT THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SCULPTURE.—"LOVE TRIUMPHANT."

This beautifully classic group in marble, by Mr. P. Mac Dowell, A., is one of the finest specimens of British sculpture produced for many a year. It has been executed for that munificent patron of art, Mr. Wentworth Beaumont, and will form the gem of his splendid collection. The composition is very felicitous: two figures, a youth and a maiden, support, on their shoulders, the boy Cupid; the march of the two supporters is bold and spirited, and their varied expression excellent, as they look up to the archer-boy, whose playful smile, whilst he bears the torch in triumph, is truly charming. The head of the female is exquisite, and has few parallels in the exhibition. In conception, expression, and finish, the group is not surpassed; and it goes far to redeem the character of this year's exhibition of sculpture, in which the busts alone are nearly two-thirds of the whole collection.

BIRMINGHAM ELECTION.

The Birmingham election terminated on Saturday last in the election of Mr. Spooner, the Conservative candidate, by a large majority.

The numbers were on Monday officially declared by the Mayor to be as follows:—For Mr. Spooner, 2695; for Mr. W. Scholefield, 1735; for Mr. Sturge, 146. Majority for Mr. Spooner over Mr. Scholefield, 960; majority for Mr. Spooner over Mr. Sturge, 1749; majority for Mr. Spooner over both Mr. Scholefield and Mr. Sturge, 14. Mr. Spooner having been declared duly elected, that gentleman came forward and returned thanks. He said he did not go to Parliament to serve any party, nor to truckle to any Minister. (Cheers.) He would neither be a noisy Oppositionist, nor an over-zealous, talkative Government supporter. Mr. Spooner, after stating that he should not consider himself as the representative of a party, but the representative of all parties and all interests in the borough, concluded by expressing his thanks to the ladies of Birmingham, by whom he had been so efficiently supported. On sitting down, he was loudly applauded.—Mr. Sturge, in returning thanks, said he did not regret that he had stood by his pledge, and given the electors the opportunity of voting either for or against him.—Mr. Beale addressed the electors on the part of Mr. W. Scholefield, who was not present.

At the general election for 1841, the numbers were:—Muntz, 2175; Scholefield, 1963; Spooner, 1825.

Birmingham, with its numerous steam-engine chimneys, and a portion of its pleasant environs, are represented in our engraving. The town lies nearly in the middle of England, and was once surrounded with gardens, which, however, are fast diminishing from the rapid increase of buildings. As a seat of industry and the simpler mechanical arts, Birmingham may date its prosperity from the time of the Restoration. It has few edifices, either public or private, of great antiquity; nor has it been the scene of any important historical events. From the nature of its staple employment, it lay till lately under the stigma of blackness and dirt; but the improved processes and the great change in the nature of its manufactures, with the excellent arrangements of the Commissioners of the Street Acts, tend, especially in the newer parts, to remove these grounds of reproach. Its general aspect is that of a place suddenly and greatly improved; the streets lately erected or altered are wide, and the buildings are good. Many of the public edifices are substantially built, in a style highly creditable to the taste of the people. The magnificent new Town Hall, shown to the left of the view, is one of the finest structures of the kind in the kingdom. It is of the Corinthian order, its proportions being taken from the Temple of Jupiter Stator, at Rome. The exterior is of grey Aspley marble; the extreme length of the building being 166 feet, breadth 144 feet, and height 83 feet. Two of the principal churches are St. Martin's, with a lofty and well-proportioned spire; and St. Philip's, adorned with an enriched tower, surmounted by a dome.

The denomination of "the toy-shop of Europe," given to Birmingham by Burke, was correct at the time; but the extensive application of powerful mechanical forces has now raised the staple productions of the place.

The elective franchise, which has just been exercised at Birmingham, was only conferred upon the town by the late Reform Bill; and, under the still more recent Municipal Corporation Act, has been changed the simple form of government which existed when Birmingham was an obscure village.

THE CHURCH POOR'S BOX.

The poor man's box is there too: if ye find anything
Beside the pew, and that half rubbed out too,
For fear it should awaken too much charity,
Give it to pious use.—BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

POOR'S BOXES IN CHURCHES.

CHURCH POOR'S BOX is now almost a forgotten piece of antiquity. We have still Poor's Boxes in our prisons and police-courts; but charity seems to have fled from our churches, for there they appear to be considered unnecessary articles. Indeed, as if to show how strangely custom has perverted its use, its very name has become changed—the rich "Poor's Box" of former ages being now abbreviated to a "Poor Box" only. It has no longer a genitive case: it belongs not to the poor, except as it is poor itself. The large cobweb with which the satire of Hogarth has clogged it up, tells not more plainly its neglected condition than does the omission of that single letter in its designation, which time and truth have alike established. It is poor indeed!—starved in neglected holes and corners. But it is not entirely so. Hiding in some obscure village church, it may still be found among ancient relics and forgotten lumber; or, revived by some worthy antiquary, it may re-appear in the church-porch, and wait patiently for charity till neglect shall again cover it with dust, and be once more forgotten.

We have engraved some of these Poor's Boxes that have survived the changes of three or four centuries. They are from three neighbouring churches in a secluded part of Norfolk, (a county rich in ecclesiastical remains,) where they may be said to have been discovered a few years since by J. A. Repton, Esq., by whom an account was transmitted to the Antiquarian Society. The central chest, mounted on an octagonal stone pedestal, is from the Church of Cawston, and is probably as old as the church itself, which was built between the years 1385 and 1414. The one on the left hand is from Loddon Church, built about 1435; and the other, of about the same date, is from the Church at Wickmere. From the substantial manner in which these boxes are made, being massive wooden structures, strongly bound and secured with iron plates, it would seem that the amount deposited in them in those days, for the use of the poor, was oftentimes so considerable as to render such precautions necessary against robbery; for, doubtless, there were knaves in the land then as now, who would not scruple to plunder even the Poor's Box, if the booty was sufficiently tempting. We may also judge from the number of the keys (the Cawston box having places for three, of which it is supposed two were for the churchwardens, the other for the clergyman,) that even the officials might be tempted to go astray. Besides these precautions, there is yet another in this Cawston-box, which we may show by a section of the interior; where an inverted cup, suspended from the lid, allows the alms to glide over to the receptacle below, but prevents their abstraction through the money-hole at the top.

Formerly, the Poor's Box was to be found in every cathedral, church, chapel, or meeting-house, where the principles of Christianity were taught, and the duties of man to man enjoined upon all. There, where charity was preached and its lessons illustrated by Holy Writ, was the Poor's Box affixed, that the act might wait upon the will; that they whose hearts had been moved by the preacher's discourse, and who felt the desire to benefit their poorer brethren, might do so at once humbly and religiously. And on the Continent it still retains its place in the cathedrals, the "trone" being placed frequently in several parts of the church, with inscriptions over it in three or four languages, stating to what use the alms will be applied—sometimes for the poor generally, sometimes for particular charities, to which is mostly added some text from Scripture, appealing to the feelings or religion of the visitors.

But the Poor's Box is now banished from our churches, modern refinement having substituted for it the glaring silver plate, which, once a month, or on the occasion of a "charity sermon" (for it is only on these rare occasions it makes its appearance), stands boldly in the way of all who leave the church, or appeals still more strongly to their vanity in a pompous walk, or triumph, from pew to pew. And there also stands the beadle in his scarlet and gold, now bowing to the guinea dropped from the perturbed glove of the "carriage lady," now hastening to remove the halfpence (the "widow's mite," perhaps the only contribution of true charity), because the copper sullies the lustre of the more patrician coin. There is little charity in these gold and silver offerings. Pride and ostentation there is much; and for these the old and unobtrusive Poor's Box is sacrificed. The cause of the poor may not therefore be injured; and perhaps they by whom this change has been introduced, studying human nature as it is rather than as it ought to be, have judged wisely in enlisting Pride and Vanity in a cause which Charity is not alone sufficient to secure. But we would fain hope otherwise. A better spirit is now abroad; and as the false sympathy with crime and depravity, which has retained the Poor's Box longer in our prisons than our churches, becomes exposed, our charity and sympathy will become more strongly directed to the cause of poverty. The Poor's Box may then regain its place in church, and we trust it will then lose its satirical title of Poor Bar.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received three letters, calling our attention to two Kendish Journals impugning the accuracy of our statements relative to Dover and Folkestone, in connection with the transmission of the Indian Mail. We have referred these letters and the statements in question to the artist commissioned by us to execute the illustrations and the accompanying details; and we have received from him the following letter in explanation. For ourselves, we have no partiality in the matter; but, for its associations and historic interest, Dover is not surprised by any town in the kingdom.

DOVER versus FOLKESTONE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

15th July, 1844.

Sir—To reference to the illustrated report of the "Progress of the Overland India Mail," which appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of July 6, and to the reflections which have been cast on its accuracy by those respectable journals the Dover Chronicle and the Dover Telegraph, of the 13th July, it becomes my duty, both to yourself and the public, to state that I am alone responsible for the truth of the drawings, and for the facts on which the article which accompanies them are founded. I made the sketches from the scenes described, and supplied the information for the letter-press. But, to avoid giving undue importance to a subject of local rivalry between the ports of Dover and Folkestone, I shall refrain from noticing the ill-tempered personalities into which those journals have suffered themselves to be betrayed, and confine myself to the following brief and undeniable statements in answer to the insinuations which they have thought proper to make against your own veracity and the independence of the South-Eastern Railway Company.

First, That neither the South-Eastern Company, its chairmen, nor any one of its members, agents, or friends, had, either directly or indirectly, any concern in the suggestion or execution of the cuts or notes in question. They were, from first to last, wholly mine.

Second, That the article connected with the Folkestone cuts distinctly states that it is the abstract Indian Mail, containing the details of its more important information, which is sent over the sea, expressed from Boulogne through the port of Folkestone.

Third, That the Indian Mail itself has been landed at Folkestone, although its ordinary route has been through Dover.

Fourth, That the Princess Mary steamer has performed the passage between Folkestone and Boulogne in one hour and fifty-seven minutes; your statement being "within two hours."

I have only now to regret that any misapprehension should have existed on these points.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your faithful servant,

STEPHEN SLY.

The tale of "Fitz-Stephen" will be removed in our next.

"R. G." Charlotte-street, Islington.—Not at present.

We have received a long letter, dated from Bayly Lodge, which is illegible.

CHAPLAIN ROYAL, ST. JAMES'S.—In our Journal of last week, it should have been stated that the end gallery is occupied by the Royal Family; the central part by her Majesty and Prince Albert; that on the right hand by the Queen Dowager, and on the left by the Duchess of Kent.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1844.

At the very time the question of the Slave-trade was brought under the notice of the Legislature, and as if to illustrate the working of the whole system, have arrived accounts of the state of the island of Cuba, which speak "trumpet-tongued" as to the political and social misery it produces. The slaves of that island, far more numerous than their inhuman masters, have attempted to rise; and though the planters and the white inhabitants have escaped the doom that overtook the French in St. Domingo, they are still in the most imminent danger. Both sides seem to have passed that point at which reconciliation is possible: henceforth there must be inextinguishable hatred between them. The masters cannot trust, the slaves will not forgive. On the mere suspicion in some cases, on the slenderest proof in others, the most atrocious cruelties have been perpetrated on the blacks. The details read like a bloody page torn from the barbarous annals of the past, and transferred by the dark necromancy of man's depravity, to the present times; they thrust themselves into notice among the trivialities of our everyday life, like monstrous things of whose like the world has read, but it was hoped had forgotten—forgotten so completely, that their recurrence seemed an impossibility. Too well are we taught that it is not so. The worst cruelties of the past have been revived in their worst forms in the present; and that they should have done so is a terrible warning to those nations that yet retain among them the accursed thing. The Southern States of America have much to fear from this example, so near at hand; and to them the impressive warning addressed to Spain by Sir Robert Peel will but too well apply. No country ever continued in the practice of gross wrong and oppression but the victims were sooner or later terribly avenged, the very means taken to uphold the system only making it more unendurable.

The House of Commons continues its day sittings, and is getting through the heavy business of the session with tolerable rapidity. The Poor-law Bill is progressing through committee with but few alterations. It makes some changes in the existing law which will be hailed as improvements, though rather for the principle on which they are founded than for the extent of the ameliorations they effect. It is proposed to establish some kind of places of refuge for the destitute and houseless poor, in which they will obtain temporary shelter, and we presume, enough food to support life for a short space, till the law can provide something more permanent for them. This will at least prevent the recurrence of those shocking scenes which have been revealed in our Police-offices and Inquest-rooms, of human beings banded about from officer to officer, and from parish to parish, each "legally" denying the obligation to relieve the outcast, till death by hunger and want, in the midst of the richest city in the world, was of too frequent occurrence. There is also some provision for the education of pauper children which deserves commendation. "On the whole," to use a favourite phrase of Sir J. Graham himself, his legislation on this subject has this session assumed a better tone than heretofore.

Another important measure produced amid the expiring struggles of the session, and yet incomplete, is an act for regulating the process of building in this gigantic and still extending metropolis. We advise all who are interested in brick and mortar to obtain the act, and endeavour to understand it—if they can, for in length and intricacy it rivals any Act of Parliament that ever preceded it, which is saying a great deal. It has been described by an authority on one side of the house as doing too much, and by another, on the other side, as effecting too little. Mr. Macdonald states that the principal recommendations of the committee, as to ventilation and drainage, have been neglected, and that it has the appearance of having been framed for the especial advantage of builders by profession and surveyors. As the hon. gentleman is a Ministerialist, and has paid some attention to the subject, his allegation may have some weight. But its merits and defects are alike concealed by the impossibility of discussing it. We perceive that Trafalgar-square is to have a separate act to ensure its protection from injury, &c. The measure shows a laudable desire on the part of the Board of Woods and Forests; could it not go a step further, and provide the funds necessary to complete the works, which, in their present imperfect state, are a painful annoyance to the eye, and a discredit to us besides? The good effect of all that has been accomplished is marred by the want of finish in the rest.

It is settled that painting in fresco is to be adopted as a portion of the decorations of the New Houses of Parliament; it is also fixed that the artists to be employed are British, which was sometime a doubt, as it was thought we had none among us capable of adopting a new style, or working in an unaccustomed method. The Commissioners have selected the artists, and have fixed on the subjects they are to send in; so far, the two exhibitions which have attracted so much public notice have produced a certain result. The manner in which the selection has been made is fair and open, and we trust there is at least a probability of something connected with the expenditure of the public money on works of art being concluded, without the suspicion of its being a job. The exhibition of Frescoes, Cartoons, and Sculpture, sent in according to the terms of the Commissioners, prior to the selection, has been this week opened to the free inspection of the public. It was looked forward to with some anxiety, as the previous exhibition of the Cartoons only went to prove a capability of drawing designs in a style suitable to the work; it gave no assurance of equal ability in executing the Frescoes themselves. An artist might succeed admirably in sketching an outline of grandeur and breadth on the canvass who would fail when he came to deal with the difficulties of colour joined to those of the material. The exhibition contains some decided failures certainly, but enough also of skill in and mastery of the art to justify the commission in coming to its resolution. It is a revival of this kind of painting in England rather than an introduction of it, and should the mode be adopted by those who have the means of employing it, it may yet become an important branch of art among us. This will be in a great degree dependent on the success of the artists in the tests they will now undergo, and the effect of the paintings, both in themselves, and as forming part of the building they are destined—we hope worthily—to decorate.

It is evident, from the contradictory accounts given by the French papers respecting the French expedition to the Mediterranean, that in Ministerial circles in France something like an apprehension exists that, before the contest with the Emperor of Morocco can be finished, something may arise calculated to destroy the entente cordiale between France and England, the existence of which both Sir Robert Peel and M. Guizot have admitted, and to the maintenance of which they have both pledged themselves, so long as it may be consistent with the national honour. Notwithstanding the pacific assurances of M. Guizot, and the protestations in a similar spirit made by the French Ministerial press, we cannot help thinking that the presence of a large fleet in the Mediterranean is a circumstance calculated, if not to excite apprehension, at least to justify vigilance and caution on the part of our Government. We are not alarmists, but yet we regard the dispatch of a squadron under such circumstances as a fait accompli of a grave and significant character. Every day some of the Paris Ministerial papers contain a report of the recall of the squadron, and indulge in vague hints of a settlement of the dispute; but yet the bellicose Prince de Joinville was, at the date of the last accounts, before Oran with a large force, and apparently not having the most remote intention to put back. There is, indeed, little chance of his imitating the ancient feat, which is thus recorded:—

"The King of France, with eighty thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then—marched down again!"

The Prince is formed of sterner stuff than the warriors who make demonstrations without the intention of following them up; and no one who has read his late pamphlet can fail to be impressed with the conviction that he will court every opportunity of giving a specimen of his seamanship.

The spot appointed for the first essay of the Prince is singularly ill-chosen, and although we do not accuse M. Guizot of the slightest intention to give the young Prince an opportunity of realising his warlike propensities, yet it is a fact worthy of note, that he is sent on just such an expedition as would seem to favour the inimical theories broached by him against England in his pamphlet. It cannot be regarded as anything but a curious coincidence, to say the least, that when the Prince startled the world with his noble authorship, the hypothesis which he created was that of a war to be waged in the very sea whereon his squadron now rides. Ay, and more than this, Algiers was actually named in the paragraph in which he dwells upon the great results likely to arise for France should she have the opportunity of contesting the empire of the sea. These are the words of the pamphlet:—"Dans la Méditerranée nous regnerions en maîtres, nous assurerions notre conquête d'Alger, ce vaste champ ouvert à notre commerce et à notre civilisation;" and then the warlike writer proceeds to contend that Malta and Gibraltar do not afford sufficient means of supplying combustible materials for English steam vessels, and therefore he feels assured that France would be free to carry into effect all its projects in that quarter of the globe. In this instance the wish has indeed been "father to the thought," and whether by accident or from design, the Prince de Joinville is at this very moment in possession of all the appliances he desired to work out his destructive theory.

Placing entire reliance upon the declarations both of Sir R. Peel and M. Guizot, we yet assert that the state of things which has arisen ought not to be looked upon with indifference. We believe that the enlightened and sensible men of both France and England desire the continuance of peace, and are impressed with the belief that war is opposed alike to religion and to commercial prosperity, but yet it would not be absolute wisdom to look upon the dispatch of a French fleet to the Mediterranean with indifference. Our Government, we have reason to believe, are not so disposed, and already indications are perceptible of the rendezvous of a British fleet in the Bay of Gibraltar. Heaven forbid that hostilities with France should be imminent—we had almost said possible; but no political maxim appears to be sounder than that which urges preparation for war as the best means of preserving peace.

When it is considered that France at first disclaimed the idea of retaining Algiers, and that the British Cabinet of that day were satisfied with the explanation, it cannot fail to be remarked as somewhat singular that France should now run such risks for the retention of that colony, and that the Prince de Joinville should discuss the importance of preserving the fruits of the conquest. No secret, however, is now made of the fact that the English Government did not much admire the colonization of Algeria by France; and only last week Lord Aberdeen explained that his expression on the subject was not that he had no "objection" to urge, but that he had no "observation" to make.

However, this is only a secondary consideration at present; but we have felt it our duty to call attention to the maritime expedition which France has now fitted out, believing it to be the most important political event that has occurred for some years past. Not that England need fear war; they who commence the contest with her will have most need of apprehension; but it is of the utmost consequence that there should be "no mistake," as was the case in regard to the original occupation of Algiers, for which England was not prepared, and against which it has been found useless to remonstrate.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, went to Adelaide Lodge in a pony carriage. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were taken on a morning in an open pony carriage. His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent in the afternoon at her residence, Frogmore Lodge.

WEDNESDAY.—This morning the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite and the household, attended divine service at the private chapel in the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked this forenoon in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken sittings in the morning.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, took an airing this morning in an open pony carriage, in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were taken a drive in an open carriage in the forenoon. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Col. Bouverie, Esquire, in waiting, inspected his regiment (the Scots Fusilier Guards) this morning in the Great Park. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty today. Their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz arrived at the Castle from town, on a visit to the Queen.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, took an airing in an open pony carriage this morning. The illustrious party paid a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore Lodge.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were taken a drive in an open pony carriage in the forenoon. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal was also taken an airing.—The Earl of Delaware arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen this forenoon.—The royal party left the Castle, for an airing, shortly before five o'clock this afternoon. The Queen, the Princess Royal, the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and the Countess of Mount Edgcombe, lady in waiting, were in the first open pony carriage and four. The illustrious party returned to the Castle at half-past six o'clock.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen and Prince Albert, and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, early this morning at the Castle. Soon after ten o'clock their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz took their departure from the Castle. Her Majesty and Prince Albert afterwards took an airing in an open pony carriage. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken their usual sittings this forenoon. The Earl of Liverpool and Sir Robert Peel arrived from town in the afternoon on a visit to the Queen. The royal party left the Castle in the afternoon for an airing. The Royal Family were taken sittings this afternoon.

THURSDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, walked in the pleasure-grounds of the Castle this morning. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, accompanied by the Highnesses Lady Lyttelton, were taken an airing in the forenoon in an open pony carriage. Sir Robert Peel took his departure from the Castle this morning. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left her residence, Frogmore Lodge, for town. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert left the Castle for a drive, in a pony phaeton. The royal party returned to the Castle shortly before seven o'clock. The royal family were taken sittings in the afternoon.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—We are happy to state that her Majesty Queen Adelaide will return to England from the Continent on the 23rd instant. The Black Eagle, steam-yacht, master commander H. Cook, which has been newly painted and fitted at Woolwich, is ordered to proceed to Antwerp, to be in readiness to bring over the Queen Dowager.

THE KING OF SAXONY IN LIVERPOOL.—His Majesty the King of Saxony arrived in Liverpool on Sunday last, and took up his residence at the Adelphi Hotel, where apartments had been prepared for his reception. On Saturday he was at Bangor, North Wales, and he arrived at Chester the same evening. He there resided at the Royal Hotel. He left Chester at five o'clock on Sunday, in two travelling carriages and four. He reached Birkenhead a little after seven o'clock, and crossed the river Mersey in the Mersey steam-boat. After leaving Liverpool, the King of Saxony went to Manchester, where he visited several mills and other establishments. His Majesty left Manchester for York. It is understood his Majesty, after visiting Leeds and York, will return to Liverpool, and afterwards proceed to Lancaster, Bowness, and Scotland, and that he will embark at Leith for Saxony on the 31st instant.

THE DUKES OF ALBANY.—The godfather of the young Duke d'Alençon (the infant son of the Duke and Duchess de Nemours) is his Majesty the King of Portugal, who appointed his ambassador at the court of Paris to be his proxy. The godmother is her Royal Highness the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, represented by her Royal Highness the Princess de Joinville.

THE MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY'S DANCE HALL.—The Marchioness of Londonderry gave a grand fancy dress ball on Tuesday evening, at Holme of Londonderry, which was honoured by the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and upwards of five hundred members of the principal noble families in the kingdom. In order to give increased effect to the entertainment, her ladyship requested all the ladies and gentlemen who took part in the Waverley Quadrille to attend in their respective costumes, in addition to which a new set, entitled the "Married Ladies' Quadrille," was arranged expressly for the occasion. The company began to arrive about ten o'clock. The company engaged in the Waverley Quadrille assembled in the picture gallery; and, upon the arrival of the royal family, marched in procession through the grand saloons of the mansion, returning to the gallery, where dancing commenced about eleven o'clock. The Waverley Quadrille was succeeded by that of the Queens of France, in which married ladies only took part. This was the great feature of the evening, and excited intense interest. Refreshments were served in the saloon and at one o'clock, shortly after which the members of the royal family retired, but dancing was resumed about two o'clock, and kept up with spirit until day-break. Nothing could exceed the splendour of the costumes, worn by the Duchesses and several of her noble guests, and the scene altogether was one of the most magnificent it is possible to conceive.

The Duke of Wellington has issued cards for a splendid entertainment on the 21st inst., at Aspley House, to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Duchess of Gloucester, and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz.

The Dowager Duchess of Bedford gave another fête champêtre on Wednesday, at Campden Hill, which attracted a very numerous and fashionable company.

BARONESS ROTHCHILD'S FETE.—Baroness Rothschild gave a very delightful fête on Wednesday, at Gunnersbury Park, to above four hundred of the aristocracy, in addition to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, and the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. A concert, at which the leading artists of the Italian Opera assisted, preceded the banquet, and at six o'clock their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, conducted by Baroness Rothschild and Baron Lionel Rothschild, entered the salon d'honneur, where a sumptuous repast awaited them. At the royal table covers were laid for about thirty persons. The pleasure grounds and gardens were all suitably prepared for the reception.

On Tuesday, the Hon. S. Carey, M.P. for Waterford, was married at St. James's Church, Piccadilly, to Miss Katherine Emily Ann Phillips, daughter of George Richard Phillips, Esq., of Hill-street, Berkeley-square.

MARRIAGES AMONG THE ARISTOCRACY.—We hear that a marriage is on the tapis between the Earl of Mulgrave, only son of the Marquis and Marchioness of Mulgrave, and Miss Russell, niece to the Dowager Duchess of Cleveland. The alliance between Mr. Edward C. Kerison, only son of Lieutenant-General Sir Edward Kerison, Bart., and Lady Caroline Fox Strangways, youngest daughter of the Earl of Ebechester, and niece to the Marchioness of Lansdowne, is expected to be solemnized the week after next. The preliminaries have been arranged for a marriage between Mr. Cochrane and Miss Seymour, daughter of Rear-Admiral Sir G. Seymour, K.C.B., the newly-appointed Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific, and niece to the Countess of Euston and Lady Bedford. The ceremony is expected to take place before the departure of Sir George for his distant command at the end of next month.—We understand that a marriage is arranged between Viscount Loftus, eldest son of the Marquis of Ely, and the beautiful and accomplished Miss Jane Hope Vere, daughter of the late Mr. Hope Vere, of Craig-hall and Blackwood, N.B.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel received a distinguished party at dinner, on Saturday last, at their mansion in Whitehall Gardens.

Alexander Oswald, Esq., M.P. for Arran, is about to lead to the hymeneal altar Lady Louisa Johnstone, widow of the late Sir Frederick Johnstone, Bart.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

NEW CHURCH AT GREENWICH.—A new church, to be dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is about to be erected at Greenwich. The site is chosen, and the ground, nearly an acre, which is gratuitously presented for the purpose by the Drake family, is situated between the Upper-road, Deptford, and Tanner's-hill, Greenwich.

The Earl of Cardigan has subscribed the sum of £100 towards a new church at East Ardsley, near Wakefield.

CAMBRIDGE, July 13.—The following have been elected afternoon preachers at Great St. Mary's:—1844: October, the Hulsean Lecturer; November, the Rev. Theoph. T. Smith, Queen's College; December, the Rev. D. Moore, Catherine Hall; 1845: January, the Rev. Dr. Robinson, Trinity College; February, the Rev. Dr. Mill, Trinity College; March, the Rev. T. Worley, master of Downing; April, the Hulsean Lecturer; May, the Rev. C. S. Bird, Trinity College. The following appointments have taken place:—The Hon. and Rev. Arthur Seville, M.A., of Trinity College, to the curacy of St. Nicholas, Warwick.

ORDINATION.—An ordination will be held on Sunday, July 21, by the Lord Bishop of Worcester, at Worcester.

OXFORD, July 13.—We understand that it is intended to form an Oxford Society, for the promotion of the Fine Arts, in connection with the Randolph and Taylor Galleries, so as to establish an institution for the encouragement of that study. By the demise of Dr. Hawkins, rector of Appleton, Berks, for forty-two years, that living has become vacant; and by the death of the Rev. R. Williams, of Great Houghton, Northamptonshire, for thirty-nine years, this rectory is also vacant. Both of them are in the gift of the President and Fellows of Magdalen College.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—The Senate of the University of London have recently come to the resolution of adopting academic costume for the undergraduates and graduates of every degree conferred by that body. No collegiate dress has been hitherto worn by the members of this university.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The implied course of the Government in reference to betting on horse-races could not have been made known at a more convenient season. "Book-making," "betting-round," "P. P. betting," and all and singular such devices, are to have their swing-swing-swing and run enough; and "let every man take care of himself," as a gallant member of Tattersall's said to the committee. Just such counsel was given by the denker to the chickens when he danced among the hen-coops. The gallant captain is in a condition to weather the pirates, but we should be glad to know how he is to protect himself? Are any precautions taken that the subscribers to Tattersall's (a society formed for the especial purpose of betting, and one which gives the bias to the investment of vast ventures on the turf,) shall be parties of substantive respectability—of money as well as manners?—the two items which now-a-days constitute the man, and without both of which he is "but half made up." No such thing. There are individuals there, as plenty as blackberries, who have not paid the half—the quarter—the sixteenth—hardly a fractional portion of their losses in the ring. It is not enough that their creditors countenance their defaults: there they are where better from all quarters of the globe "most do congregate," and the style in which they may be seen "picking up" a country gentleman now and then, would put to the blush Goldsmith's green spectacles merchant. If the system of general speculation on the issues of the turf is to be comforted by state patronage, at least we have a right to expect that some place shall exist, appropriated to its details, where gentlemen may venture as among their fellows, instead of trusting themselves among a company of cut-purses. This may seem harsh language, but it is the truth. There are among the existing members of that society persons who cast shame upon an association, whose sole bond of confederacy is honour. Let us believe the time of reform at Tattersall's is not remote. This latter confidence, too, may be more extended than in its application to men and manners. Surely some small endowment of necessities might most conveniently be made upon the Subscription Room. On Thursday afternoon it was without information about the results of Wednesday's racing at Liverpool, or any news touching the state of the odds. A return list, instances such as that, ought to be forwarded by express (the rail is express master-general), and posted up the moment of its arrival. Every appliance of the turf comes twenty-one years after it is needed.

The Sheet Calendar of the 15th instant, gave us such a Derby and Oaks entry for 1845, as never entered the most disinterested dreams of our forefathers: there are 195 subscribers to the former, and 149 to the latter; thus, the Derby has much more than doubled in fifteen years, and the Oaks has improved in the same proportion. What betting round we shall have if the Home Secretary don't meddle with it! No doubt a hundred horses will be backed for the Derby of 1846, so that at 7 to 1 against every one of the lot, there would be a fortune for the book maker that laid against the whole party to a hundred pounds. The speculation during the week, save that upon the Liverpool event, was not worth the name of betting. Nothing was done on Thursday at the Corner, save a few offers to back Alice Hawthorn for the Goodwood Cup, at 2 to 1. And till Goodwood business is introduced in earnest, it will be dull times for the industrious investor of loose cash on loose consequences.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The Goodwood Stakes betting was flat, with no other result than to raise Franchise a point or two on last week's market. The chief feature of the day's business was the fall of Alice Hawthorn to 3 to 1, with plenty of layers, and the advance of the Squire and Robert de Gorham to 5 to 1, both taken freely. Nothing fresh on the St. Leger.

TWENTY-THREE RACES.—These races are fixed for Wednesday and Thursday next. The entrance for the Produce Stakes are fourteen, including some of the first two-year-olds of the day. In the Gloucestershire Stakes sixteen are entered, and excellent sport is anticipated in this race. Seven are entered for the Tradesmen and Lookers' Cup, and for the seven other races some very excellent horses have arrived. The course, from the late rains, is in beautiful order and presents such turf as but few places in England can boast of.

RUNNING REIN AND THE FAUCON.—The portraits of these celebrated racers, cleverly painted by Mr. Slayer, have just been well engraved by Mr. Charles Hunt, and coloured in a superior style. The portrait of the Emperor, the winner of the Ascot Cup, by the same successful painter, is in the hands of the engraver.

EASTERN YACHT CLUB.—It is anticipated that a regatta, on an extensive scale, will be held in Harwich Harbour, towards the end of the ensuing month, under the auspices of the "Eastern Yacht Club," now about being formed.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY CLUB.—A great boat race amongst the gentlemen of the Royal Academy Club, for a pair of gold oars, will take place on Tuesday next, from Vauxhall to Putney-bridge.

CRICKET.—On Monday the great match between the Marylebone Club, with Pitch, against the Northern Counties, with A. Mynn, Esq., was commenced, and as this was considered one of the most interesting matches of the season, the ground was crowded with spectators, and many of high rank and fashion, and all appeared to take a lively interest in the game. The following are the fields:—Marylebone Club—Sir P. Buxton, Kynaston, Keate, Mills, and Taylor, Esqs., with Dean, Derrington, Killey, Lillywhite, Pich, and Sewell. Northern Counties—Elmhurst, Hartopp, Nethercote, Noyes, and Mynn, Esqs., with Butler, Brown, Clark, Fenner, Guy, and Tinsley. The Marylebone Club went in first, and obtained 97 runs. The Northern Counties then took to their batting, and got 100 runs, heading their opponents by 3 runs. The Marylebone Club took their second innings, and obtained 76 runs, leaving 64 runs for the opposite party to get, but who got only 15 runs, thus leaving the Marylebone Club the winners by 13 runs. The game was not concluded till Wednesday night.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Earl of Haddington and the other Lords of the Admiralty visited Deptford Dockyard on Tuesday, and mastered the officers and men belonging to the establishment.

The Collingwood, 44, Captain H. Eden, bent sails and crossed topgallant-ways on Tuesday, and is expected will leave Portsmouth Harbour for Spithead directly. She has a very fine set of men on board, to all appearance, both as respects their physical and sailor-like qualities. She will be ready for sea on the 25th instant.

The Queen, 110, Captain Martin, was taken into dock at Portsmouth on Monday, all standing, with her middle and main-deck guns in, and all her stores on board, under the command of Mr. Bellamy, the master. On Tuesday morning her pendant was re-hoisted, being commissioned by Lieut. Robt. Hall, of the Camperdown. She will remain in dock until some alteration is made in her cabins and other internal fittings.

The Indus, 70, superannuated advanced ship for Portsmouth, instead of the Malabar, was undocked at Devonport, on Tuesday morning.

The Terrible, steam-frigate, building at Deptford, is to have tubular boilers, and small engines to fetch the boilers.

A general court-martial is ordered to assemble in Limerick—Colonel Chatterton, 4th Dragoon Guards, president—for the trial, at his own request, of Lieutenant Wm. Augustus Hyder, 18th Hussars, quartered there, on charges preferred by his commanding officer, Colonel Vandeleur.

The 32nd regiment, under Lieutenant Colonel Markham, will arrive in Dublin, from Manchester, this day. The 5th Fusiliers have received the route for Belfast to replace the 66th, ordered to this garrison. The 11th Hussars will not leave Dundalk until October. On their arrival there the 11th Hussars proceed to Dublin.—Dublin Monitor of Monday.

IRELAND.

DEPARTURE OF LORD DE GREY.—The Lord Lieutenant and the Countess de Grey held an address levee at Dublin Castle on Monday, for the reception of those desirous of paying their respects previous to the departure of their excellencies. The levee commenced at one o'clock, and for nearly an hour visitors continued to arrive. The attendance was numerous, and comprised most of the nobility and gentry now in town, a considerable number of clergymen, officials, military officers, &c. After the reception, an address to Lord de Grey, highly complimenting his excellency personally, but avoiding any special allusion to political questions, was presented by Sir Edward Brough and a deputation. This address was signed by the Archbishop of Armagh and several bishops, a number of peers, and a great number of deputy-lieutenants, magistrates, &c. The final departure of the Earl and Countess de Grey from Dublin, took place on Tuesday morning with the usual ceremonies.

Mr. O'Connell.—According to a statement made at the Repeal Association on Monday, Mr. O'Connell is joyous and buoyant, and occupies himself with "practising gymnastics" so that, it was added, when he comes out of prison he will have acquired not only additional strength, but more grace of attitude. All representations agree in describing Mr. O'Connell to be in excellent health and spirits.

UNFORTUNATE OCCURRENCE.—Mr. Wm. E. Ryan, brother of Alderman E. F. Ryan, of Limerick, fell over the tailrail of the steamer at Lough Derg, near Killisnoe, on Wednesday evening, and was drowned. The deceased, when a mere lad, was blown up in his bed, at the awful gunpowder explosion at George's-street, Limerick, on the night of the 3rd of January, 1837, and most providentially escaped, though in the very focus of death and desolation.

THE REPEAL RUMOUR.—On Saturday last there was some excitement at the Head Police Office, Dublin, in consequence of that day being fixed to hear the charge of Ignatius Kenna against Capt. Matthews, of the 24th regiment, for assault and larceny, in forcing from his breast a Repeal button. From the statement of Richard O'Connell, Esq., who was counsel for Ennis, it appeared that the complainant was a carman, and some money was due to him from Lieutenant Agnew, of the 26th, stationed in Portobello Barracks. That gentleman desired Ennis to call for the amount on last Monday morning. He accordingly proceeded to the barracks for that purpose. He passed the sentinel at the gate, and was going towards the quarters of Lieutenant Agnew, when he observed a body of soldiers, in marching order, moving towards him. When they came up to him, Captain Matthews stepped up to him, and said "You scoundrel, how dare you come in here with that button," seizing him by the lapel of the coat, and tearing the button from it, which he retained. He then called him "and roughly pushed him, again calling him foul names, such as you "rascal and scoundrel." The button which excited the ire of the gallant officer was what is called a Repeal button, and rumour had it that there was a military order against admitting persons wearing it to pass into any of the barracks; but he (Mr. O'Connell) contended that his client had a right to wear it, and that no man could legally deprive him of it, much less assault him in compelling him to yield up his property. This account was proved in evidence. The counsel for Capt. Matthews said there was a positive order from the commander of the forces that no person wearing party emblems of any kind should be permitted to enter any of the barracks in Ireland, and that order applied as well to Orange Bibles as to Repeal buttons. Captain Matthews would as soon remove an Orange Lily from the breast of a person appearing within the precincts of the barracks, as he would a Repeal button. His client avowed the act, and he believed that in it he was strictly performing his duty. He did not seize hold of the man, as was alleged, until he had first told him to go out; but as he paid no attention to what he said, he took hold of the lapel of the coat, and used no more force than was necessary to remove the button. He also denied having called Ennis any such names as rascal and scoundrel. Evidence was given on the part of the defendant of the fact that there was an order against wearing party badges in the barracks in Ireland. The magistrates, after hearing both sides, were of opinion that an assault in law had been committed, and that there was nothing to justify it. They therefore ordered Captain Matthews to find bail for his appearance at the next commission, which will sit on the 26th of August.

POSTSCRIPT.

RETURN OF EARL DE GREY.—The Earl and Countess de Grey and suite have arrived in St. James's-square, from the Vice-Regal Lodge, Dublin Castle. Lord Heytesbury, the newly-appointed Lord Lieutenant, had an interview with the noble earl yesterday.

We regret to hear that Lord John Russell has been detained in the country by the indisposition of Lady John Russell, who, however, is, we believe, gradually recovering.

We understand that the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Heytesbury, accompanied by his private secretary, Mr. Henry A'Court, who lately held that appointment under Lord Elliot, will leave town on Thursday next, the 25th inst., for Dublin Castle, via Liverpool. Lady Heytesbury and the Hon. Miss A'Court were not expected to leave Queen Anne-street for the Vice-Regal Lodge until the end of the ensuing month.

GOVERNMENT AND THE RAILWAY BILL.—The result of the interview which took place on Thursday between Mr. Gladstone, on the part of the Government, Mr. Estlin, M.P., Mr. Hudson, Mr. Glynn, Mr. Saunders, &c., as a deputation from the railway companies, is in the highest degree satisfactory. The subject having been fully gone into, the Right Hon. President of the Board of Trade stated his determination so to modify the bill, as to render it in every way unobjectionable to the railway interest. The measure will now pass through Parliament without opposition, and it is believed, will prove satisfactory both to the shareholders and the public.

ROYAL TRAMER YACHT CLUB.—The closing match of the season for two valuable pieces of plate will take place on Thursday next, from Greenwich Hospital to Coalhouse Point and back. The match creates a very lively interest amongst yachting gentlemen. Of the first class, the Phantom and Champion are the two favourites. In the second heat the Fay, an iron boat, which has been successful in the only match she has sailed, is the favourite against the fleet, while the Dolphin next has the call.

ERAN COLLIER V. THE OFFICERS OF THE BLUEN.—A match at cricket was played last Wednesday, in the shooting fields at Eton College, between the Etonians who compose the Aquatic Club, and the officers of the Blues. The match was played out, and terminated in favour of the military by thirty runs. The play of Sir Michael Shaw Stewart was much admired, and to the fine bowling of the Hon. Mr. Miles, on the part of the officers, and that of Mr. Duff, the military are indebted for their victory.

CHURCH RATES.—The parish of South Hackney yesterday carried a church rate without a poll being demanded.—The parish of Christchurch, Hackney, have also agreed to a compulsory rate.

WESTMINSTER NATIONAL INFANT SCHOOLS.—Yesterday the annual examination of the children educated in these schools took place at the central school room, Broad-street, Golden-square, in the presence of the clergy of the surrounding parishes, and the supporters of the Schools. The children were examined in all the elementary useful branches of knowledge; and their ready accurate answers elicited the unqualified approbation of all present.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF MESSRS. CHAMBERS.—In the Bankruptcy Court, on Thursday, an audit was taken of the accounts in this extraordinary case, which has for the last twenty years been prominently placed before the public, both in that court, and every other court of law in Westminster, and is even now awaiting the decision of an appeal to the House of Lords as to the right of sale in the assignees of the Italian Opera House. The commission was dated in November, 1824, and since that period Mr. Chambers, sen., has been the inmate of the Fleet and Queen's prisons. Mr. Hamilton attended for the assignees, and put in a statement of the bankrupt's affairs, which involved large sums of money. Mr. Hamilton then entered into an explanation of the reasons why there had been no dividend. One of these reasons was the difficulty which had occurred in the sale and purchase of the Opera House. The result of the statement was, that if several matters now pending were settled favourably, there would be some large sums for the benefit of the creditors. Mr. Hamilton stated, that if the judgment of the House of Lords should not be pronounced in the course of this session, the whole affair, as to the sale of the Opera, and the settlement of the accounts, would be again thrown over for the next twelve months.—The further hearing was then adjourned to an early day in November next.

SHIPWRECK.—Intelligence has been received at Lloyd's of the wreck of two British ships, the Matilda and the Adolphus. Captain George Dawson, of the former, states that on the 4th of October he sailed from Valparaiso, bound for Buenos Ayres and Monte Video, with a cargo of wheat and Brazil wood; that sixteen days after, in lat. 42° 38' N., long. 79° 40' 44' W., she was struck by a heavy sea, which carried away the galley, all the water casks on deck, the boat, and one side of her upper works, from which accident the vessel began to leak; he steered for the nearest land, and began to throw cargo overboard. The hull of the other ship was discovered by a French whaling vessel. She had cleared out from Newcastle on June 25th, laden with coals for the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, and had not since been heard of. She was laden with coals and empty bottles, which bore every appearance of having been the victim of the ignition of the cargo.

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE CROYDON RAILWAY.—A long inquiry took place on Thursday evening before Mr. Joseph Payne, in the Board-room of Guy's Hospital, touching the death of Benjamin Catermole, aged 33 years. It appeared, from the evidence of several witnesses, that on Sunday afternoon last deceased entered one of the third-class carriages at Croydon, for London; he was quite sober, and made himself very familiar with the other passengers. While proceeding towards town, when the train had reached the Jolly Sailor, he suddenly made an effort to sit on the top of the back part of the carriage, when he overbalanced himself, and fell between the coupling-irons and the chain on to the rails, when the whole of the train, which was going at full speed, passed over his body. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

FOREIGN.

WAR BETWEEN FRANCE AND MOROCCO.—BATTLE BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND THE MOORS.—An extraordinary express has arrived from Paris, bringing an account of a skirmish which took place between the French troops and those of the Emperor of Morocco, on the 3rd inst. The skirmish was not of a serious character, but the occurrence is important, as it proves that in spite of the reports of the termination of the dispute, the forces of the Emperor were still in motion against the French. The account is contained in a dispatch from Marshal Bugeaud to the Prince de Joinville, and is dated "Brazzaville, upon the Oued Ialy, near its mouth, July 3." It gives rather a rambling account of the occurrence, and does not state the number of killed and wounded. "The Morocco chief, it appears, had established himself at ten leagues distance from Marshal Bugeaud, and during the day the enemy fired upon the Marshal's advanced posts. The dispatch concludes with the following analysis of what occurred subsequently:—"The Moors evinced no audacity; everybody remarked that they were less bold than in the two first encounters. Some of our sharpshooters were alone engaged with them. Nevertheless we found several opportunities of firing our mountain howitzers with effect against them. On our reaching the camp, which I had left in the morning, it was reported that their infantry had been seen retreating along the left bank of the Oued Ialy. I did not hesitate then to order out my cavalry. That of

FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL GALLERY. NEW PICTURE—REMBRANDT'S "RABBI."

Rembrandt, one of the most celebrated painters of the Dutch school, also an etcher admired for the boldness of his designs, notwithstanding the apparently careless execution of them, which, to an uneducated eye, made them seem so many scratchings, was born near Leyden, in 1606, and died in 1688. He could finish, if he liked, up to the fineness of enamel (witness a painting of his in this Gallery, "The Woman taken in Adultery"), but his own penchant was for the dash and glare, and sometimes whimsically opposite gloom, which alternately appear in his pictures. There is one remarkable quality in his productions; they may be placed in any light, and seen to advantage, for their lustre is in themselves.

The rose is pale beneath the moon—alone
Her lover can her blushes see—all flow'rs Have each their own peculiar light—some choose
The morning or the noon-tide hour to open
Their beautiful bosoms to the sight:
Some sentimental blossoms wait till eve
Is in the dewy west ere they awake
Their lovely eyes!—but in the forest deep
Of Mexico, there is a flow'r that glows
F're through the gloom of midnight's darkest hour,
And from within its long-inwreathed
bell
Pours out a stream of the most glorious light, Dazzling the weak beholder's eye with beauty!

Something resembling this Torch-flower is the internal light of Rembrandt's pictures. The Jewish "Rabbi" which has been recently added to the National Collection, is not one of his greatest productions, is a splendid performance—a study for young portrait painters. There is none of that mawkish, tea-board lackery colouring about it—all is breadth and freedom and strength. Some slight objections might be made in detail—but "ubi placet silebit," it is much more pleasant to chronicle the beauties than the defects. The head of the Rabbi is a splendid specimen of what the hand of Genius can create; and the picture is a valuable acquisition to the Gallery. It was purchased for 410 guineas at the sale of the late Mr. Harman's collection, and was once the property of the Duke of Argyll.

A JEWISH RABBI. BY REMBRANDT, IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

"THE WISE AND FOOLISH VIRGINS." BY J. E. LAUDER.—IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE TEN VIRGINS.—"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves."—Matthew, chap. xxv.

This picture is one of great promise for the English school. With the firmness, breadth, and simplicity of expression which characterized the greater works of Gainsborough, it has much of the dignity and sentiment of the hitherto inimitable school of Caracci. As a whole, the composition is dramatic without exaggeration, and forcible without overstepping the sublime simplicity of the scripture narrative. Its faults are those of detail: the colouring is in many parts crude in finish and injudicious in distribution, while much of the drawing is feeble and ill proportioned. But these are errors which experience will rectify. The expression—the sacred power of the parable is realised, and all is solemn and instructively impressive. It is the first work of a young man, and we are glad to learn has found a liberal purchaser.

THE EXHIBITION AT WESTMINSTER HALL.—It may be well to remind our readers that the exhibition of the works of art placed in Westminster Hall, pursuant to the notice issued by her Majesty's Commissioners of the Fine Arts, was for the first time thrown open for the gratuitous admission of the public on Monday. Though it was not generally understood that the exhibition would be free so soon after its first opening, the hall was numerously attended, the great majority of the persons present being well attired, while there appeared to be very few of the working classes among the visitors. All conducted themselves with the most perfect propriety and decorum. Numbers of persons have visited the exhibition during the week. On Saturdays the charge for admission will be 1s.

GREAT MEETING OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.—THE TOWN AND PORT OF SOUTHAMPTON.

GREAT MEETING OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.

The anniversary meeting of this truly national society is appointed to take place at Southampton in the ensuing week; and, in our two next Journals, we shall present our readers with an illustrated record of the Society's Show, the Prize Animals, &c. The proceedings may be said to have commenced on Thursday, the last day of receiving implements, wheat, barley, seeds, &c., to be exhibited in the Implement Yard, and arranged by the Stewards for the Judges' inspection. The proceedings will be resumed on Tuesday, and terminate on Friday next.

As the most useful information at present, we subjoin a plan representing the situation of the Society's Pavilion and Show Yards; the Victoria Inn, and the principal Inns; all points of interest in connection with this great Agricultural gathering:

CHURCHES.

- a. Holy Rood.
- b. St. Lawrence.
- c. All Saints.
- d. St. Mary's.
- e. St. Paul's.
- f. St. Michael's.

The town of Southampton (of which we have annexed a bird's-eye view), though lying within Hampshire, forms a county of itself, situated on a point of land between the river Alre, or Itchen, on the east, and the Test, Terse, or Anton, on the west: these rivers here uniting form the estuary called Southampton Water.

The town lies somewhat elevated on the bank of the Anton, which washes it on the west and south sides. The principal, or High-street, runs north and south, and is divided into two parts by an ancient bar, or gateway, belonging to the old town wall. The other streets or lanes lead from the High-street at right angles, or are nearly parallel to it. On the south side of the town is the quay: near which, at the south-western corner of the town, is the pier, a structure of considerable extent and elegance. At the east end of the quay is a raised walk, or causeway; and on the platform, or battery, near the quay, is a singular gem of the time of Henry VIII. The more modern part of the town, above the Bar, contains some handsome ranges of buildings. High-street is handsomely built throughout. A new road from thence to the Itchen leads to the floating-bridge, which forms the communication with Fareham, Gosport, and Portsmouth.

The principal parish churches are in High-street. Of these, Holy Rood, a large and ancient structure, with a lofty tower and spire, and a long colonnade, or portico, in front, is distinctly shown in the engraving; as is also the Grecian-Ionic church of All Saints, above Holy Rood; and about midway between them a church not yet completed. St. Michael's, the most ancient church, is in the west part of the town, and has a tower and several Norman porches. There are several Dissenting places of worship; and the Corporation have, besides the Guildhall, a handsome audit-house, a borough gaol, and a debtors' prison. There are also a theatre, assembly-rooms, reading-rooms, libraries, billiard-rooms, bathing-rooms, and a botanic garden. The topography of the town will be better understood by reference to the prefixed plan.

Southampton was anciently a place of great trade, which declined to a very low ebb. It revived in the eighteenth century; but its improvement has been mainly in the present century, in which it has trebled its population. It has a secure harbour, and considerable docks are in course of construction. There are a custom-house and four banking establishments; it is the largest packet-port in the kingdom; and has been materially benefited by its direct railway communication with London.

THE HARVEST.—We are glad to find, from the provincial papers, that in spite of the fears expressed, in consequence of the long drought, the harvest is likely to be a good one. The Halifax Guardian says:—"We congratulate our readers upon the hopeful harvest prospects, which we hear from all parts of the country. The weather, during the week, has been most reasonable, and the crops, of all descriptions, continue rapidly to improve. There is the prospect, not only of a abundant, but of an early harvest. Reports from the south and east speak of the wheat as falling into the green and yellow leaf, and the Scotch papers say that the harvest will probably be earlier in that country than any harvest since 1822."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

The House of Commons met to-day at one. On the motion of Mr. Gladstone the committee on the Railways Bill was postponed until Thursday next at one o'clock. The right hon. gentleman stated that by that day he expected to receive the opinion of the Directors of the various railway companies upon the measure. After some opposition on the part of Mr. Wakley, the house resolved into committee on the Poor Law Amendment Bill, with which the house was occupied for some hours, and then adjourned till Monday.

Before the proceedings were ended, Mr. Wakley took an opportunity of giving an emphatic denial to an insinuation of Mr. Wodehouse, which, indeed, was not made for the first time. Mr. Wodehouse, at the conclusion of some remarks relative to incendiarianism, referred to Mr. Wakley, and said, "No one is more capable to give an opinion on the subject of incendiarianism than the hon. member himself." Mr. Wakley repelled the charge as a foul calumny, and thus explained the origin of it:—"I had the misfortune," said Mr. Wakley, "to be attacked in my own house; my house was burnt. I brought an action against the insurance-office which related my claim; and every farthing for which I was insured was given me by a jury—Lord Tenterden being the judge (hear); and, after the trial, one of the jurymen, who was himself a proprietor of the insurance-company against which I proceeded, joined my friends in a subscription to pay my extra expenses as between attorney and client. (Hear, hear.) All this was stated in the newspapers at the time; but as I have been most shamefully and cruelly used by persons creating out insinuations against me, I do trust that the house will feel that I have not now unnecessarily interfered." (Cheers.)—Mr. Wodehouse expressed his satisfaction that he had afforded Mr. Wakley the opportunity of giving so distinct an answer to the accusation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Earl of Radnor presented a petition from Mr. Marshall, praying to be examined before the Secret Committee on the Post-office, but the Duke of Wellington having stated that the petitioner's character had nothing to do with the object of the inquiry, the petition was withdrawn.

DISSENTERS' CHAPEL BILL.—The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the house should agree to the amendments made by the House of Commons in this bill, and called upon their lordships to sanction the measure, as a large majority of the house had marked its sense of its justice and policy. The noble and learned lord defended the bill with great animation, and expressed his regret that it had excited so much opposition from the Bench of Bishops. The noble and learned lord concluded his exhortation in favour of the bill in these emphatic terms:—"He was sorry that the chief opposition to the bill proceeded from the dissenting body—from those who not so very long since complained of being made the victims of persecution—who had obtained from the Legislature all they could get, and now desired to withhold from their brethren that toleration which they had demanded and obtained for themselves. Some of their lordships might remember a remarkable speech of a wise, eloquent, and philosophical statesman, Mr. Burke; he did not dare to quote the whole of the eloquent passage to which he alluded, it was too warm for the temperance of that house (a laugh); but he would repeat the last sentence:—"If," said he, "instead of burying themselves in the depths of the divine councils, they would turn to the mild moderation of the gospel, they would there read their own condemnation." O thou unworthy servant, did I not forgive thee because thou desiredst me? Shouldst not thou have extended to thy fellow-servant that which I have extended to thee?"—The Bishop of London opposed the amendments made by the Commons with much energy, and called upon the house to take the last opportunity of voting against a bill which was contrary to the dictates of reason, and to the maxims of common sense. The third clause contained the very essence of injustice, because it barred the relations, who had already almost obtained judgment in their favour, from further prosecuting their claims. The second clause, as altered by the Commons, was frightfully destructive to the cause of the Christian Church and to the principles of eternal truth, because it declared that doctrines, directly in opposition to those fundamental truths on which our hopes of salvation rest, may be taught in any place of worship whatever. Then the degradation by Parliament of Unitarian meeting-houses as places "for the worship of God" was a recognition most palpably contrary to the constitution of this Christian country, which could not regard as lawful any worship to the Deity except such as was offered to the Trinity. After thus impugning the principle of the bill, the Bishop of London said, that although almost dissuaded by the talents opposed to him, yet he felt comforted, in the course his duty imposed on him, by the reflection that out of doors the vast majority of all professions, and that many of the Judges both of the courts of law and equity were with him in hostility to it. He approved neither of the bill nor the amendments. In some respects those amendments were an improvement—in others, a worsening of the bill. But he could not accept of either. It was a hasty measure, introduced and adopted without sufficient Parliamentary inquiry; and, if passed into a law, would outrage the religious feelings which pervaded the great bulk of the community. In conclusion the right rev. prelate moved that the Commons' amendments be considered that day three months.—The Bishop of Durham supported the measure.—Lord Brougham also spoke in its favour. He denied that the great body of Dissenters were opposed to it, and said he regarded it as a measure advantageous to all classes of Churchmen and Dissenters, and calculated to promote peace, and prevent schism.—The Bishop of Norwich admitted that at first he looked upon the measure as a Socinian endorsement bill; but on further examination, he found it to be a measure of equity and justice.—The Earl of Rosslyn strongly condemned the bill, and said the principles of it were utterly inconsistent with that of a Conservative Government. The bill was of a more spoliative character than the Appropriation clause.—Lord Cottenham, with much candour, undertook to defend the Conservative character of the Government, and to explain the meaning which he attached to the word Conservative. He said if he were right in the meaning which he had always attached to the word "Conservative," the present bill was entitled to be considered as purely a Conservative measure, for its object was to do justice, by protecting property that had been in the hands of particular parties for a great length of time, and preventing its spoliation from those who were in the enjoyment of it, in order to have it transferred to others who had no earthly right to it. Such was the meaning that he attached to the word "Conservative." (Lord cries of "Hear, hear," from the Ministerial benches.)—Lord Tevisham, the Earl of Galloway, and Lord Lyttelton spoke against the bill.—On a division the numbers were—

In favour of the amendments made by the House of Commons	232
For the Bishop of London's amendment	41
Majority in favour of the bill	191

The Commons' amendments were then agreed to.

The Loan Societies (Ireland) Bill, and the Birkenhead Docks Bill were read a third time and passed, and the house adjourned at half-past eleven.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE POOR-LAW BILL.—The house met at twelve o'clock in the day, and discussed the Poor-law Amendment Bill in committee. On the 25th clause, Mr. CROFTESBURY urged the expediency of establishing in each union workhouse a ward for the homeless poor who were journeying in quest of employment or of their parishes.—Sir J. GRAHAM was favourable to this suggestion, though he considered it not to be strictly connected with the clause in discussion. At present it was not unusual to commit these wanderers to prison; but he thought it much better to provide them with a temporary asylum than to send them to gaol. Three or four of these asylums, in well-selected localities, would enable the police to bring such persons where they might have shelter for a night, or even refuge for three or four days, and due care in case of sickness. Such an arrangement would fulfil the duties of Christianity and humanity, which he feared were neglected under the present system.—The clause was opposed by Mr. T. DUNCOMB and other members, but was carried on a division.—At four o'clock the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and it was arranged that the bill should be proceeded with on Wednesday. At five o'clock the house met again.—Mr. WODEHOUSE made a more ample apology to Mr. Wakley than he had done on Saturday.—Sir ROBERT PEEL considered the explanation to be in unison with the unanimous feelings of the house, and hoped it would be put on the records of the house as a public declaration.—Mr. WAKLEY expressed his gratitude, and said the acknowledgment would be most satisfactory to every member of his family, and he had a particular motive in making that declaration.—In answer to a question from Mr. HUME, Sir J. GRAHAM said that as he saw no prospect of Lord Cottenham's bill for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt being proceeded with this session, he must withdraw the County Courts' Bill.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.—Mr. WYSE moved for a select committee to inquire, in accordance with the prayer of the petition presented on the 17th of June, into the facts connected with the formation of the special jury in the case of "The Queen, at the prosecution of the Attorney-General, v. Daniel O'Connell and others." Mr. WYSE grounded his claim to the inquiry, upon the fact that petitions had been presented from nearly 1,500,000 of the Irish people praying for it. The hon. member alluded to the excitement which prevailed in Ireland upon the subject, and contended that the trial had not been a fair one. He then went over the various technical objections to the jury lists which have been so often urged, and repeated some of the other well-known grounds urged against the validity of the trial. Mr. WYSE, in conclusion, said the Ministers themselves had raised Mr. O'Connell into the position of importance which he occupied, and urged them to undo the injury they had inflicted on the Irish nation.—Lord ELMOR opposed the motion, on the ground that Mr. WYSE had not substantiated any of his objections to the fairness of the trial, and particularly as the whole question was now under the consideration of the House of Lords.—Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL addressed the house in the same spirit as Mr. WYSE.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL entered into some details respecting the trial, and denied that any unfairness had been practised against the defendants. He also vindicated the summing up of the Lord Chief Justice, and said the present discussion was in the highest degree calculated to cast suspicion on the administration of justice at this most important trial. Under what circumstances was this motion made? A most dangerous and extensive conspiracy existed in Ireland—a conspiracy fraught with the most dangerous consequences—threatening danger to the whole empire. This conspiracy—not by asking for extraordinary powers, not by using a coercion bill—with so other weapons than the ordinary arm of the law, the Government had beaten down to the ground—the law had indicated its supremacy—the offenders were beaten beneath its feet;—and it was under such circumstances that the hon. gentleman endeavored to impugn the justice of the proceedings, and to lead the public mind to the conclusion that the parties implicated had not been fairly dealt with. (Cheers.)—Mr. V. STUART urged the house to agree to the inquiry, in order to restore confidence in the administration of the laws.—On a division, the numbers were—

For Mr. Wyse's motion	73
Against it	51
Majority against the motion	22

The London and Croydon Railway Bill was read a third time. The house sat till past midnight.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

LORD MONTAGUE obtained leave to bring in a bill to legalize such Art Unions as possessed charters, and to give to those which had not, provided they were approved by the Board of Trade, an equal legality.—The bill was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

EARL FORSTER then introduced the case of Mr. O'Driscoll, an Irish magistrate. That gentleman, as may be recollected, was dismissed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland from the commission of the peace, for intemperate conduct in beating a boy, and for using offensive language to his brother magistrates, but who has since been re-appointed, upon a memorial addressed to the Lord-Lieutenant, and signed by five noblemen, 13 clergymen, 41 esquires, and 2849 respectable inhabitants of the county, praying for his restoration. The noble earl complained of the re-appointment of Mr. O'Driscoll as another insult to Ireland, and moved for copies of any memorial or memorials addressed to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, recommending the restoration of Mr. Alexander O'Driscoll to the commission of the peace.—Lord WHARFCLIFFE, in reply, defended the conduct of the Government.—The Marquis of NORMANBY strongly impugned it, and contrasted the policy of the Whigs.—A long discussion arose upon Irish matters generally, in the course of which some angry remarks were made by noble lords on both sides of the house, but nothing of political importance elicited. Ultimately, the motion for the documents was agreed to.

The Charitable Bequests Bill was re-committed, and the house adjourned at half-past nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The house met at twelve o'clock, and, after some discussion and a division, resolved into committee on the Metropolitan Buildings Bill. A number of the clauses were agreed to, and some verbal amendments added.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—In the evening, LORD PALMERSTON, in moving for returns connected with the slave-trade, entered into some very interesting details upon the subject. The first part of his speech was devoted to an argument, which he supported by statistics, to prove that the slave-trade was much on the increase, and that several Governments had refused to fulfil their engagements to put down the traffic. Lord Palmerston made the following statement to show the immense number of slaves annually carried from Africa, and imported into the islands and continent of America, for the purposes of slavery. He said, "Now, what are the numbers which are calculated at this time to be annually imported to the islands and continent of America? Mr. Handlin, in his able work on the subject, compiled from official documents, and containing condensed forms in a small compass of more valuable information than perhaps any other work of its size can afford.—Mr. Handlin, a man of great industry and accuracy, calculates the number of those only who have landed in America, previous to the few years that have lately elapsed, at from 120,000 to 130,000, and Sir F. Buxton, in his interesting and valuable work, puts the numbers at 150,000 at least." The noble lord then drew this startling picture of the horrors connected with slavery:—"But any man who thinks that only 150,000 negroes are sacrificed to the avarice and cruelty of men—I will not call them Christian men—belonging to Christian nations, is very far from the truth. It is calculated, that for every negro who lands, two others have perished in the previous stages of the slave-trade; that whatever number may be landed, that number must be multiplied by three before you can arrive at the full sacrifice of human life—at the full number of human persons who are annually swept away from the population of Africa. It is well known that the negroes are not collected at the places where they embark; many of them come from a great distance in the interior of Africa—many hundred miles in the interior, down to the sea-coast—some of them are captured taken in wars—were stimulated and brought on by the prospect of gain to be derived from the sale of the captive; but the greater number are the victims of the system of man-stealing which prevails in the interior of Africa. The way it takes place is this: When the time of year comes round for sending a slave caravan to the coast, some peaceable African village, whose unsuspecting inhabitants are buried in that repose which nature kindly bestows on man to fit him for the useful occupations and the innocent engagements of the succeeding day—some African village in the dead of night is surrounded by armed ruffians; the huts are set on fire; the inhabitants, roused from their sleep by the flames in which they are enveloped, endeavor to escape; some attempt it by flight, and some by resistance, but all fail; the fugitives are brought back, and those who resisted are overpowered and made slaves. Sometimes a hill-village is attacked, where the intricacies of the ground afford a greater facility for escape; some of the inhabitants fly to the neighbouring caverns; some take refuge in the high grounds; fires are lighted at the mouths of the caves, and those who sheltered themselves within are compelled to choose between suffocation within and captivity without. The wells on which the natives depend for water are occupied, and those who have fled to the high grounds are compelled by the intolerable torments of thirst to barter their liberty for a few drops of water. (Hear, hear, hear.) Then comes the selection. The hale and healthy of either sex, with children about six or seven years of age, are put aside by the merchant to go with the caravan to the coast; the aged and the infirm, the infant at the mother's breast, the child under six or seven years of age, to send them to the coast would be impossible, and if it were possible it would be without profit—to maintain them would be costly—to leave them to perish would be too cruel even for the slave hunter; they are despatched, and are the least to be pitied. (Hear.) Well, the caravan sets out—men, women, and children, half-naked, barefooted, and weak, are driven on by the lash and the goad, the strong restrained from flight by yokes and chains—they are marched 100 miles across the burning sands of the plain, and over the stony passes of the mountains; with disease of body and agony of mind, so, a drop down dead on the way; others, unable to keep up with the rest, are left behind to perish by a lingering death of hunger or thirst, or become a prey to the wild beasts of the desert, and others are knocked on the head, and put out of their misery. Multitudes perish in this way, and travellers who have visited the interior tell us that they can trace the march of a slave caravan through the pathless wilderness, and that at the wells and watering places thousands of human skeletons are bleaching and mouldering in the dust. (Hear, hear.) Well, the slave ship arrives, the captain lands, inspects the negroes, chooses those whose health and strength lead him to think they will outlive the passage, and become profitable to the merchant. Those whose weakly or sickly appearance induce him to believe will not outlive the voyage he rejects altogether, and these last are either put out of the way, or are left to perish on the coast by famine and distress. It has been reckoned, and I believe the calculation is not exaggerated, that whatever may be the number of negroes embarked on the coast, an equal number perish previously at the seizure, on the march, or in the detention. Therefore, for every 100 negroes put on board, 100 human beings are always sacrificed." After describing the agonies of the negroes on board ships, Lord Palmerston made the following summary of the results of this heinous traffic. "From all those various causes I reckon that one-third of the negroes who are embarked on the coast of Africa perish before they reach the coast of America, and if to that one-third 500 be added as having died before embarkation, I say that for every negro landed in America two others have perished at the previous stages of this abominable traffic. Why, according to that, if 150,000 have been landed only for the few years last past, the ravage committed on the population of Africa must be measured by a number not short of from 450,000 to 500,000 every year; and let any man reckon what a fearful devastation that depopulation must have caused, during the last 10 years, throughout the African interior. (Hear, hear.) Why, I undertake to say that, if all the other crimes the human race have committed from the creation of the world down to the present hour were classed together in one fell aggregate—I undertake to say that the great aggregate would not equal—at any rate would not exceed—the extent of the devastation of human life under this heinous, this atrocious traffic." (Cheers.) Having thus proved the extent of the evil, the noble lord argued that our Government in particular was bound to put an end to the disgusting system. He accused the present Ministry of not having endeavored to do so, and argued that while he and his friends were in office they had effected great diminution in the numbers of slaves landed in America. For instance, "in the year 1828, there were landed in the Brazil 34,000, and in Cuba 29,000, making a total of 123,000. In 1849 there were landed in Brazil only 14,000, and in Cuba 14,700, instead of 29,000; making a total of 28,700, instead of 123,000, or a diminution of no less than 94,300. Nor was this a sudden diminution; with regard to Cuba, it is stated on good authority, that from 1817 to 1833, there were imported from 30,000 to 40,000 slaves annually. In 1838, as I have said, the number imported was 28,000; in 1839, it had fallen to 25,000; in 1840, to 14,000; in 1841, to 11,000; and in 1842, it was stated to have come down so low as 3000. In Brazil, there were imported in 1838, 34,000; in 1839, there had fallen to 56,000; and, in 1840, there were only imported 14,000." Lord Palmerston next taunted the Government upon the alleged cordiality existing between it and that of France, and said he had not seen any fruit of such cordiality. The noble lord then made an emphatic appeal to the Government to put down slavery, by which, he said, it would earn the gratitude of posterity for countless ages yet to come, and concluded by moving for a "Return, showing the total number of African Negroes landed for the purposes of slavery on the islands and on the continent of America, from the year 1815 to the year 1843, both inclusive; distinguishing the number so landed in each of those years, and distinguishing also the number landed in each year on the territory of each separate state or power, so far as the same can be made up from documents in the possession of her Majesty's Government."—Sir R. PEEL commenced his reply by saying that he could hardly have inferred from the modest terms in which the notice of the noble lord who had just sat down was worded, that it would have afforded him an opportunity for making the rhetorical display in which he had just indulged; a more harmless motion than that which he read on the notices of that day he could hardly conceive. The right honourable baronet then said, he concurred in all that Lord Palmerston had urged in regard to the horrors of the slave-trade. "I do most sincerely believe," said Sir R. Peel, "that the slave-trade is the most iniquitous, the most heinous offence against mankind that was ever yet invented or practised by man. The pursuit of it engenders more crime, and produces more misery, than any other traffic that ever yet was carried on, and it fell most distinctly under prohibition by the laws both of God and man. I do not believe that the noble lord has overrated the amount of misery which this most detestable crime has inflicted upon the unfortunate beings who are subjected to this traffic; though I rather think he has done so with the number of slaves who have been landed on the coast and islands of America, between the years 1815 and 1843. The noble lord estimates their number at 150,000; I reckon them at 100,000; but if my estimate should even prove to be the more correct one of the two, I still am perfectly ready to admit that these figures do not by any means represent the sum total of those natives of Africa who have suffered the horrible miseries which this traffic has entailed upon them. I don't think, therefore, the extent of this misery, with respect to numbers or its nature, has been exaggerated by the noble lord." Sir R. Peel, however, although admitting the existence of the evil, said he did not believe that while Spain and the Brazil determined upon carrying on the slave-trade, any effectual progress could be made in putting an end to it. These are the terms in which Sir Robert Peel enunciated this declaration:—"I here declare it to be my opinion that a heavy load of public guilt rests on the heads of those nations who derive a profit from this horrible traffic; and I, moreover, assert it can be clearly and indisputably shown that Spain and the Brazil are the only two Christian countries the government or people of which derive any profit from the trade in human beings. (Hear.) Those countries have the power to suppress the slave-trade, and unless they exert that power sincerely, and with a determination that the effort shall be effectual, it is utterly out of our power to do so. It would be impossible to make any effort of this kind with the hope of perfect success unless by the co-operation of the Brazilian Government. It might be partially done, and the Court of the Brazil has expressed a desire to meet our views; but the continuance of the local authorities has hitherto always prevented the efforts to suppress the trade from being effectual; and, in my opinion, nothing is more easy than to show, that if the two Governments of Spain and the Brazil were earnest in their desires, the slave-trade might be put an immediate stop to." After this statement Sir Robert Peel applied himself to controvert Lord Palmerston's opinion that the present Government had been less active in endeavoring to suppress the slave-trade than the last, and enumerated various points of policy to prove that every possible exertion had been made by the present Government to suppress the traffic. Sir Robert then passed to the subject of France. He said—"The noble lord referred in the course of his speech to the good understanding that exists between France and this country, and the noble lord says he is always glad that a good understanding should prevail; but he spoke in terms which seemed hardly calculated to improve or strengthen it. (Hear, hear.) I also entertain the same opinion on that point, and I am sure that it cannot be forwarded by any compromise dishonourable to this country. (Hear, hear.) But at the same time, if with regard to their mutual interests that good understanding between France and England can subsist, it is essential to the interests of civilization, of peace, and of the welfare of the whole civilized world. (Hear.) I believe that it is the earnest wish of the great body of the people of this country to maintain that good understanding so long as they can do so without any sacrifice of honour, or the essential interests of the country. (Hear, hear.) After touching upon these points Sir R. Peel said he did not think Lord Palmerston had shown any ground for his strictures upon the Government, and hinted that the noble lord appeared to have made his motion, of which he had given notice last March, mainly for the sake of his peroration; he, of course, could not suffer such a gain to remain in obscurity. He could not take it with him into the country; if he had done that, he would have been repeating the speech to himself all the autumn, as he must already have been doing all the last month. The right hon. baronet concluded his speech thus—"With the reservation that we should proceed temperately and justly, that we should act upon the law of nations, and ask for nothing more than positive engagements give us a right to obtain, that we should observe the principle towards the weak as well as the strong—with this reservation, I assure the noble lord and the house that the Government are deeply impressed with both the duty and policy, for the highest considerations of the public welfare, of suppressing the slave-trade, and that if that be the avenue to fame, it shall be one that shall be open to us as far as constant and persevering exertions can insure the means of securing it." (The right hon. baronet sat down amidst loud cheers.)—After a reply from Lord Palmerston the papers were ordered, with some additions suggested by Sir R. Peel.

The other business was unimportant.

The house adjourned at one o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

Mr. Spooner, the new member for Birmingham, took the oath and his seat, amidst cheers from the Ministerial side of the House.

The House went into Committee on the Poor-law Amendment Bill.—On the 36th clause, Sir J. GRAHAM proposed that each district board should appoint a chaplain, at a salary to be fixed by the Poor-law Commissioners. Some conversation arose upon this point, but the proposal was agreed to. Several other clauses were agreed to without any material opposition.

Mr. S. O'BRYEN proposed a clause for authorizing the admission into the district schools of children not paupers, upon some moderate payment.—Sir J. GRAHAM did not sanction the amendment, and it was withdrawn. The Committee proceeded as far as clause 54.

In accordance with a suggestion of Sir J. Graham, Mr. COWPER said he should not press the Field Gardens Bill this session. The Bill was committed pro forma in order that the amendments to it might be printed.

On bringing up the report of the Farm Buildings Bill, Mr. HOWE said, he regretted that the Government had not submitted any measure to Parliament in order to prevent the continuance of the causes which had lately led to the commission of numerous acts of incendiarism in several counties of England. Those causes were the distress and despair of a large portion of the labouring classes of the country. It appeared to him that the Government had treated these matters very lightly.—Sir J. GRAHAM said that information would be shortly afforded to Parliament and the country with respect to the causes which had led to the late fire in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex; 17 persons would be tried for being concerned in those fires.—Mr. HOWE.—The fires are still going on.—Sir C. BURNELL said the hon. member for Monmouth had stated that the labourers of this country were inadequately paid. He (Sir C. BURNELL) asserted that in the county (Somerset) which he represented, and particularly in the neighbourhood where he resided, wages were reasonable. The average wages of labour in his neighbourhood, were 13s. a week.

The Metropolitan Buildings Bill was discussed in committee and all its various clauses agreed to.—Mr. HAWES, who had been absent during the committee, complained of the rapidity with which the bill had been passed, as he had various amendments to propose.—The Earl of LONDONDOFF replied that the Government had nothing to do with the absence of Mr. HAWES, who had received public and private intimation of the intention to proceed with the measure.—Mr. Alderman HENDERSON joined Mr. HAWES in opposition to the bill, and some formal amendments were proposed, on which there were divisions.—At length Friday was fixed for bringing up the report and the house adjourned at a quarter past ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES.—The house sat this morning at ten o'clock in a Committee of Privileges, when they unanimously decided that Sir Brooke Wm. Byrdges, Bart., had established his title to the vacant Barony of Water.

The house met again at five o'clock in the evening.

Lord CAMPBELL presented the petition of which he had given notice, from Charles Henry Russell, to be heard at the bar, by himself or counsel, against the actions for Gaming Discontinuance Bill. The noble and learned lord then moved that the petitioner be heard by counsel against the order of the day for its commitment. Agreed to.

THE ALIENS BILL.—Lord BRIDGEMAN called the attention of the house to a bill which had been brought up from the House of Commons, having for object to remove various disadvantages under which foreigners now laboured. It was his intention to add a clause providing that the wives of British subjects should be naturalized by the fact of their marriage; and that in all acts of naturalization the clause prohibiting a naturalized person to sit in Parliament, or hold office under the Crown, should be omitted.

Lord MOUNTGOMERY brought forward a motion respecting a school in Ireland, which was finally negatived without a division.

The Art Unions Bill was read a second time.

The Report on the Insolvent Debtors Bill was received.

Their lordships adjourned soon after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The house met this afternoon at one o'clock, and again went into committee on the Poor-law Amendment Bill. The committee proceeded as far as the 69th clause, when the Chairman reported progress. The discussion did not present any points of particular interest.

Mr. ROSS gave notice that on Tuesday next he should move for an humble address to her Majesty, praying for the removal of Mr. O'Driscoll, recently restored to the commission of the peace in Ireland.

THE POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.—Mr. T. DUNCAN called the attention of the house to the proceedings of the committee appointed to investigate the recent charges made by him against the Post-office. The hon. member said he had been called before the committee, and he did not accuse them with any impropriety or harshness—indeed, their manner had been almost coaxing to him—but he had been asked to furnish a list of the witnesses whom he intended to support the charges he had made, and, at the same time, the committee wished to prevent him from being present at the examination. He maintained that the truth could not be ascertained, unless he were present during the examination of certain witnesses, and he therefore moved that it be an instruction to the committee that he might be present during the examination of such witnesses as he might think proper to examine.—Mr. HUGHES seconded the motion.—Lord SANDHURST, as chairman of the committee, said, the committee felt that the hon. gentleman had no knowledge of the parties himself, and that he only acted on information received from others. For him to be present, therefore, examining witnesses and observing the evidence, would have been virtually to have put him on the committee.—(Hear, hear.)—without him having the responsibility of being a member of it. They should be most happy to have the hon. member on the committee, if the house should think fit to place him there, as he would then have the same responsibility as the other members of it.—Sir R. PEEL said he was unwilling to throw any technical difficulty in the way of the motion which the hon. gentleman had made, although he thought he was justified, according to the rules of the house, in objecting to a member of that house stating anything with respect to the proceedings of a Secret Committee, but he was unwilling to deprive the hon. gentleman the opportunity of making his statement. No notice of a motion had been given, and he (Sir R. Peel) was at a loss to understand the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman had made the present motion.—Mr. SANDHURST said he quite agreed to the statement that the house must choose between putting the hon. member for Finsbury on the committee, or allowing him to examine particular witnesses himself.—Mr. V. SMITH moved that the Hon. Members Sutton, and Mr. T. DUNCAN be added to the committee.—The question having been put, the O'Connor Dow referred to what had been done by the committee with regard to the presence of the hon. member for Finsbury. He did not think it would be right for the house to rescind the resolution to which it had come when it negatived the proposition that he should be a member of the committee. After a sharp discussion the house divided. The numbers were—

For the motion . . . . . 51

Against it . . . . . 141

Majority against it . . . . . 90

The proposition for putting Mr. DUNCAN on the committee is thus negatived

"The Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill, after some discussion, was read a third time; it is only a continuance of a former act.

The house then went into committee on the Poor-law Bill. Several clauses were agreed to. An amendment was moved, during the discussion, to one of the clauses, which will allow of relief being given to widows and others not residing in their own parishes, without compelling them to return to the place of their settlement, which, under the existing law is imperative.—Mr. TAYLOR, Esq., supported the amendment; he said that a poor widow residing in a manufacturing town with her children, would be enabled by a small amount of relief from the perhaps distant union to support herself and family, while if they were compelled to return they would all become chargeable.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM opposed the amendment; from the time of Elizabeth, residence had always been enforced as a condition of relief. He considered the small amount from the union would go in aid of wages in the manufacturing district.—Mr. BARNES and several other members supported the amendment, which, on a division, was carried against the Government by a majority of one, the numbers being, for it 49, against it 48. The amendment was then passed, and the remaining clauses of the bill were then gone through, the preamble agreed to, and the house resumed, thus closing the long and fatiguing discussion of this measure.

The Committee on the Railways Bill was postponed till Monday, and the other orders having been disposed of, the house adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The house met at four o'clock, when the royal assent was given to various bills.

Mr. E. James was called to the bar, and addressed their lordships against the Gaming Bill. When the learned gentleman concluded, Mr. Russell was called and examined, but as he declined to answer some questions put to him, he was told to withdraw, but not to leave the house. Ultimately it was resolved that the witness Russell be ordered to attend at the bar, and that in the meantime his evidence before the Select Committee and the house be printed. The witness was accordingly called in, and ordered to attend. He said—"I will obey your lordships." (Oh, of course you will.)

Several petitions were then presented on different subjects.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The house met at twelve o'clock.

RAILWAY RESOLUTIONS.—Mr. GLADSTONE moved certain resolutions relating to the deposit of railway securities, plans, and bills, in the railway department of the Board of Trade, and to reports which may be made thereon. The right hon. gentleman said it was unnecessary to make any statement respecting them, as the resolutions were themselves sufficiently explanatory. He proposed, however, to omit the last resolution, as it related to subjects of which the house could have no knowledge. The resolutions having been agreed to, Mr. GLADSTONE said, it must be obvious that there were many subjects which came under the control of the Board of Trade which could not be made the subject of resolutions of that house; but it would be the duty of the Board of Trade to prepare some minutes, which would be laid before the house with as little delay as possible.

The report on the Metropolitan Buildings Bill was agreed to.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL.—The house, on the motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, went into committee on the Joint Stock Companies Regulation and Registration Bill.—In answer to a question from Sir D. NORMAN, Mr. GLADSTONE stated that on bringing up the report he should introduce words to extend its provisions to Ireland. The clauses were disposed of, and the bill, with the amendments, ordered to be reported on Tuesday.

Mr. EWART called the attention of the house to the expediency of a statement being made by the Government, respecting the disposal and the results of the outlay of public money voted for the purposes of education. The remarks of the hon. member, however, did not elicit any reply.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

"Lucretia Borgia" was announced for Moriani's benefit on Thursday evening last, but we will not say whether it was a disappointment or not—the opera of "Don Pasquale" was substituted for it, some late efforts announcing that owing to the increased hoarseness of Signor Moriani that it was impossible for him to appear. Now, whether it be the humidity of our climate, or affectionation on the part of its visitors, we will not presume to say, but it is a curious thing to remark that all vocal foreigners on their first arrival in this country are hoarse for two or three days. Why do not the dancers take example from this, and get the cramp for a short time? La-bla-che was never more rich in Don Pasquale; his ejaculations in French now and then were amazingly droll. Grisi, as Norina, was exquisite—the parts of Ernesto and Malatesta are not very well calculated to show off the respective powers of either Mario or Fornasari; but in the beautiful quartet towards the close of the second act, it would be difficult to say to whom, individually, we were indebted for the exquisite effect. It was encored new com. and increased in attraction on its repetition.

Between the second and third acts of the opera there was a divertissement, or extract from some ballet, in which Cerito and St. Leon danced à merveille. It was announced as a pas de deux, but a Mlle. Ferdinand appeared, and made it a pas de trois, to the great delight of every amateur of dance.

The ballet of "Giselle" followed, in which Elsalier was as charming as ever. The house was crowded to excess, and, with good humour, more judiciously critical than usual. This is pleasant to notice, both for artists and audience: there can be nothing more dreadful than hearing sweet sounds thrown away upon dull or ignorant ears.

ST. JAMES'S.

This delightful house closed for the season on Wednesday last with a performance for the benefit of M. Cartigny and M. Cloup. It was a miscellaneous selection, and the assistance of the humorous John Parry was called in, to atone in some measure for the loss of the lively Dejaret and Lévassor, who took their leave on Monday. The highest thanks are due to Mr. Mitchell for the brilliant treat he has so liberally afforded.

PRINCESS'S.

On Monday last in addition to the other novelties, "The Ladies' Club" was produced; but although powerfully cast, it did not go off altogether with good effect.

STRAND.

An adaptation of "Martin Chuzzlewit" has been produced at this theatre with merited success. It is a less disjointed version than that lately introduced at the Lyceum, and accordingly the plot is rendered more intelligible to those persons who have not read the novel. The part of Pecksniff was sustained with much talent by Mr. H. Hall, who doubled Mrs. Gamp. Tom Pinch, by Mr. Younge, was a successful impersonation, especially in the pathetic touches—by far the most difficult for stage representation. The other characters were well supported, if we except occasional loudness and coarseness, but ill adapted for the contracted area of this theatre. Altogether, the piece is bustling throughout, and seizes upon the best points of the tale with good tact and judgment.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Seguin, the vocalists, have recently returned to England from America, where they have been on a successful theatrical tour for several years past. They intend to return to the United States very shortly.

MUSIC.

HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.

Mr. Wilson took his farewell of the metropolis on Wednesday evening at these rooms, which were well attended to say "adieu" to the most popular minstrel that has appeared in our recollection. He possesses the art of interweaving song with history; and the occasional anecdote and melody commingled, make his entertainment in the highest degree charming. He is going to make a provincial tour, but we hope he will soon return to delight the metropolis with his Scottish recitals once and many times more.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—We extremely regret to announce that in the contest for the Hooton Cap, at Eastham, a short time after the boats had rounded the flag buoy situated about a mile and a half above the Eastham Ferry, the Amphitrite shipped a sea and swamped. A number of boats, as also a steamer, were close at hand, but, in despite of all their endeavours, they only succeeded in saving four out of the five of the crew, and two of those, a Mr. Dixon, and we believe a Mr. Mould, of Chester, in an almost senseless state. The remaining one, a fine young boy, who acted as coxswain, Mr. William Henry Brown, son of the late Mayor of Chester, was drowned.

SCAFFOLD ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday evening some scaffolding suddenly fell, on which several men were at work, in front of an extensive building in Gloucester-square, Regent's-park, and which is intended for the residence of Mr. George Wyatt, the architect. When the poor fellows were extricated, they were all found to be more or less injured: two of them, named John Humphries, a carpenter, aged 50, and Charles West, a labourer, aged 26, so seriously that they were conveyed in a state of insensibility to St. George's Hospital. The cause of the accident is said to have been from the pulleys, on which the planks of the scaffolding rested, giving way. The above unfortunate men are in a deplorable state of suffering, and but slight hopes are entertained for the recovery of West.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FURTHER METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—The building to be called New Kneeter Change is just completed. It consists of ten shops, with dwellings attached, together with spacious rooms over the lobby entrance. This new Kneeter Change runs from North Wellington-street into Catherine-street, in the Strand, and will certainly add not a little to the improvements which have recently been made in that neighbourhood. The arabesque decorations which ornament the shop fronts, and the entrance, are exceedingly tasteful. It is intended that the shops shall be let for the sale of cutlery and articles for the toilet. A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons which provides that Trafalgar-square, and all the works now being, or which may be hereafter erected thereon, shall be vested in the Queen, her successors and heirs, as part and parcel of the hereditary possessions and revenues of her Majesty, in right of her Crown. Piccadilly is to be widened. That portion of the Green Park to be appropriated to the purpose is to be severed from the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields and annexed to that of St. George, Hanover-square. The whole of Piccadilly, between Bolton-street and Park-lane, when so widened and improved, is to be kept in repair at the expense of the last-mentioned parish.

ROYAL SOUTH LONDON FLORESCENT SOCIETY.—On Wednesday the second flower show of the season was held in the Surrey Zoological Gardens. The flowers, &c., were arranged in a very tasteful manner, beneath marquees of immense length. The display of proteas, carnations, fuchsias, and flowers, and miscellaneous plants, were equal to those of any previous exhibition. Seventy-four prizes, consisting of gold and silver medals, a prize in money, offered by J. Coppock, Esq., together with the Linnæan medal, given by W. T. Iliff, Esq., were awarded to the best exhibitors. The gardens throughout the day were thronged with visitors. The boys of the Royal Military Asylum, with their juvenile band, were present, and attracted much attention, and contributed materially to enliven the scene by the performance of a variety of overtures and popular airs.

THE FINE ARTS.—In addition to the order given to the six artists for fresco paintings, the Royal Commission of Fine Arts have offered three premiums of £200 each to the artists who shall furnish specimens of cartoon drawing and fresco painting, which shall respectively be deemed worthy of one of the said premiums by judges to be appointed to decide on the relative merit of the works. Also three premiums of £250 each, three premiums of £300 each, and three premiums of £200 each, to the artists who shall furnish oil-paintings for the decoration of the New Palace at Westminster, which shall be deemed worthy of one of the other of the said premiums, by judges to be appointed to decide on the relative merits of the works. The names of the artists are not required to be concealed.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths within the metropolis, for the week ending Saturday, the 13th inst., amounted to 831. Of that number 438 deaths were of persons under 15 years of age, 252 between 15 and 50, and 141 from 50 upwards. The number of females who died during the week was 424, and of males 407. The mean temperature was 61.5 deg.

THE LATE ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN HOLBORN.—Wednesday, upon inquiring at St. Bartholomew's Hospital as to the state of Mr. Smith, the gunmaker, of Holborn, who was wounded in the back by a pistol-shot, fired at him by the Hon. W. Trenchard, the reporter was informed that Mr. Smith was progressing favourably, and strong hopes are entertained that he will ultimately recover. On Monday, the piece of coat which was carried into the wound by the bullet forced itself out. The bullet has not yet been discovered, but it is supposed by the medical gentlemen who attend him that it is lodged between the fangs of the vertebrae, having been stopped there in its progress, and prevented from injuring the spinal cord. Lord Audley and the family of the Hon. W. Trenchard are most solicitous about the progress to convalescence of Mr. Smith.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL CART COLLISION.—Last Saturday evening Mr. Higge held an inquest at the Nag's Head, Wandsworth-road, on the body of Sarah Groves, aged eleven, daughter of Mr. Groves, saddler, &c., of the Blackfriars-road. It appeared that the deceased, on Thursday evening last, was in a chaise with her father, mother, and sister, proceeding along the Wandsworth-road, when they saw coming furiously towards them two horses and a cart. Mr. Groves pulled up by the side of the road, got out of his chaise, and stood by his horse's head, and as the horses and cart were approaching, he held up his whip, which made them swerve towards him, and strike against the chaise. By the concussion his wife was thrown out, and, going to her assistance, he left his horse's head, and the animal ran away. Deceased being frightened, jumped out of the chaise, and the consequence was fatal injury to the skull. The horses in the cart in the first instance ran away from a watering-place beside the road, through the driver having taken the bits from their mouths to allow them to drink. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death, adding that the taking the bits from horses' mouths for any purpose on the public roads was highly censurable.

THE LATE FATAL STEAM-BOAT ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday morning Mr. Carter resumed, for the fourth time, at the Ship, Fore-street, Lambeth, the inquiry touching the death of Henry Tucker, aged 35, a lighterman, and William Wright, aged 23, a coach-painter. The particulars of this protracted inquest have been given in our paper. The inquest room was, as on the former occasions, crowded with persons engaged in the navigation of the river. A good deal of evidence having been adduced, at five o'clock p.m. (the inquiry having begun at ten in the morning) the coroner summed up. After a consultation of two hours, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death," with a dole of £100 upon the steamer, the Thunder, which caused the accident. Mr. Justice, on the part of the proprietor of the boat, said that he should appeal against the verdict by certiorari.

FATAL COACH ACCIDENT.—On Saturday evening last, as the Shuttle coach was on its way from Bury to Manchester, when about 150 yards from the Bear's-o'-th'-Barn toll-bar, on the Bury New Road, the linch-pin of the off-wheel fell out, and the wheel came off, and four passengers and the coachman were thrown from the top of the coach. One woman, the wife of Samuel Kenyon, black printer, Bank Top, Manchester, was killed on the spot.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—On Monday afternoon, Mr. Baker held an inquest in the board room of Wapping Workhouse, on the body of Samuel Jolly, aged fifty, gunsmith, lately residing at 15, Meeting-house-lane, High-street, Woolwich. From the evidence it appears that the deceased tendered one penny at the Wapping entrance of the Tunnel, about eleven o'clock on Thursday night, for the purpose of proceeding to the Rochester side, on his way to Woolwich, and that when he had descended to within fourteen steps of the bottom, he, by some cause not elicited, rolled to the stone flooring at the bottom of the flight of stairs, by which he received an extensive fracture of the skull, and notwithstanding medical attendance, he died in the workhouse at two o'clock on Friday morning. The deceased appeared to be sober and was not subject to fits.—Verdict, "Accidental Death."

DEATH FROM STARVATION.—FIGHTING CASE.—An inquest was held on Wednesday, before Mr. Mills, at the Strand Union Workhouse, on the body of William Edward Carson, aged 32. Allen Phillips, police constable 44 F, said, on Friday afternoon he was on duty in Covent-garden, and found deceased, about half-past two o'clock, lying on the pavement under the Piazza, in a dreadfully exhausted and apparently dying condition. Witness had deceased conveyed to Charing-cross Hospital. The witness, in answer to further questions, stated that whilst deceased was at the hospital, he was questioned, and stated himself to have been a barrister's clerk in the Temple. He had not tasted food for three days. He had some bread in his pocket, but he said his destination had become so great that his stomach could not take it. He was in the most deplorable condition, and on being searched all that was found on him was a piece of bread and an old pocket-book, containing his certificate of baptism. He was subsequently taken to the Union. Walter Fullman stated, that on deceased's arrival at the Strand Union Workhouse, he was in so exhausted a state that, notwithstanding he was promptly attended to by the medical man, he died in a few hours after his admission. After a considerable discussion, the jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased died from extreme exhaustion, produced and imbedded from destitution and the want of the common necessities of life."

THE LATE MURDER IN THE MINT.—It will be remembered that in the course of last February a woman of the name of Elizabeth Hobbs, the wife of a stoker, occupying lodgings in the Mint, Southwark, had a quarrel with her landlord, a man named James Carroll, who, in ejecting her from her apartment, threw her down stairs, and inflicted such other severe injuries as to cause almost her immediate death. At the coroner's inquest the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against James Carroll." Carroll, it appears, instantly despatched, and proceeded to Ireland. He was, however, taken into custody on Tuesday by police sergeant Sturgen, M. I., and subsequently examined at Union Hall Police Office. After hearing some formal evidence, Mr. Cottingham told the prisoner that he stood charged with the wilful murder of Elizabeth Hobbs, and that he was informed a true bill had been found against him at the Old Bailey. As soon as he received a certificate from the Clerk of Arraigns that he is the party mentioned, he should commit him to Newgate for trial. He, therefore, should remain here for the present.

DALMAN.—The daily papers have stated that Dalman is to be transported for life. This is a mistake. No decision upon the subject has yet been given. The instructions to the Governor of Millbank Penitentiary are, that he shall be kept there for a month, in order that medical men may examine him. The result of their investigations will determine whether he will be sent to Bethlem as an insane person, or be transported to a penal settlement.

THE LOSS OF THE MANCHESTER.—The relatives of the unhappy persons who perished on board this ill-fated steamer have now the melancholy satisfaction of knowing that the remains of the sufferers have at last been cast up from the deep: for by the late arrivals from Hamburg we learn that eleven bodies of the unfortunate sufferers have been picked up, comprising the whole of the passengers, the captain, Mr. Dudley, and part of his crew. The managers of the Hamburg Steam Navigation Company, at Hamburg, have received information from Bremen, to the effect that the bodies of Captain Dudley, Mrs. St. George Smith, and her son, Mr. G. Smith, two seamen, and a gentleman unknown, with a large sum of money, amounting to 3,500 marks, tied round his neck, had been cast ashore near that place, and that the bodies of Miss Emily Smith, the daughter of Mrs. Smith, and Mr. P. Rodbury, of Leeds, had also been picked up off Cuxhaven, and brought into that port. A friend of Mr. Edgington, a magistrate at Hull, who was deputed to remain at the mouth of the Elbe so as to identify the bodies of Mrs. Smith and her son and daughter, has taken charge of them, and no doubt by the earliest packet to Hull will convey them to England for interment. The body of the unfortunate commander, Mr. Dudley, has been interred in the churchyard of Westbourne, as also the other bodies.

TIMBER VIADUCT ON THE DUBLINGTON AND NEWCASTLE RAILWAY.

THE SHERBURN VIADUCT, ON THE GREAT NORTH RAILWAY.

During the past month has been opened the Great Northern Line of Railway communication from London to Newcastle-on-Tyne, by which the county of Northumberland, the cities of Durham, Newcastle, Shields, and Carlisle, are brought near to the centre of England and to the metropolis, from which they were isolated by want of a railway. "England," says the Railway Chronicle, "is now covered with an unbroken chain of railway communication from Kasser, Bristol, Southampton, and Brighton on the Channel, to Newcastle and Carlisle, on the Scottish Border." The opening of this noble line, on the 18th ultimo, was, indeed, a brilliant affair. In the morning a party breakfasted in London, at the Fuston Hotel; and in the afternoon the same party found themselves sitting comfortably at an early dinner in the town of Newcastle, having passed over three hundred and three miles, in nine hours and twenty-nine minutes, stoppages included! the rate of travelling having been a mean, including stoppages, of 40 miles an hour throughout the whole distance, the stoppages having occupied 1 hour and 40 minutes of that time.

This rapid communication between London and the North is the work of several combined railways. The train which leaves Fuston-square for Newcastle passes over the London and Birmingham line for 83 miles, to Rugby, where it enters on the Midland Counties. It then passes over 49½ miles to Derby, along the North Midland 63½ miles to Normanton, thence by 24 miles of the York and North Midland to York. From York there are 45 miles of the North of England line to Darlington, and thence 33½ miles to Newcastle. In all, over the six lines, 303 miles.

It is this last portion which forms the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway. It is also a combination of several lines—from Darlington there are 23 miles of the new line, 4½ miles of the Durham Junction, 3 of the Pontop and South Shields, and 6 of the Bransford Junction—in all, from Darlington to Newcastle, 38½ miles."—Railway Chronicle.

Among the novelties of construction in this portion, the beautiful timber viaducts are masterly specimens of skill and economy, of which, that which crosses the Sherburn is represented in our engraving: it carries the line at the length of 70 feet, over a chasm 600 feet wide, at the cost of less than £10 per foot.

The value of timber viaducts, as the means of effecting the economical construction of railways, is a point of engineering practice becoming daily of greater importance. Those on the Newcastle and Darlington railway are the work of Mr. Harrison. The Sherburn construction is from 60 to 70 feet high; it is founded on piles driven 25 feet into the ground; several courses of masonry rest on these piles, and from the masonry spring the light tall timber baulks that support the railing. A single baulk, a foot square and 70 feet high, with a locomotive engine on the top of it, is at first sight an alarming statement. Here it is literally true—yet such is the excellent disposition of the timber, that the structure is rigid, free from vibration, and perfectly stable. The whole, including the masonry piling, and stone abutments, cost only £210 5s. per running foot, without stone abutments the cost is reduced to £9 10s. per foot. This is by far the cheapest system with which we are acquainted, and to its solidity and excellence we can bear decided testimony. We question whether any arrangement of materials can be made more judicious and more economical than this. The direct pressure of the weight being made to rest vertically on the upright timber, is unquestionably that arrangement which will carry most. No obliquity of position, no arch form, no concealable disposition, can increase the power of matter to resist this strain. The uprights are 20 feet apart, a distance which enables the horizontal baulks to carry the whole weight, while additional stiffness is attained by the intermediate diagonals. The long diagonal braces merely serve to keep the vertical baulks accurately in their positions. These diagonals are simply half-baulks, checked on the timbers, and fastened by a single bolt. The scantling is uniform throughout the structure.

The piles on which the whole structure is sustained, are about 35 feet long and 12 inches square, of American rock elm, and are driven till completely buried in the soil; on them rest blocks of masonry, 3 feet deep by about 4 feet square, on which the upright standards of the bridge, 12 to 13 inches square, are supported. These uprights are placed at distances of 20 feet between centres in the longitudinal direction of the bridge in transversal rows of four each, 9 feet to 11½ between centres. By this arrangement, each pair of piles supports one upright, and the stone blocks and intermediate cross-pieces of timber serve to preserve the piles from exposure to the air. The upper ends of the standards are bound together by cross-beams of the same scantling, which rest upon the top of them, and by half-baulks, one on either side of the pile, about 10 feet below the former, and lying upon four longitudinal pieces of the same size, which extend the whole length of the viaduct, and are fastened to the inside of the uprights abutting against the latter—resting on the intermediate cross-pieces are the lower ends of as many struts, which rise at an angle of 45 degrees, bearing up at their junction a transverse beam of the same size, and to the same level as those which rest upon the tops of the upright standards. Between these cross-pieces and the stone blocks, transverse pieces, about 8 inches by 4 inches, run diagonally on either side of each row of uprights, crossing each other beneath the centre of the way. Upon the upper transverse beams, which lie on the tops of the standards, are laid nine longitudinal beams, five of which, including the two outer, are equidistant from each other, and 12 inches deep by 6 inches broad; the remaining four, which are 12 inches square, are so disposed as to be nearly beneath, and slightly wider than the lines of rails. Upon these, 3-inch planks are laid diagonally, at an angle of about 45 degrees, and above all there are longitudinal wooden sleepers, 12 inches by 6. The whole structure is surmounted by a slight railing, about 3 inches square, consisting of upright posts, 3 feet apart, and intermediate diagonals. All the timber used is Memel, with the exception of the piles, which, as we have already said, are of American rock elm.

This viaduct is remarkably free from vibration—the passage of a train scarcely affecting it in any perceptible degree. The simplicity of the framing also, gives great facilities for repairs or alterations, as almost the whole can be removed by degrees, without interruption to the working of the line.

Our sketch is taken at a short distance from Sherburn Hospital, founded by Bishop Padesey, in 1186, for sixty-four poor lepers, a master, and other officers, and altogether, a noble monument of the benevolence of our ancestors.

Of interest akin to the construction of the Sherburn Viaduct, is the annexed specimen of the mechanical works on the Utica and Syracuse Railway. As a considerable length of this line passes through a deep swamp, a foundation of great permanency was required; this gave rise to a modification of the superstructure, and formed that which is known as pile road. The swamp varied in depth from 10 to 60 feet, and was nearly on a dead level throughout; the grade line closely corresponded with its surface, so that it was necessary to reach the hard bottom before any foundation could be effected. Piles were adopted as the cheapest and most efficacious means to secure a durable and substantial basis; they were driven to their places by Cram's Patent Steam Pile Driver, which, in our engraving, is shown driving piles for a railway, but is equally applicable to pile-driving in bridge constructions. The machine is formed of a platform, about twenty-five feet long, and eight broad; at one end are erected two pairs of leaders, or guides, in which the hammers are moved. Immediately behind the leaders are fixed the rollers, with the necessary breaks, and gearing for working the hammers, raising the pile, &c. The rollers are revolved by a small high-pressure steam-engine, occupying the rear of the machine. The arrangement of the leaders is the same as in ordinary piling machines; a curved piece of wood forces open the shears, when the hammers reach their elevation. The hammers are confined to the leaders by a groove; they weigh about 1000 lb each, are made of cast-iron, and at their last blow fall through a space of 27 feet. A pair of piles are driven at one operation by this machine; when driven, cast-iron rollers are placed upon their heads, and the machine, by means of an inverted rail, moves on to the next place. The heads of the piles, sawed off to reduce them to the proper level, were found sufficient to supply the furnace with fuel.

The men employed in operating this machine on the Utica and Syracuse Railway, were a foreman, a steam-engineer, two brakemen, and two men in front at the saws; also a horse and cart to furnish water for the boiler. Properly geared in front of the machine, and between the leaders, was a saw that played upon a saw-bar, and could be pressed against either pile as it was driven home; being prepared by sharpening one end, and butting the other, it was drawn up by ropes, worked by the engine, secured in position between the leaders, and driven to the hard bottom.

This machine was manufactured in the United States, complete, at the cost of 2000 dollars. Mr. Weale, in his valuable "Examples of Railway Making," (whence the above details have been derived), states that Mr. Thomas Roberts, of Plymouth Dockyard, has patented an ingenious invention for scarfing timber, which may also be used for driving piles of great lengths.

ROMAN LONDON.

Some interesting discoveries have been made in the course of the past week of the foundations of several Roman buildings, in the centre of the city of London; and of various Roman coins, vases, lamps, and domestic implements. These have occurred in the course of the great excavation made for the formation of common sewers in Huggin-lane, Bread-street-hill, and Peter's-hill—a group of sites placed on the narrow slip of land between the ancient Watling-street and the Thames, at Queenhithe; and not far from the Roman military, or "London stone," the centre of the Roman city. Several of the foundations of the buildings are of a size and strength which would lead to the conclusion of their having been public edifices of great dimensions and importance; one of them, indeed, has been surmised to be the base of a temple. Others, of smaller size and slighter structure, have been supposed to be the foundations of houses. Several of the latter were found beautifully paved with large square brick tiles. The walls, in most cases, are constructed of rubble, alternately with broad layers of tile and concrete, after the Roman style of construction. Our first cut exhibits a portion of one of the more massive walls, found in the Bread-street excavation; and the second a clay lamp, from the same locality.

A CHAPEL ON WHEELS.—The Wesleyan Methodists of the Bingham circuit have erected a moveable wooden meeting-house upon wheels, capable of seating about 150 persons, at a cost of about £60, for the accommodation of several villages where no site could be obtained. The above place of worship was opened on Monday last.

DIFFICULTY TO PLEASE.—Thomas Lichfield, a hired servant, complained a day or two ago against his master, Mr. W. Chambers, of Wellington, for the non-payment of wages due up to the time he left. Mr. Chambers considered that he had no right to pay the complainant until he completed the period of his engagement. "He sets me such funny jobs," said Lichfield, "such as standing on a gatepost to whitewash the moon with a pot of blarney; at another time, to fetch a load of clouds to litter the horses; he tell'd me the other Sunday, when I wanted my dinner, to cut a Bath brick into mutton chops, and fry them in a four-wheel waggon at Viahuricus; it ain't likely I can do them there conjuration tricks." The complaint was discharged, and Lichfield ordered to return to his work.

ST. SWITHIN'S DAY.—Monday last passed over without a shower—at least in the Metropolis; so that the weather-wise, who prognosticated a wet autumn, will probably calm their apprehensions. In the country, however, there appears to have been much rain. The Tyne Mercury says—"Monday, being the anniversary of St. Swithin, that venerable saint poured his unction upon Newcastle in the shape of frequent and heavy showers."

GRAND REVIEW IN HYDE PARK, ON SATURDAY LAST.

GRAND REVIEW IN HYDE PARK ON SATURDAY LAST.

The 1st Life Guards, stationed at Regent's Park barracks, the 2nd Life Guards, at Hyde Park barracks, the 2nd battalion of the Grenadier Guards, at St. George's barracks, the 3d battalion of the Grenadier Guards, at St. John's-wood barracks, the 1st battalion of the Coldstream Guards, at Portman-street barracks, and the 2d battalion of the Coldstream Guards, at Wellington barracks, left their respective quarters on Saturday morning, and arrived on the review-ground in Hyde Park about ten o'clock, and shortly after formed into line according to their rank in the service, the ground being kept by the 17th Lancers, from Hounslow.

At half-past ten o'clock the following troops were formed in contiguous columns, at a distance of twenty-five paces:—The 1st and 2nd Life Guards on the right, and then the second and third battalions of the 1st or Grenadier Foot Guards, and the two battalions of the 2nd or Coldstream Guards on the left. The whole line was commanded by Major-General the Hon. Edward Lygon, and the brigade of Foot Guards by Lord Saltoun. At eleven o'clock, punctually, the Duke of Wellington arrived on the ground, and was received by the "general salute," the colours of the Grenadier Guards dropping in honour of his being their colonel. The duke and a numerous staff, including a few ladies and numerous civilians, and the Earl of Cardigan in plain clothes, then went down the entire line, the respective bands playing "See the Conquering Hero comes;" after which they again returned to the saluting point, and the troops marched past (and saluted) in slow time, and then again, in columns at quarter distance, in quick time; after which they deployed in two lines, with their rear to Connaught-terrace, the Coldstream forming the front and the Grenadiers the rear line, at fifty paces distance, and the left flank companies of the whole thrown out as skirmishers. The two lines then advanced covered by the skirmishers to the wood, and then halted, recalled the skirmishers, and the two battalions of the Coldstreams fired by companies from left to right; after which they retired, by filing through the line of the Grenadiers, who advanced, then halted, and commenced file-firing, and afterwards made a very fine charge towards the Serpentine; then halted, and retired in line covered by skirmishers.

The Coldstreams, after filing through the Grenadiers, re-formed, and retired in line, then halted, and fronted; and the Grenadiers filed through their line, and formed column at quarter distance in their rear. The Life Guards now came on from the rear, through the openings between the battalions, formed line, and charged towards the Serpentine; afterwards retired to the right and rear of the Infantry, who then retired towards Connaught-terrace, covered by skirmishers. The whole of the Infantry then deployed to the left of the second company of the second battalion of Coldstreams, which brought them facing the saluting point, when the whole line advanced in slow time, and presented arms after halting. The Duke then assured General Lygon and Lord Saltoun how satisfied he was with the movements, and the steadiness and precision with which they were performed, &c., and the troops then fired a volley, in order to unload their firelocks, formed four deep, and marched off the ground, leaving their hands to enliven the company till dispersed by the heavy rain.

The troops on the ground were as follows:—

- 1st Life Guards—Colonel Cavendish, Adjutant Anderson.
- 2nd Life Guards—Colonel Reid, Adjutant Sherwin.
- 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards—Lieutenant-Colonel Lascelles, Adjutant Lindsay.
- 3rd Battalion Grenadier Guards—Colonel Home, Adjutant Lambert.
- 1st Battalion Coldstream Guards—Colonel Shaw, Acting-Adjutant Cocks.
- 2nd Battalion Coldstream Guards—Colonel H. Bestinck, Adjutant Lord Frederick Paulet.

The 1st Life Guards were headed by their colonel, the Viscount Combermere; the 2d Life Guards headed by their colonel, the Marquis of Londonderry; and the Coldstream Guards by their colonel, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. The colonels of the regiments, after passing, joined his Grace the Commander-in-Chief.

Some dissatisfaction among the officers of the Brigade was caused by an order from the Quartermaster-General, forbidding the usual tickets of admission to the several friends of the officers, while Yeomanry and Militia, if in uniform, could take their friends from among the crowd, thus rendering it impossible for many ladies to attend.

Our first engraving represents the Review-ground: to which we append a view of the Infantry Barracks, adjoining the Birdcage-walk, St. James's Park, with the Parade, &c.

FRIGHTFUL EXECUTION IN FRANCE.—On the 8th instant Pierre Lescure, who was accused of the murder of his father, but not brought to trial for want of sufficient evidence, and who has since been condemned to death for making away with his uncle, was executed at Riom (Puy-de-Dôme), France. The circumstances attending the execution were most horrifying. Being a man of herculean strength, he was bound in prison with an unusual weight of chains. It required at least half an hour for the smiths to unshackle him. Lescure was much weakened by his confinement, and assistance was offered to him in walking to the scaffold, but he declined it and went forward, and even ascended the ladder with a firm step. Fearing resistance the executioners of St. Fleur and Moulins were called in to aid the executioner of Riom. When Lescure appeared on the platform, his tall and athletic person towered above them and the priest who attended him. Unfortunately he was not bound with sufficient force to the swing-board, which also was too short for his length, so that his neck went beyond the groove, and the axe, when loosened, fell on the wood of the frame, and only wounded its intended victim. Upon this the executioner from St. Fleur got astride on the head of Lescure, but the convict struggled from the grasp, and, breaking his bands, rose again, with his shoulders and breast covered with his blood, his face flushed, and his eyes haggard, uttering cries that struck terror to the heart of every spectator. The priest approached the wretched man, and, presenting to him the image of Christ on the cross, succeeded by his exhortations in prevailing on him to again submit to be bound. Again the axe fell, and again missed its mark, only enlarging the first wound. Lescure's cries became still more astounding. The people shouted with indignation, and pressing round the scaffold, were on the point of overrunning the gendarmes in attendance, while the priest, whose surprise was covered with blood, embraced and did all in his power to console and calm the mutilated man. The three executioners were for a time completely paralysed; but at last one of them mustered resolution enough to fix the devoted head in a proper position, and the axe, already streaming with blood, fell a third time, and completed its task.

LITERATURE.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW, OR QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF ECCLESIASTICAL AND GENERAL LITERATURE. July, 1844. No. 2.

There are some good articles in this number of the "English Review," and written in a spirit which we cannot but commend—a spirit more or less pervading them all—a spirit that, while it has in view the temporal good of man, looks more particularly to his spiritual welfare also. We are mistaken if the present is not superior, in several respects, to the first number. The article on Dr. Prichard's "Natural History of Man" is a lucid and well-reasoned essay, and evidently written by one who has well studied the subject. It arrives at conclusions respecting the origin of the human race, which cannot but legitimately flow from the induction of facts. The review of Lady Fullerton's "Ellen Middleton, a Tale," we deem to be a "fair account" of that excellent novel. We agree with the reviewer, that of all the religious novels we have ever seen, that eminently able and eminently womanly work has, with the most pointed religious aim, the least of direct religious teaching; it has the least effort and the greatest force; it is the least didactic and the most instructive. The paper on "Mr. Maitland's Essays on the Dark Ages," is full of information so far as it goes; but the reviewer does not clear up quite to our satisfaction the anecdote respecting Luther and his Latin Bible at Erfurt. The article on the "Progress of Education" we read with great pleasure; and we trust the prospects in regard to the right Christian instruction of the rising generation are as cheering as the writer indicates. The last article of the Review, on the "Old English Chronicles—the Wars of the Roses," is a deeply historical and instructive essay. But that which exhibits more than any other paper the character and principles of this periodical, is the criticism of "Newman's Sermons on Subjects of the Day," the notice of which we purposely left till the last. If we have, in our former allusion to this subject, been at all mistaken as to those principles, we now happily have an opportunity of correcting ourselves and our readers, by quoting the following passage:—

"It remains, in conclusion, to offer some general remarks on the position, in relation to existing parties in the Church, which this volume [The Sermons] seems to indicate. That there has been, unhappily, within the last two or three years, a tendency in some quarters to certain doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome, is a fact which is too well known to need any proof. That such a tendency has been viewed with the deepest regret by the great body of those who have maintained Church principles is equally certain. Convinced as they are that the principles which they uphold do not favour the pretensions of Romanism, but present a firm barrier against them—and persuaded as they have been that the 'Tracts for the Times' (we say nothing of a few of the latter tracts) were not written by men who were either disloyal to the English Church, or favourable to Romanism, they have been justly unwilling to identify the tracts and their authors, whose services had been in many respects so great, with views opposed to their continual declarations, and to the tenor of many of their writings. It was surely, for instance, difficult to imagine that the author of 'Lectures on Romanism and Popular Protestantism,' could approve of the

TRIENNIAL COMPETITION OF PIPERS, EDINBURGH.

This very attractive contest of the best performers of the Ancient Music of the great Highland Bagpipe was held in the Theatre Royal, at Edinburgh, on the 10th instant. The doors were opened at twelve o'clock, noon, and in a few minutes every corner of the theatre was crowded to excess. The performances were strathspeys and sword-dances, by fourteen accomplished pipers. The effect of the national music on the audience was very marked; at one moment they were riveted by the plaintive lament, and next the strathspey, or reel, made hearts and heels as light as those of the agile inhabitants of the hill and dale. The scene during the performance of a reel by four Highlanders, is shown in our engraving. The judges named by the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland then retired to decide the prizes. In their absence, Donald MacInnes, from Lochaber, who gained the Prize Pipe at the last competition, performed a salute on the Prize Pipe to be then awarded. There were also favourite Scottish airs by the band, and national dances.

At five o'clock the judges returned, and proceeded to distribute the prizes, which were received by the fatigued competitors with evident feelings of pride. The president and judges were seated in the box nearest the right hand side of the stage; and, on a table near them, on the stage, were placed the prizes—a bagpipe, a sword, horn, &c. The general effect of the kilted men in their particoloured costumes, was extremely picturesque. The Prize Pipe and other prizes having thus been distributed, the affair concluded with a spirited dance. The spectators were admitted by tickets, the proceeds from the sale of which, were divided among the pipers, dancers, and competitors for dress.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

A greater instance of versatility never appeared than in the persons of the performers, who only seen the prize dance in not having seen him in a character opposed to his personation of deep and intense tragedy, in which he is truly affecting and powerful. No man can better express the tender abandonments of the soul to love, hope, or joy, than Moriani, while, on the other hand, frenzy and despair he can depict with equal truth, but with more thrilling energy. In the magnificent scene selected for our illustration, perhaps he was a little enfeebled in voice from previous over exertion, but his energetic action was still unflinching, which, joined to Lablache's Amateur and Grisi's earnest indignation, formed a tableau of dramatic beauty which we seldom, if ever, have seen equalled—certainly not excelled. The costumes of this scene cannot be too highly extolled for their splendour and accuracy—that of Lablache particularly made him stand forth as "bluff Harry" himself. What a pity that the termination of the season is nigh at hand, and that we cannot hear and see Donizetti's chef-d'œuvre again rendered still more perfect by a little more practice!

But the swallows will take flight
And the singing-birds will too—
So we have nothing else to say
But come again soon—do!

THEATRICALS IN AMERICA.—Mr. Macready appeared at the Buffalo Theatre on the 25th ult., in Hamlet; and on the previous evening, Mr. Vandenhoff played the same character at the Albany Theatre. Brougham and Miss Nelson are in New York, where Ole Bull has just arrived. The Lyceum burlesque, "Open Sesame," has been received in New York with immense success.

MUSICAL MOVEMENTS.—At the termination of the opera season, the principal artists, both vocal and instrumental, who have delighted the metropolis, will take provincial tours through the three kingdoms. The first troupe will consist of Grisi, Favanti, Mario, and F. Lablache; the second, of Persiani, Salvi, and Vornasari, under the direction of Puzzi. The third part will be principally instrumental, under the management of Sivori.

TAGLIONI.—This charming danseresse continues still to captivate the Parisians. She intends shortly to retire from public life after a few more appearances. She has just returned from a successful visit to every place where

JULY.—SONNET.

Now is the time to see the glorious Sun
At early dawn his chymistry begin—
To see him hang, on threads the dew have spun,
Pearls, sapphires, rubies—and far up, within
The greeny clouds, a golden tissue weave,
Whose splendour drowsy-heads can ne'er believe!
A poet's fancy only can conceive
The gorgeous beauty of a summer's morn
At that sweet time when young Aurora's born
To shed her smile on fields and groves and bow'rs,
And tell the rustling minstrels on each thorn
To mix their music with the breath of flow'rs!
Oh! there's no time can give such pure delight,
As when the Day first flees th' embrace of Night. W.

ROBERTS, THE WELSH HARPER.

There is no country in the world where the motto of "princeps gentium" is more assumed than in Wales: a man with a genealogy of two thousand years' standing, is only a "fellow of yesterday!" The good people of the principality are ready to assert that Adam was a Welshman; that the Garden of Eden was situate in the lovely Vale of Llangollen; that the Cambrian language was the vernacular of the terrestrial Paradise; and that their music, with their national instrument, boast of the highest antiquity on earth. Be that as it may, many of their own writers and historians do not agree with the general opinion of their countrymen, but, on the contrary, assert that they had their music and learning from Ireland. For instance, Giraldus Cambrensis distinctly states so. Caradoc affirms that the Welsh had the harp from Ireland (vide Wynne's "History of Wales," p. 159); and Vallancy (in "Collect. de rebus Hiber.," No 13, p. 36), gives the following philological reason for its importation from the Insula Sacra, or Holy Island, which its name Eris implied (vide O'Brien on the Round Towers of Ireland.) "The Irish Tendhlón, pronounced Teslón or Telin," says the General, "is certainly the etymon of the Welsh Telyn, a harp—a word I can find no derivation of in that language; and, I think, proves from whence they borrowed both the instrument and its name." Still there is a great dissimilarity between the Irish and Welsh harps—the former being very inferior in size, and strung with wire; the latter in some instances as high as six feet, and strung with gut. We confess we prefer the tone of the Cambrian instrument to that of the Irish; there is less tinkling or jarring, and particularly in the hands of Mr. Roberts, who awakens all our best recollections of the bards of old by his admirable performance. Although totally deprived of sight, that loss of sense seems to have been amply atoned for in the amazing his musical hearing. He has gained the principal prizes, and is decorated with a profusion of harps, medals, and his triumphs. Her Majesty, when Princess Viceregal, and the Duke of Devonshire, have both conferred upon him a similar honour upon him. He is considered the Vales.

CLASSICAL CONCERT.

Having last an instrumental concert under this title in the Grosvenor-square Rooms, and proved a delicious treat, the scheme is—

1. Messrs. Sivori, Sinton, Hill, and Haydn.
2. Messrs. Sinton, Sivori, Hill, and Beethoven.
3. Violin, and violoncello, Mr. Osborne, and M. Rousmoulet. Osborne.
Sivori, Sinton, Hill, and Rousmoulet. Beethoven.

was deliciously performed, particularly the amount. Beethoven's wild and fanciful composition in masterly manner; but, beautiful as it is, it is movements, and some of them of considerable it too much. The trio, by Osborne, is a very a, replete with peculiar melody and science. It was by the author, a native of the Sister Isle, resided at Paris for several years, where his reputation and performer is of the highest order. The a the Rousmoulet set, was also magnificently performed. The concert was a most brilliant treat to amateurs. The performers were placed on a platform in the which had an imposing and pretty effect.

NEW YORK.—A correspondent assures us that performance of Werner at New York, has been a triumph; his audiences appear to have been the force of this fine specimen of melo-dramatic art, especially, was viewed by them as something before, and at the close of the piece, they burst into enthusiasm: "in short," says our correspondent, "the sensation produced on an American by Werner." A gentleman has left town for Italy, to seek out next season.

—We learn that this gentleman has taken the He is an enterprising manager to undertake the three dramatic establishments at once, namely, the Adelphi, and the Liverpool. We heartily wish ere is an old saying, "Too many irons," &c.

STEAMERS AND PIERS.

HUMAN reason, in its full pride, is often sternly rebuked by the fatality of human accident. The casualties of life, and the modes in which they occur, so often prove that our reason and foresight are made so little use of, that there seems but slender cause for arrogance, and much, very much, for humility. If reason, the power of thought and reflection, were given to man for any purpose, it surely was for that of preserving his life; yet the hunted herd that rushes blindly over the precipice is not more heedless of consequences than are vast numbers of human beings, who, having reason, seem deprived of the faculty of using it.

The public has been this week startled by the occurrence of one of those events which, happening, as they generally do, in the midst of some exciting cause that congregates numbers to one spot, none think danger possible, till some unforeseen, but not unlikely accident, converts a gay and laughing scene into one of shrieking and dismay—of a convulsive struggle with each other, and with the elements for life, terminated by the silence of death that closes over the victims, and the frantic grief of the survivors.

Such, or nearly such, was the scene that occurred at Blackfriars-bridge on Monday last.

There is a superstition connected with some of the rivers of Europe that the spirit of their waters requires each year a certain number of victims, and he seldom fails in receiving his tribute. It is a fanciful way of accounting for those casualties of which all rivers that flow past great cities are fertile. But there is, probably, no river in which so many human lives are annually lost as the Thames. This arises from the immense population on its banks—its large amount of water-borne traffic—and, added to this, a love of boating and regattas unknown to any other people, except, perhaps, the Venetians. Under such circumstances, it might be thought that the authorities would take some care of that part of the public that never take any of themselves. But the river is altogether destitute of a police to regulate the passenger traffic of its surface. Some order is enforced on the larger vessels that moor in the tiers, but the "silent highway" may be used as the providers of water conveyance choose; they may overcrowd their vessels from cupidity, or they may run down each other from carelessness—there is little or no check upon them. On land, where the number of loaded and crowded vehicles can at worst only cause a stoppage, there are street-keepers and constables to insist on order and careful driving, and carriages and omnibuses are limited in their burdens to the safety point. On the water, where a collision, or over-crowding, might be the death of hundreds, every master of a steamer appears to be a law unto himself; and the too natural desire to gain as much as possible, being stimulated by opposition, the consequence is what may be seen any fine Sunday or holiday at any of the landing-places, and what, to those who are in the slightest degree acquainted with the laws that govern floating bodies, and with what a mass of human beings will do in a moment of panic, is almost a melancholy sight. Forgetting that "ships are but boards, sailors are but men," and that, consequently, the former may be rotten and the latter careless or incapable, or both, people rush by hundreds into a boat that with half the number would be loaded to the verge of safety, and they steam away with a happy indifference which might be mistaken for courage, by a spectator who did not know that it is nothing more than utter ignorance of their own danger. The slightest accident to the vessel or her machinery, the least panic, would in such a crowd be fatal, for the greater mass in a moment of terror would lose all self-command, and the exertions of the few who could keep their presence of mind would be unavailing. What the result might be is terrible to contemplate.

We dwell on this total want of caution in the public themselves, in order more strongly to point out the necessity of some regulations for ensuring their safety. We are no advocates for the continual interference of the authorities with the affairs of daily life, according to the continental system, which does every man's business for him better than he could do it himself. But there is a mean in all things, and the total neglect we witness here is as blameable as the excess of supervision. In no respect is this neglect more apparent than in the state of the different piers and landing-places along the river. They are rickety structures, made of old worn out coal barges, chained together, or connected by planking, which may or may not be trustworthy. The recent appalling accident seems to have arisen from the snapping of the timbers of one of these platforms, over-crowded with people, who were suffered to go upon it by a culpable neglect. The whole of the piers on the river are bad and faulty, and as unsightly in appearance as they are dangerous in use. Surely it would be easy to construct them so as to be at once safe and elegant, and without making them what they are at present—obstructions to the navigation of the river. Nothing can be better adapted to the formation of these piers than the suspension principle, so easily applied, and, when properly constructed, so safe, with the additional advantage of allowing a free tide-way beneath. The Cadogan-pier, at Chelsen, is an example of what might be done elsewhere. It is inconceivable that the Court of Conservancy, entrusted with the guardianship of the river against obstructions and encroachments, should have so long tolerated these crazy fabrics. To their neglect may be attributed the loss of seven or eight lives now, and more hereafter when the impression produced by this catastrophe shall have worn off. It has been stated that the Court was about to take some steps in the matter; it is even said that this pier was one of those about to be "presented" as unsafe. We hope the late event will quicken the pace of this body, seeing the fatal result of its dilatoriness. If they make a vigorous strike now, they will be seconded by public opinion, and the banks of the river may present landing places that will no longer be at once unsightly and unsafe, and on any public occasion or spectacle on the river, inviting the crowd to press upon them to betray them to a sudden death. Those who profit by the conveyance of passengers on the river should be compelled to consult the public safety a little more, even though it should cause their returns to be a little less.

THE NEW COMET. DRAWN AT THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

ADDRESS TO THE COMET.

Courtesy flames.

Art thou the same mysterious traveller,
That in our last bright circuit of the sun
Paid visit to our gaze,
And woke up misty surprise—
Filling the many with an awful dread,
The few with deep delight?

Art thou the same return'd with reinforce
Of heavenly ammunition—Light and Heat,
Which in thy last campaign
'Gainst other worlds was spent
Ere thou hadst meditated war on us?
Hast thou been back to where
The storehouse of the thunderbolt is kept,
And steep'd thy long hair in the lightning stream
That round it ever flows,
Keeping it prisoner there
Till the destroying angel lifts the alarm
To pour both on some world?

Or art thou on a kindly mission sent?—
Or on thy own research a wand'ring orb
Curious to see in which
Of all the breathing stars
The happiest Eden was by fully lost?
If so—come not to us!

Thou'lt find no remnants of that blissful place
Where we imagine our first kindred dwell'd—
Dewy and desolate
Is all around it now!—
Turn—turn away and give us not the fear
Of thy consuming touch!

A beautiful comet has recently appeared in our northern heavens, but whether it be a new one—that is, one that has previously escaped the observation of astronomers—can only be determined by further observations on its orbit. Since its first discovery in this country, it has passed  $\phi$  Bootis,  $\mu$  Corona Borealis, and on the night of July 23, when our drawing was made, it was not far from  $\mu$  Bootis. Its daily change in R. A. =  $-4^m. 36^s.$ ; ditto in N. E. D. =  $+4^m. 44^s.$  In its course towards the sun, it is rapidly approaching the earth, a circumstance which has caused timid and visionary people some alarm. The fever of apprehension is not, however, so great as that which disturbed the Parisian population in 1773, when a similar phenomenon occurred. On that occasion, many persons are said to have died of fright; while numbers prepared for the worst by purchasing—what were offered at high premiums—places in paradise. To relieve the fear of such a catastrophe, we may inform the public of the result of some very curious and elaborate calculations made by Arago to show the extremely small probability of a contact between ourselves and any comet whatever. "Let us suppose," says that great man, "a comet, of which we only know that at its perihelion it is nearer the sun than we are, and that its diameter is one-fourth of that of the earth, the calculation of probabilities shows that of 281,000,000 of chances, there is only one unfavourable, there exists but one which can produce a collision between the two bodies. As for the probability, in its most general dimensions, the unfavourable chances will be from ten to twenty in the same number of two hundred and eighty one millions. Admitting then, for a moment, that the comets which may strike the earth with their nuclei, would annihilate the whole human race, then the danger of death to each individual, resulting from the appearance of an unknown comet, would be exactly equal to the risk he would run if in an urn there was only one single white ball, of a total number of 281,000,000 balls, and that his condemnation to death would be the inevitable consequence of the white ball being produced at the first drawing."

The comet is of a bright white colour, with its tail turned from the earth. Stars of small magnitude are seen through its body. At present, it is only visible with a telescope; but in a few nights it is expected to be seen with the naked eye. Its luminosity is so intense that it has been easily detected during the bright moments of the past week.

We are indebted to the Astronomer Royal, for permitting our artist to make the drawing from which our cut is engraved.

NEW DESTRUCTIVE POWER: CAPTAIN WARNER'S EXPERIMENT AT BRIGHTON.

THE "JOHN O'GAUNT" BEING TOWED TO DESTRUCTION.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S EXPERIMENT AT BRIGHTON.

From the earliest dawnings of policy to this day the invention of men has been sharpening and improving the mystery of murder, from the first rude essay of clubs and stones to the present perfection of gunnery, cannonading, bombardment, mining.—BRASS.

Upwards of a month since a report reached us that Captain Warner was about to exhibit in public the destructive effects of the explosive power discovered or invented by him, and with which he had already experimented privately. The place selected for this interesting demonstration was the expansive Bay or Road in front of the town of Brighton, a judicious choice, both as regards the bold and open shore and facility of rapidly-reaching the town by railway.

The proposition which Captain Warner undertook to illustrate by the exhibition of this experiment was, that no ship could chase a vessel furnished with his implements of warfare, without herself being perfectly destroyed. It is now understood that the experiment had been proposed to the Government, as demanding their attention, from its application of a new power to the purposes of naval warfare, which would seem to bestow on those who might possess it, the power of the instant annihilation of opposing fleets. Thus far, it might be said to have a tendency greatly to alter the character and diminish the frequency of war; and, on these accounts, it was submitted that Government should defray the expenses of this public experiment, estimated at £2000. To this cost, however, the authorities demurred: a quarter of that sum was offered, but promptly declined; and, in this dilemma, Mr. Somes, the eminent ship-owner, generously proffered a vessel for the occasion, whilst the private friends of Capt. Warner raised the sum requisite for the attendant expenses. The vessel, the John o'Gaunt, a barque of 300 tons burden, three-masted, tall, full-bowed, strong, and seaworthy, was given up to Captain Warner in the early part of the present month, and on the 10th inst. sailed from the Thames, but on her arrival at Gravesend, the crew having learnt her destination, most of them deserted, under an apprehension that they might share her fate. After some delay, the men were procured, and she was piloted for Brighton; but, unfortunately, the vessel, which left the Downs on Wednesday, the 10th instant, was caught by the S.W. wind, which suddenly sprung up, and was compelled to put back. Meanwhile the experiment had been fixed for Saturday, the 13th, on which day a large party of noblemen and gentlemen went down to Brighton, specially to witness the spectacle. Their disappointment at its unavoidable postponement was very great: many inquiring groups were to be seen upon the cliffs, and each little knot of visitors seemed to sympathise with each other in their mortification: the good people of Brighton, whom we questioned, knew nothing of the matter, and this circumstance, coupled with the marvellous nature of the proposition, created public distrust; and many persons who could neither slake their scientific thirst, nor forget their disappointment in the luxurious accommodations of Brighton, returned to London with a lurking suspicion that they had been hoaxed, and that such was the only way in which "the invisible shell" (as Captain Warner's invention had been named), would ever go off. Among the visitors were Lords Brougham, Southampton, Ingestre, Worsley, John Beresford, Longford; Captains Dickinson, Henderson, Tracy, R.N., and Messrs. Hutt and Masterman, M.P., &c.

On Wednesday, the 17th, however, the John o'Gaunt was towed by a steamer to Shoreham Roads, and moored there; the knowledge of which fact, and the renewed assurances of Captain Warner that he would fulfil his promise on Saturday last, excited the public curiosity afresh, confidence being, in a great measure, revived by authorised announcements in the Times and other journals of Saturday, as well as by the offices of the London and Brighton Railway Company.

On Saturday morning, at an early hour, crowds of visitors from all parts of the county of Sussex flocked into Brighton, and the first railway train brought down upwards of 500 passengers. The hour named for the experiment was between three and six, so that all the morning trains would arrive in time. Lord Brougham journeyed by the mid-day train, on the arrival of which at the Brighton terminus, there was an excitement far beyond that of the usual accession of Saturday visitors.

On our arrival at Brighton, by this train, we found the three-mile coast-line, from Kemp-town to Brunswick-terrace more or less thickly peopled: the cliffs, the chain-pier, and the houses facing the sea, with their hundreds of balconies, were densely occupied; in fact, the whole range of the coast from Shoreham to the upper extremity of Brighton, soon after noon presented a truly gay and animated appearance, being lined with crowds of persons, who were flanked by a row of carriages and other vehicles. There was an attractive attendance of ladies, whose generally fashionable attire, as they were seated at the windows and in the coaches, coupled with the elegant equipages interspersed, greatly enlivened the scene; and the weather was extremely fine. Among other distinguished persons present were, Earl Manvers, Lord Brougham, Lord Combermere, Viscount Ingestre, M.P.; Lord Ranelagh, Marquis of D'uro, Lord J. Beresford, Lord W. Cowper, Lord Southampton, Marquis of Exeter, the Marquis of Lorne, Lord Alford, M.P.; Lord Hungerford, Lord Lovaine, Lord Aylmer, Lord Templetown, the Bishop of Oxford, Lord Titchester, Mr. M. ## NEW DESTRUCTIVE POWER: CAPTAIN WARNER'S EXPERIMENT AT BRIGHTON.

THE JOHN O'GAUNT "SETTLING DOWN."

M.P., Hon. Captain Murray, R.N., Colonel Dundas, Captain R. Burton, R.N., Hon. Sydney Pierrepont, Chevalier Benkhousen (the Russian Consul), Captain E. Lloyd, R.N., Sir M. Cholmondeley, Sir T. Whitcombe, Captain Henderson, R.N., Captain Dickenson, R.N., Captain Stevens (Marine Artillery), Hon. General Upton, Captain Britton, Colonel Sykes, Mr. W. Peel, Mr. Somes, the ship-owner, and the following Directors of the East India Company:—Mr. Robinson, Colonel Sykes, Mr. Tucker, Mr. Warden, Mr. Cotton, &c. The total number of persons present is estimated at from 30,000 to 40,000.

It appears that the hour of the experiment had been postponed until between four and five o'clock, for the purpose of giving time for the attendance of Lord Huddington and the Hon. Sidney Herbert, the First Lord and Secretary of the Admiralty, who had expressed a wish to be present, but they did not arrive until after the vessel had been destroyed.

Up to four o'clock the chain-pier was crowded with anxious lookers-out, who, however, then began to thin; some persons leaving it from impatience, and others from information that the experiment would not be exhibited off the pier, as originally inferred, but some distance westward, in which direction the crowd began to thicken.

Another hour passed away, and still there were no practical indications in favour of the experiment—in the sporting, if not scientific phrase—coming off. Meanwhile it had become known that from the signal-staff of the battery on the west cliff a flag was to be hoisted, by the command of Lord Ingestre and Captains Dickenson and Henderson, to indicate to Captain Warner when the ship, the subject of his operations, was to be destroyed. The reason of this arrangement was to remove any doubt as to the bona fide nature of Captain Warner's power of destroying a pursuing vessel, without having any communication with that vessel at the moment of her destruction. Accordingly, the platform of the battery was the grand position; and the stone pavement and the inclosed grass-plot was crowded with the élite of the nobles, fashionables, and professionals, those of the navy and army being in a large majority; and it was curious to observe them leaning across the long guns, with their telescopes pointed towards Shoreham Roads, where the devoted bark was lying, and whither two steamers, the Sir William Wallace (on board of which was Capt. Warner), and the Tees had gone. The Times report of this period is amusingly graphic:—

"The company, who generally expected the experiment to come off at four o'clock, waited very good-humouredly, and without evincing any tokens of impatience, until five, when Lord Brougham, who had been manifestly chafing for some time, gave loud utterance to his expressions of displeasure and distrust of Captain Warner's intention to perform an experiment at all. In vain several of Captain Warner's friends reminded the noble and learned lord of the many impediments which prevented a short-handed crew from getting a ship under weigh with the dispatch of a man-of-war's complement of hands. Lord Brougham looked through his telescope, and commented upon the tardy movements of the John O'Gaunt's crew in a manner which intimated that if he himself had been on board, matters would have gone on much more smoothly and swiftly. His learned and mercurial lordship lying prone upon the battery parapet, with a huge telescope resting upon his white hat, was not one of the least features of the tedium of delay."

This delay, however, is accounted for by more than an hour being passed in the removing from the ship cordage and other stores which were not necessary for the experiment, and in raising and detaching the anchor and cables. This was a slow process, and unintelligible to the majority of the spectators, who resolutely held up their glasses, which gleamed in the sunshine like files of musketry, until they became fatigued, and impatiently wondered what in the world Capt. Warner and his people could be about. Lord Brougham undisturbedly expressed his suspicion that the affair would end in nothing but smoke, and there would be no explosion. "You never intended to do it," said he to one of Captain Warner's friends. "Is it not extraordinary," he asked, "that with a fair wind and two steam-boats, they cannot bring the ship up that short distance?" But every one is not so rapid in his movements as the noble and learned lord; who, it must be admitted, was only giving utterance to the general feeling. But the fact was that there were not hands enough employed to do the work quickly. Lord Brougham said he should go, and he would have gone, but just then Lord Ingestre called out that the ship was in motion.

This was about five o'clock, but the tow-line had not yet been attached, and the vessel swung round and was drifting away with the tide towards Shoreham; but a rope was immediately attached from her bow to the Sir William Wallace, which was ahead. Meanwhile some of the few men, who had been left in charge of her, descended into a boat and rowed off, as if for their lives, to the Tees, which followed astern for the purpose of keeping off any persons who might be influenced by their curiosity to come within range of danger. The tide, as is obvious from what was said before of her drifting, was against her, and the distance she was to be brought, between four and five miles, so that it was nearly six o'clock before she was fairly towed to the position she was to occupy, about a mile and a quarter from shore, between the Old Ship Hotel and the battery. Now, two men who had remained on board to manage her helm, or do anything else that might be necessary, hurried out of her, and went off in a boat with greater expedition, if possible, than their shipmates had previously.

The progress of the ship, as illustrated in our first engraving, was watched with intense interest by the assembled thousands, who seemed to forget their previous disappointment in their anticipation of the spectacle. The most intense anxiety now prevailed among the spectators on shore, and every movement of those on board the tug-boat was watched with the greatest interest. Captain Warner was himself on board the tug, and it had been arranged that when the signal was given from the battery the crew of that vessel should go below, leaving no other persons on deck but the captain and the mate. This arrangement was observed; and immediately afterwards, the steamer, which had hitherto been towing the ship by a hawser, put back, and came abreast of her—a position which she maintained for a very few moments, and then again proceeded to her former situation, about a quarter of a mile eastward of the John O' Gaunt.

Captain Warner now hoisted a Union Jack at the mast-head of the steamer, denoting that he was ready to operate, and only awaited the hoisting of the Union Jack from the flagstaff on the battery, to be replied to by Captain Warner hauling down his signal. This had been flying some time before it was answered from the battery; and then arose another delay, in consequence of some adventurous persons in a small cutter, in spite of the presence of the Tees, and of two armed revenue cutters besides, to keep off intruders, going close alongside the ship. Captain Warner hauled the Union Jack half-way down only until the cutter and its occupants were out of danger. The Union Jack was then hauled down entirely.

The grand crisis had now arrived; and we may say, without exaggeration, that the suspense of all present was painful; the silence was deep and unbroken.

At six o'clock, precisely, the devoted vessel appeared to be struck midships, at which point shot up a huge column of water, intermingled with the shingle of her ballast, which was mistaken by most persons for a cloud of smoke. Then a low booming and gurgling noise, indicating a submarine explosion, but not approaching a loud report. "The vessel is struck!" was uttered by a thousand voices, and the next thing to be seen was the falling of the mainmast and the mizen mast. In less than a minute, the vessel was risen almost from stem to stern. "She is filling!" "She is sinking!" the spectators exclaimed, and in less than two minutes and a half the vessel literally tumbled to pieces, as if by magic.

Our next engraving shows the actual work of destruction:—Her mizen went by the board, the vessel, which was shot with but of her; she heeled over to port to an angle of 45 degrees, and her main hatchway being open, daylight was visible through her bottom timbers on her starboard side, and probably her larboard side, having been blown away, and she seemed to part asunder as she went down, in about 35 feet water, leaving nothing perceptible but the top of her foremast. The third illustration shows the vessel "settling down." The time which passed from her being struck and her sinking could not have exceeded two minutes and a half. Some few of the more enthusiastic spectators, chiefly professional men, raised a cheer, but with this mass all was mute astonishment. The eyes were riveted on the last observable fragment of the large object that but the moment before floated gallant on the waters "like a thing of life." A work of destruction so sudden, so frightful, so stupendous, appeared impossible for a moment even to the thousands and tens of thousands that witnessed it. It was like an awful mystery. There were none of the ordinary circumstances which accompany similar catastrophes. There was no smoke, there was no fire, there was no noise, save the low groan of the reading timbers, and the succeeding hush of the waters as they rolled over the instantaneous wreck, and then arose a melancholy feeling, for it was impossible to prevent the imagination depicting the terrific effects of such an explosion upon a peopled ship, thus silently and suddenly perishing. The fourth engraving represents the vessel "settled," and the fifth illustration, the appearance of the wreck at sunset.

Several officers interested in the experiment put off to make an examination of the wreck, and the Sir William Wallace steamer remained in the vicinity for some time.

It was now six o'clock, and most of those who had gone down to Brighton for the day hastened to the railway station, and were brought to London in a train of twenty-nine carriages, containing nearly 600 persons.

Captain Warner received the "congratulations, personally, on Saturday evening of Lord Brougham, and the other noblemen and officers who remained in Brighton; and Mr. Somers, who says he fully expected that Captain Warner would destroy his ship when he gave it to him, has expressed his willingness to give him another for the further proof of the Captain's powers, if the Government are not now satisfied, or will not provide one to satisfy themselves.

The success of the experiment is admitted to have been perfect and entire: and the wonderfully destructive power of its agency is universally admired. The modus operandi is kept secret; and, so long as this is the case, it will be impossible to say how far, under all circumstances, it would prove efficacious against an enemy's fleet, or safe for our own fleet to carry.

It is right to state that the experiment of Saturday was in order to show the portion of the invention which may be applied at sea, in the blockade of towns, or defence of places from attack by sea. There is application of the power, which is intended for a long range in the destruction of forts and places of strength.

Speculation is already rife as to the means employed; and the conjectures in the several journalists' reports of the event are too numerous for us to detail.

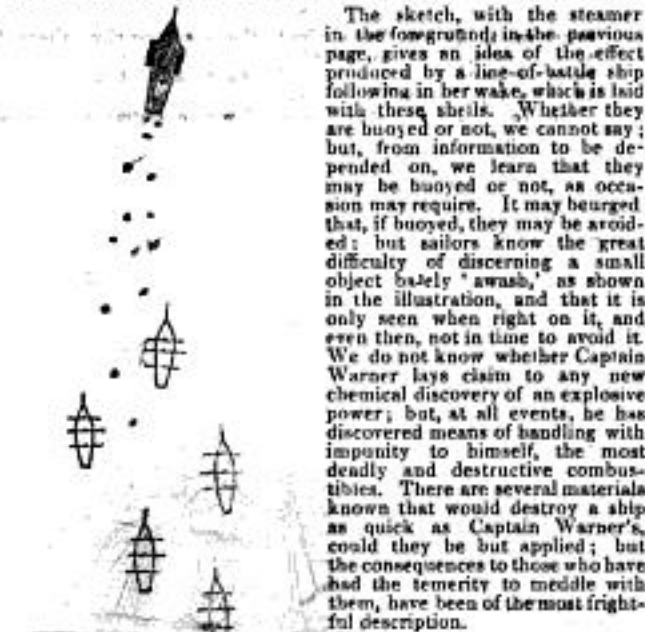

Some persons conjectured that the instrument of destruction was conveyed from the steamer to the ship by means of a rope. Others thought that the agent being attached to a line was suffered to float with the tide against the ship, and that then the line being pulled let off a trigger and produced the explosion. More scientific individuals imagine an electrical battery to have been used; others, an air-gun; others, that a substance is put to float without any guide on the water; others, that a submarine shell is sent in the direction of the ship's bottom. And still others conjecture that the "shell" is made of polished steel, and thus, magnetic, rendered buoyant by cork. "Such a floating magnet would be attracted by the iron of a ship approaching within the range of its attraction, and the force of contact and friction would be sufficient to explode many known detonating compositions." But, though every body was watching, and watching narrowly, with all the aid that optical instruments could afford them, the mode of operation is, we believe, still as profound a secret to the world as before this public experiment.

We have received the following from a correspondent, who minutely witnessed the whole proceedings, and is otherwise acquainted with the details of the subject:—"Of one thing we are quite convinced, that there was nothing in the vessel to cause the explosion; and the 'shell' is inferred from the effect produced, to have been three or four feet below the surface. A wooden case seen floating near the wreck, was by many persons considered to have contained the combustible material; but it was merely the box in which Captain W. had carried his engine of destruction.

SUPPOSED APPEARANCE OF SHELL.

"Captain Warner's 'invisible shell' may be used for the following purposes, viz.:—In a steamer or fast sailing vessel, to chase a whole fleet, and in the event of being chased, to destroy them. For a vessel to catch another, she must follow in her wake; these shells will then be sunk as a trap for the pursuing vessels, as will be seen in the annexed cut. (Cut No. 1.) The shell may also be used at the mouth of a harbour, or river, to prevent the ingress or egress of a hostile fleet. Or they can be projected to an incredible distance; an experiment which, we believe, will only be shown when the invention has been sanctioned by the Government."

The sketch, with the steamer in the foreground, in the previous page, gives an idea of the effect produced by a line-of-battle ship following in her wake, which is laid with these shells. Whether they are buoyed or not, we cannot say; but, from information to be depended on, we learn that they may be buoyed or not, as occasion may require. It may be urged that, if buoyed, they may be avoided; but sailors know the great difficulty of discerning a small object barely 'awash,' as shown in the illustration, and that it is only seen when right on it, and even then, not in time to avoid it. We do not know whether Captain Warner lays claim to any new chemical discovery of an explosive power; but, at all events, he has discovered means of handling with impunity to himself, the most deadly and destructive combustibles. There are several materials known that would destroy a ship as quick as Captain Warner's, could they be but applied; but the consequences to those who have had the temerity to meddle with them, have been of the most frightful description.

The preceding illustrations are from sketches by N. M. Cundy, Esq., the marine artist, whose success in works of this class is well established. Captain S. A. Warner, we learn, commanded a privateer, and in the most gallant manner took one of the largest frigates that ever sailed from Brest. He has been, for some years, engaged in experimenting with a new implement of war, which he first described to his late Majesty William IV., in 1831: the latter King directed its merits to be investigated; and, accordingly, Admirals Sir Richard Keats and Sir Thomas Hardy, reported thereon satisfactorily. Subsequently, at the request of Lord Melville's private secretary, Lieut. Webster examined the principle and practice of Capt. Warner's discovery, and, in 1839, asserted it to be "an extraordinary and to test the absolute sovereignty of the sea in the hands of the first power that should adopt them." Their names were stated at five or six miles; and a hundred sail of the line were declared to be useless against a vessel furnished with this stupendous power. Nevertheless, the subject rested till 1840, when it was again in the Times. In the spring of 1841, a trial took place upon a lake, in Essex, in the presence of Sir Robert Peel, Sir G. Murray, Sir H. Hardinge, Sir F. Burrell, Lord Forester, Col. Gurney, and Captains Britten and Webster; when, with a shell, weighing only 18 lbs., was lifted into the air, a boat weighing 24 tons, filled with and shattered into a thousand pieces, 34 tons of solid timber, and displacing, at least, 14 or 15 tons of water; the noise of the explosion scarcely exceeding that of a gun. A commission had previously been appointed by Government to investigate the merits of Capt. Warner's discovery; and the results were embodied in a pamphlet by Mr. Walsby, the barrister. Still, the question was left undecided until the recent experiment at Brighton.

The results have already been the subject of inquiry in Parliament. On Monday night Sir Robert Peel, in reply to a question by Capt. Pechell, stated that the Government had nothing whatever to do with the experiment. On the same night, Lord Inglestone, in reply to another question, by Capt. Pechell, intimated that he was not at liberty to disclose either the materials by which the destruction was effected, nor the manner in which it was done; but the noble lord read the following certificate, which had been drawn up entirely with reference to the subject, to the facts of which his lordship was ready to make oath:—

We, the undersigned, hereby certify that the operations against the John O'Grady, of 200 tons, conducted by Captain Warner, of Brighton, on Saturday the 20th instant, were under our management and control. We further certify that the explosion did not take place from any combustible matter either on board or alongside the ship, but was caused by Captain Warner, who was on board the William Wallace steamer, having the ship in tow at a distance of about 300 yards, and that the explosion took place in consequence of a signal made by us from the shore, the time of which was not previously known by Captain Warner.

We further declare our belief that Captain Warner has never been on board the ship since she left (Liverpool)—James W. Jackson, Esq., R.N., C.B.; T. Dickenson, Captain, R.N.; W. R. Harrison, Captain, R.N., C.B.

Sir Charles Napier then asked the noble and gallant lord if he was quite sure there was not a Torpedo in the case, such as in the words of Fulton, the inventor, was "to blow a whole ship's company into the air." It was a direct question, and a certain quantity of gunpowder, which, by means of some clock machinery, might be ignited at a given time under water, and being placed under a ship's bottom, destroy it by the explosion. Fulton offered his invention, but in vain, to the French Directory, and to the Dutch Government; he was sent by Bonaparte to Brazil, where, however, he failed. It was subsequently offered to the British Government, and a commission appointed to examine the project; but Fulton took two days to blow up with his Torpedo, or Catamaran (an old Dutch boat) in Walmer Roads!

The commission upon Captain Warner's invention having been postponed at an end on the 1st of May last, he addressed the following gratuitous offer to the Government Commissioners:—

Being now in possession of a bark fit for service, with her sails bent, I offer to you, her Majesty's commissioners, my permission to take the ship into any of the Government dockyards, and strengthen her in any manner you please, to test the force of my power to the fullest extent. I shall then have no objection to go through the trials suggested by yourself (Colonel Chalmers, R.A.), and Captain Cuffe, secretly with you, on condition of a written understanding that in case I succeed in satisfying you of the effect and practicality of my invention, I am to be remunerated my expenses. With this understanding, though I shall be happy to see your Lordships' efforts, I must claim the privilege of having as many other parties present at my experiments as I may please.

This fair and liberal offer was not accepted; but, we are glad to see that Lord Inglestone has given notice of a motion upon the subject in the House of Commons for Tuesday evening.

It may not be generally known that Captain J. Norton has invented a most formidable percussion shell, to explode at the bottom of the sea. An iron tube, like the barrel of a musket, is screwed into a shell of any size, water-tight. A rod of iron, about half a pound in weight, and one foot in length, is suspended within the tube, by means of a split coil passing through a hole in the upper end of the rod, the other end being armed with a percussion cap. The mouth of the tube is closed with a cork ball, almost water-tight. Tin or brass wings being attached to the upper end of the tube, will keep it in a vertical position during its descent to the bottom of the sea; and the shock on its striking the bottom, will cause the bar of iron within the tube to fall and produce the percussion and explosion. Should it be found difficult to make the shell water-proof, Captain Norton is satisfied that percussion-powder, made from silver, will explode by friction or percussion, even when mixed with water. These shells have been also adapted to field artillery, and have been pronounced "simple, safe, and efficacious."

The properties of explosive compounds are interesting at this moment, in their recent connexion with Captain Warner's secret. Two of the most formidable compounds known are the chloride of nitrogen, or azote; and its brother compound the iodide of ammonium, or nitroammon. The mechanical force of the chloride of azote in detonation, is superior to that of any other known, not even excepting the ammoniacal nitroammonium silver. Being the first to investigate the iodide of ammonium, and exhausted for his knowledge in one experiment three fingers and in a succeeding experiment, an eye.

GRAND FESTIVAL IN HONOUR OF THE POET BURNS, AUGUST, 1844.

THE PROPRIETORS of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS feel great pleasure in announcing to the Public of Scotland that they have secured the services of several eminent Artists and Authors to attend the GREAT FESTIVAL IN HONOUR OF ROBERT BURNS.

No expense will be spared in the execution of the Engravings, which will be both splendid and numerous. The Literary Department is entrusted to one of the most popular Writers in Scotland, and it is arranged that these Illustrations and contributions will be given in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, ON SATURDAY, AUGUST 26; also, on SATURDAY, AUGUST 10; and to be concluded on SATURDAY, AUGUST 17.

The number of Illustrations of this event are expected to comprise TWENTY BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVINGS. In the progress of this Festival other objects of interest in Scotland will be introduced, and will then be GREAT PICTURE OF THE MOST ROMANTIC PART OF BRITAIN.

The immense demand expected for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will render it necessary that orders should be given immediately to the News Agents in Scotland. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is published every week, containing about Thirty Engravings. Price 6d. free by post. Office, 10, Strand, London.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, July 28.—Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
MONDAY, 29.—St. Augustine died, 1053.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our Cambrian correspondent, Mr. Edward Taffy Morgan, has been very usefully choric. He attempts a defence of the morality of Wales against an article in our last, in which it was never dreamt of or alluded to, and calls "grove falsehoods" the quotations (on the subject of music alone) which we through delicacy extracted only from the words of Welsh writers! An Irishman is not put into a passion by being supposed capable of blunders, but a Welchman—no, we beg pardon, a "cynno"—will not allow his national folly to be humbly ridiculed. Did Mr. Taffy Morgan ever read Shakespeare's "Sir Hugh Evans"? And again, what has his rudeness done about hospitality and purity of morals to do with our few observations on the origin of the Cambrian harp? Pray pardon!

"Solus," Dublin.—We will see.

"F. C.," Manchester, may probably obtain the works referred to, of Mr. Bohn, York-street, Cornhill-garden.

"Gnomonia" is mistaken: the passage in our journal respecting the Rev. Mr. Newman, was a quotation from the "English Review," just published.

"A Well-wisher," Birmingham.—His letter has been referred to the engraver of the view.

"T. W.,"—Thanks.

"M.," Helston.—The subject is too "cloudy."

"A Constant Reader,"—We are gratified at our correspondent's approbation of the Southampton line.

"A Reader," Walton-on-the-Naze.—The demand for the toll is legal.

"E. J. St. Vincent" should write to Mr. Loder, Bristol-road, Blackfriars.

"Terina," St. Day, near Truro.—We are of opinion that several London advertisers pay £2000 a year, and upwards for advertisements.

"T. C.," Edinburgh.—In 1837, nearly one-half of the duty on hops was contributed by the county of Kent; Sussex was the next in amount, and then Hereford, Worcester, and Hampshire.

"N. S. J. A. Munro,"—Thanks, but we have not room.

"A. L. and J. L."—If under £10.

"S. S. J.," Halesworth, may rest quiet till next session of Parliament.

"A Constant Reader," should apply to the New Zealand Company.

"B. B. Z." should write to the Governor of the Bank of England.

"B. K." should recollect that we have many letters to please.

"A Correspondent," Bolton.—The Duke of Wellington is an Irishman.

"W. B.," Halesworth, and "W. C. B." will be entitled to the large Print.

"Mimosa" is thanked for his corrections.

"A Subscriber," Westport.—The large Print of "London in 1843" may still be had, by order, of any bookseller.

"J. M.," Banbolt.—By continuing his subscription, the subscriber will be entitled to the large Print.

"H. C.," Langston, should see the advertisement of the large print. The railway referred to is a continuation of the North Eastern Railway.

"Cambridge," Chelmsford.—The large print is not intended to be bound with the 4th volume.

"A Young Lieutenant, R.N.," should write to any army and navy tailor. We have not room for the obituary beyond its present extent.

"B.," Kewford.—Perhaps our correspondent will favour us with a sketch and memoir.

"G.," Strand-lane, should call.

"Worford,"—We think the charge is correct.

"T. W.," Liverick, should order the print and No. of any news-agent, price 1s.

"D.,"—The documents are collateral security for the debt.

"A Traveller" is thanked for the hint. The price of each half-yearly volume is 18s. bound.

"J. B.," Windsor.—We do not find the origin of the name of Virginia Water in any readily accessible description of Berkshire.

"J. D.," Calcutta, should not attempt to disguise his handwriting.

"E. S.,"—We do not feel disposed to extend the questionable celebrity of the French novelist in question.

"J. W. P.," Buxton, is thanked.

"A Subscriber from the Commencement,"—The paragraph—anonymous.

"Beatrice," Kensington, should apply to the Income-tax Commissioners for the district in which she resides. Unwarranted injury is sold by weight.

"S. K.," should forward a specimen of the proffered sketches.

"J. H. S.,"—At draught, it does not always follow that it is a drawn game when only one man of each party is left.

"A. Z.,"—The Turbidity Trade Bill is one of the many deferred measures of the present session of Parliament.

"A. B.,"—Thanks. The price of our paper, if paid in advance, is 25s. per annum for 52 Nos.

"A Constant Subscriber," Walton-on-the-Naze.—We have not room. The Committee of the Harbours, Peace and Temperance Festival are thanked for the views etc., which prove of greater value to our engraving; but next year we have to illustrate their interesting meeting.

"A Subscriber," Linsithgow, will be entitled to the large print.

"Reno," is joking: he should see future announcements.

The following poetical contributions are intelligible:—Lines by M. to the Duke of Devonshire; "C. B. on a Young Mother;" Lines by H. D. on the Wellington Statue; "The Lament of a Jackal;" Song, by Thelwell.

"T. C.," Douglas, Isle of Man.—We think the Rathfriland steamer was wrecked late in 1830.

"Government School of Design,"—The distribution of the prizes took place on Wednesday, Mr. E. W. Gladstone as the chair. Next week we shall engrave the principal prizes, and briefly report the progress of the school.

"A Subscriber from the Commencement,"—A child that has lost either parent is an orphan.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1844.

It is generally stated that the legislative business of Parliament will close on the 8th of August; it will not, however, rise on that day, but be adjourned over till the 22nd, in order to give time to the Judges to return from Circuit and deliver in their opinion on the points submitted to them, on the Writ of Error, from the Dublin Court of Queen's Bench. The decision of the Lords must be given in the present session, as to defer it till the next, would inflict the greater part of the sentence, with a doubt still existing as to whether there may or may not have been a flaw in the legal proceedings. The opinion of the Judges will be given in writing, and then the House of Peers will proceed to judgment, in which it may be necessary to state, they are not bound to decide according to the opinion so delivered, though coming from such high authorities it will doubtless have great effect on their lordships, whichever way it may be. The judgment having been given, Parliament will be prorogued, most probably by commission.

A curious coincidence marked the final stages of two of the principal measures introduced by the Government this session. In the discussion in committee on the final clauses of the Poor-law Bill, an amendment was moved, and by a Conservative member, which will have the effect of relaxing the strictness with which the act has been interpreted as to out-door relief. The amendment was resisted by Sir J. Graham, but on the division the Government was beaten; for though the majority was only one, yet "it will do," as Mercurio says, as well as a larger. The first Poor Law was strict enough on this head, but it was in addition strained unnecessarily on the side of harshness by those who administered it. The present amendment will, in some degree, correct the evil—for an evil it was—and the good work has been still more assisted by Sir J. Graham himself, by a declaration made on Wednesday last, of what he, the highest authority, both as one of the framers of the law and its chief administrator, conceives to be the intention of the act. He declares that by the old act, even as it stood, Boards of Guardians have the power to order out-door relief in cases of necessity, and that the unsparing indiscriminate severity with which destitution has been forced within the walls of the "house," as the condition of receiving the relief which in many cases was not required to be more than a casual one, is not warranted by the provisions of the bill. If Sir James Graham is right in his view of the law—and his well-known ability would prevent our doubting that he is so—why, in the name of justice and common sense, did he not state his opinion long ago? What a vast amount of doubt and uncertainty it would have relieved; what a mass of suffering it would have prevented; for it would be entertaining a worse opinion of mankind than we possess, to suppose that the guardians were always the willing instruments of the hard operation of the law. They overstrained the act for fear of breaking it, and dreaded being humane lest they should by mistake have fallen into an illegality. We here see the bad effect of the absurdly intricate and technical wording of acts of Parliament; they cannot be understood by those who are not practised in legal subtleties; but they are eternally liable to be misconstrued, and a practice once adopted under a certain act, establishes the rule by which others proceed, without looking at the act at all, and the result is often needless oppression and discontent. Mr. B. Escomb, on hearing the interpretation given by Sir J. Graham, stated that he had frequently urged the Board of Guardians, of which he is a member, to adopt this very view, but had always been outvoted! We have no doubt that this has frequently been the case, and now, that Boards of Guardians are assured they have more discretion than they thought they had, we hope they will use it wisely, and make "relief" what it was intended to be—assistance; and not cut off every applicant for it from society by immuring him in a workhouse and converting him from a struggling but perhaps still hoping man, into an objectless and despairing pauper.

The other instance we have alluded to, in which the House of Commons came to a conclusion the reverse of that arrived at by her Majesty's Government, occurred on the Railways Bill. Like the Poor-law, it was dragging its slow length out of the purgatory of a committee, being as yet neither accepted nor condemned, when again an amendment was moved, and again by a Conservative member, making it imperative on railway companies, should they run any trains on a Sunday, to append to the first and second-class carriages a third-class train. The amendment was opposed in this case by the President of the Board of Trade, as in the other by the Secretary of State. Mr. Gladstone alleged that he could not think of encouraging Sunday travelling in the working classes. But it was answered, you provide for travelling on that day by those who can pay well for it; be at least impartial; for the poor man may have as urgent need to be conveyed from place to place on the Sabbath as the rich one, and to compel him to pay a high fare, is subjecting his necessity to a heavy tax, without asserting your principle one jot. In fact, the case, as stated by Mr. Sheil, was this—Dives was to be permitted to travel, while Lazarus was to stay at home; and the incongruity was so apparent that the house carried the amendment against the Government by a majority of 33—a large number in a thinly-attended house during a morning sitting. We wonder that so clear-headed a man as Mr. Gladstone should have put himself in such a position; he had not one argument to fall back on, as he had given up the principle of prohibition of Sunday travelling, by allowing first and second-class carriages to run. As a question of principle, he was bound to prohibit all or none. It was almost amusing to remark member after member rising on both sides, and all with some new form of condemnation of the partiality of the Board of Trade. Mr. Gladstone must have been his mistake long before the division; and he would have done better to have conceded the point than to have exposed himself to defeat. We may observe, by the way, that there has seldom been a measure introduced which underwent such a change in its progress as this Railway Bill.

One of the last acts passed this session is an act of what may be called retributive justice. A notorious offender against political morality is effectually put out of the way of sinning any more. The Borough of Sudbury is politically extinguished, it is disfranchised; the powers it has abused are taken away from it, and having nothing to sell, can be purchased no more. Of the defunct we are told to say nothing except what is good; but where the subject of the discussion never did a thing of which good can be said, and many things which provoke tongues and pens to speak evil if they would speak with justice, how shall the injunction be observed? The best plan, perhaps, is to let its memory die, except so far as its misdeeds may act as a warning, and its fate as an example to other boroughs which could be named as by no means immaculate. It is not always the most guilty that are selected for punishment. Those on whom the Tower of Siloam fell were not sinners above all the Galileans. One great offender has been swept away, but there are many left having ample cause and necessity for repentance. We are glad that Parliament has taken this decisive step. Of all punishments it is the most striking and effectual. The question now remains to what place shall the two members be given, for we presume the list of Parliament will be maintained at the number of 658? The University of Edinburgh might, we think, put in a strong claim to consideration.

The investigation into the late accident at Blackfriars-bridge, has terminated without fixing any direct blame on any one. Indeed the summing up of the Coroner appears to acquit the proprietors of the pier, which might have been strong enough for the landing and embarkation of passengers crossing it a few at a time, but was not meant to bear the weight of a large concourse of people at once:—

If it were shown that the wooden bridge was not sufficiently secure for the ingress and egress of parties passing to the river steamers, and that in consequence of such insecurity human life had been sacrificed, a verdict of manslaughter would lie. It appeared, however, from the whole of the evidence, that the fatal event took place from the improper conduct of the persons who forced their way upon the bridge, and not from any neglect on the part of the pier people, who did all in their power to keep them off. Though sufficient for the purpose of ingress and egress to the steamboats, the bridge might not have been strong enough for those who forced their way upon it at the time of the accident. What right had they to be there? If any money had been taken for their admission, or if any enforcement had been held out to them to come there, any person holding out such inducement would be liable to the charge of having caused the deaths which ensued.

It appears that at least some efforts were made to keep the crowd off, but the exertion of one man could do nothing against the determination of many, and then follows the inference of the Coroner, as to the real cause of the event, which, we fear, is too well founded:—

The incalculable richness of the people who crowded to the wooden bridge in spite of all the efforts of the man on the pier to keep them away, led to the terrible catastrophe which involved the immediate families of those victims of the over-crowding in the deepest affliction, and started the public by circulating exaggerated reports of the calamity. It was clear from the whole evidence that the accident occurred from the desire always present on the part of the people of England to see a stirring sight at all hazards.

A destruction of life from one kind of danger will frequently call attention to another. The over-crowding of the steamers has often been a subject of remark, but till some awful destruction of life occurs, nothing effectual seems very likely to be done. In the meantime it would be as well if the pleasure-loving part of the public, which is generally a very careless one, would ponder the following facts, communicated to the Lord Mayor by Mr. Under-Sheriff Anderson:—

He begged permission to draw his Lordship's attention to the state of the steam vessels in conveying passengers to different parts of the river. On Monday night the steamer was observed at Blackwall to have on board upwards of 1000 persons, so that there the immense mass stuck, deriving its safety in a great degree from the impossibility of moving from one side to the other, for if the vessel dropped a single plank on either side the most awful destruction must have taken place.

This is only one instance out of many; and here the evil is of a kind that the public might remedy for themselves. Others require the interference of authority, and we are happy to see such a statement as the following coming from the first Magistrate of the City:—

My opinion as regards the regulating the speed of the steam-vessels is, that we should have an authorised agent on board—a sort of city pilot; we should erect public landing-places ourselves too, and do away with those private piers altogether; but I am convinced the Navigation Committee will make every exertion for the public safety and benefit, and it will no longer be considered indispensable to pack people together like a flock of sheep to insure their security from drowning.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, took their usual early walk. The Princess Royal and the Princess Alice were taken a drive in an open carriage. The royal party took a drive in the afternoon, the Queen and Prince Albert in an open phaeton and pair.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household attended divine service this morning in the private chapel. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the chapel near Cumberland Lodge. In the forenoon the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess Royal, walked in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Her Majesty and her Royal Highness took a drive in the afternoon in a pony phaeton.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took an airing this morning in a pony phaeton, and visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore Lodge. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert rode out in a pony phaeton, the Prince driving. The royal children were also taken out for airing.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, walked this morning in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, were taken an airing in the forenoon. The Royal party left the Castle for a drive in the afternoon. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent took an airing in an open carriage. The Royal dinner party at the Castle, in the evening, included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, and the Countess Walsingham.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, walked in the pleasure grounds of the Castle this morning, and also took an airing in a pony phaeton. Her Majesty and Prince Albert visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore Lodge. Sir Robert Peel arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen. In the afternoon the illustrious party rode out. The Queen, the Marchioness of Douglas, the Countess of Mount Edgcombe, and the Countess De Grey, occupied six open carriages and four. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert was on horseback. The Royal Family were taken in the garden of the Castle in the afternoon.

THURSDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took an airing morning and afternoon in a pony phaeton and pair. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken out in the forenoon.

RETURN OF THE QUEEN DOWAGER TO ENGLAND.—On Thursday morning, at eight o'clock, the Black Eagle arrived at Woolwich Dockyard, having on board her Majesty the Queen Dowager and suite. The Queen looked exceedingly well, and sat on deck until half-past eight, while the carriages, five in number, were getting on shore and the horses putting in, and then disembarked and immediately proceeded to town. The landing was strictly private. A foreign steamer proceeded up the river with her Majesty's baggage.

ANOTHER ROYAL VISIT.—We understand that the Royal Highness Prince Frederick William Louis of Prussia, brother of the King, and heir apparent to the Prussian throne, is expected on a visit to her Majesty in the early part of next week. His Royal Highness will probably be present at the Goodwood races.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—We believe it is arranged that the visit of the King of the French to her Majesty will take place in September. The King will embark at Tientsin. His Majesty will be accompanied by two ships of 74 guns, and four or five steamers, and will land at Portsmouth, whence he will proceed by railway to the station nearest to Windsor. His Majesty will remain eight days at Windsor, and will not visit London.

THE KING OF SAXONY'S TOUR.—On Saturday last the two carriages and four conveying his Majesty the King of Saxony and suite drove up at the White Ox Inn, at High Hocket, about halfway between Penrith and Carlisle, when his Majesty, Baron Gersdorff, Doctor Curran, and others, walked forward down the hill towards Low Hocket. On the road a gig passed them in which were a lady and gentleman and a little boy; the latter happened to lose his hat out of the gig, when his Majesty hastened from his attendants and picked up the hat, and ran after the vehicle and gave it into the little fellow's hand. The lad, on being informed who the illustrious personage was who had picked his hat up off the road, was, of course, highly delighted, and called his hat the "King of Saxony." His Majesty has since visited Glasgow.

A ROYAL ARTISAN.—During the recent tour of the King of Saxony in the North, his Majesty visited the well-known pencil manufactory of Messrs. Banks, Foster, and Co., at Kewick. The King not only examined every process through which the pencil passes, but having expressed his admiration at the manner in which the operation of stamping was performed, he was solicited by Mr. Banks to try the operation, which the royal visitor at once agreed to, and on a dozen pure lead pencils being placed in his hands his Majesty passed them through the engine with as expertness and tact that would have done credit to a more experienced workman.

THE EXPECTED ACCIDENT OF HER MAJESTY.—Two engines, to be attached to special trains, have been commanded to be kept in constant readiness with their steam up, both by day and night, at the Paddington Terminus of the Great Western Railway, to start at five minutes' notice for the Slough Station, for the purpose of conveying the great officers of state en route to Windsor Castle, upon their being summoned from town on the auspicious and interesting occasion of the arrival of her Majesty. A powerful alarm has just been fired at the telegraphic office at Paddington, communicating with the telegraph at Slough, for the purpose of arousing the attendants who sleep at the office, in the event of a telegraphic express reaching the terminus from Windsor during the night. A trusty person has also been appointed to remain in attendance at the office of the Slough Station throughout the whole of the night. It is computed that a message can be expressed by the aid of the telegraph from Windsor Castle to Buckingham Palace in 25 minutes.

Dr. Charles Locock, first physician accoucheur to her Majesty, has arrived at Windsor, and taken up his residence at the house of the Rev. D. P. Markham, one of the canons of Windsor, and within the precincts of the Castle. Dr. Ferguson, second physician accoucheur, and Sir James Clark, Bart., one of the physicians in ordinary to the Queen, have also arrived. Mrs. Lilley, who has been engaged as her Majesty's monthly nurse, is at the Castle.

PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.—The inhabitants of Dover intend to commemorate the approaching birthday of his Royal Highness Prince Albert (the 12th of August) by a grand fête and fancy fair on a very extensive scale, under high patronage and the immediate support of the first families in the locality; the proceeds to be devoted to the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Benevolent Society, of which his Royal Highness is patron.

The Duke of Wellington will give a grand concert of vocal and instrumental music on Wednesday evening next at Appleby House, to which are invited their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strélitz, and four hundred of the élite of the land. The entertainment, it is understood, is given for the purpose of introducing Lady Charles Wellesley after her recent illness with Lord Charles. Lord Brougham is expected to arrive in the north in the course of a few days, the requisite arrangements having been made for his lordship's reception at Brougham Hall, in which considerable additions and alterations have lately been made in the building and decorative departments.

LIBERAL PRESENT OF HER MAJESTY.—At the recent marriage of the Rev. Edward Hastings Grove, Vice Principal of Brasenose College, Oxford, to the Hon. Harriet Lyster, one of her Majesty's Maids of Honour, her Majesty presented the happy pair one with a magnificent locket containing her own hair, together with a donation of £1000, to which were added £500 from Lord John Russell, as a mark of his esteem. The bride was given away by Lord John Russell, whose first wife was her sister.

An address has been agreed to by the inhabitants of Guernsey, signed by 7000 natives, and 750 English residents. It is printed on white satin, and on the reverse side all the speeches at full length which were delivered at a late meeting at Guernsey, with a raised gold border. Sir Thomas Sumner wrote to the Queen, begging permission to present it in person, and she graciously favoured him with an autograph reply, to the effect that she would be glad to receive from him the address. Sir Thomas was enroute to the Duke of Kent many years, and it appears, a favourite of her Majesty.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.—Viscount Grimston, M.P., is on the eve of leaving to the hymeneal altar Miss Weyland.—It is currently gossiped in the circles of fashion, that a lovely and accomplished daughter of a noble earl and countess is likely to be, within a few months, conducted to the altar by a young viscount, heir presumptive to a much higher title.—On Tuesday, at Hampton Church, Mr. Cochrane, son of Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane, led to the altar the daughter of Rear-Admiral Sir G. F. Seymour, Commander-in-chief in the Pacific.—The marriage between Mr. Kerrison and Lady Caroline Strangways was solemnised on Tuesday morning at Marlborough, Dorsetshire.

DEATH OF THE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF LEICESTER.—It is with pain we record the demise of Anne Amelia, Dowager Countess of Leicester, wife of the Right Hon. Edward Elliot, M.P. for Coventry, which took place on Monday morning, at Longford-hall, her lordship's seat in Derbyshire, where the deceased countess had resided for her seclusion. Her death resulted from her confinement, having, on the 10th instant, given birth to a son, who survived his birth only a few hours. The deceased countess was third daughter of the Earl and Countess of Albemarle.

ACCIDENT TO THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.—The Earl of Mornington met with an accident on Wednesday, at his residence at Trillickham. His lordship missed his footing in descending a stone staircase, and fell to the bottom, where he was taken up severely bruised, but happily no bones were broken, and it is hoped that his lordship has suffered no internal injury. The venerable earl is now in the eighty-second year of his age, and his frame has been somewhat shaken by this unfortunate accident.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CONSECRATION.—On Wednesday morning the Lord Bishop of Worcester consecrated a new church in Birmingham, dedicated to St. Stephen. The church, which is a neat and convenient structure, is capable of accommodating about 1200 persons, having many of its sittings unappropriated and free. On Sunday morning the Lord Bishop of Ripon consecrated a new church at Yeadon, in the parish of Guiseley, near Leeds, in the presence of a large number of the clergy and gentry of the neighbourhood. The Lord Bishop of Ripon has been the Rev. William Metcalf, M.A., Incumbent of Kilkhamerton, Yorkshire, to the ministry of the new church.

THE LATE OF MAN.—The Lord Bishop of Sodor and Man, held an ordination at Bishop's Court, on Sunday, the 11th inst., when the following gentlemen were admitted to holy orders.—Priests.—The Rev. John Fry Garde, the Rev. John Gough, B.A., the Rev. Isaac Britain, Deacons.—Alexander Watt, A.M., Philip Dove.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England had a meeting on Tuesday. Those present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Ely, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Lord President of the Council, the Dean of Westminster, and the Earl of Beesborough.

The Dean and Chapter of Lincoln have nominated the Rev. James Johnson, curate of Crowle, Lincolnshire, to the living of Gleanham and Normanby, in the same county. The Lord Bishop of Peterborough has instituted the Rev. James Powell Marriott, B.A., to the rectory of Cottesbush, Leicestershire, vacant by the resignation of Foxherbert Adams Marriott. The Rev. George Cook, M.A., has been instituted by the Bishop of Salisbury to the perpetual curacy of Piddle Hinton, Dorsetshire, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. T. Thellusson Carter, on the presentation of the Provost of Eton College. The Rev. W. F. Sims, M.A., Chaplain to Lord Viscount Strangways, has been appointed to the evening lectureship of Lee Church, Kent, of which parish he is the curate. The Lord Bishop of Oxford has licensed the Rev. Robert Williams to the perpetual curacy of Stoken Church, Oxfordshire.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

TAKING THE VEIL.—On Tuesday morning the imposing ceremony of taking the black veil was performed at the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, at Parker's Folly, Bermondsey. At the early hour of eight o'clock the chapel of the Convent was crowded, principally by ladies, to witness the ceremony. At that hour the Convent bell began tolling, announcing the entrance of the procession, which consisted of the prioress, incense-bearers, and assistants, followed by the nuns, each of whom bore a lighted wax taper. The ceremony was then proceeded with, during which solemn mass was celebrated; and at the conclusion, each of the nuns embraced their newly professed sister, and they returned to the Convent in the same order in which they had left. The young lady who has thus embraced the profession is a Miss Ruff, and is possessed of considerable property.—She has been in the convent upwards of two years, and is of great personal attractions.

THE STATE OF THE WEATHER.—The weather has been intensely hot in the metropolis this week. On Tuesday the thermometer stood in the sun, south aspect, 109 degrees. When placed, at four o'clock, upon water, in opposition to its rays, the spirit reached 121 degrees, whilst the other, which was longitudinal, was only 102 degrees. The shade thermometer indicated, in the sheltered position, 84 degrees; and the most extraordinary indication was the heat of Men-day night, which was not less than 63 degrees, eight degrees above temperature; being a most unusual heat in the night, even in eastern seasons. On Tuesday afternoon at Windsor the thermometer in the shade, on the north side of the Castle, ranged between 81 and 82 degrees, and within a few minutes after the sun had passed the meridian, the mercury rose to 123 degrees Fahrenheit, the thermometer being in the sun, on the southern side of the royal residence, and between the Victoria and Augusta towers.

THE STATUARY AT THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The Committee for managing the building of this splendid edifice have recently determined upon most important improvements in the shape of statues, that will tend to render it of a far more attractive character than was at first anticipated. A finely carved marble figure of the Queen will stand in the centre of the quadrangle, facing the principal or western entrance. The sum of 1000 guineas has been allowed for its cost, and the artist being left to the selection of her Majesty, she has been pleased to confer the honour on Mr. Lough. A new statue of Sir Thomas Gresham, 15 feet in height, and chiselled out of Portland stone, at a cost of 300 guineas, has also been decided on, and will be placed immediately under the tower at the eastern end. New figures of Sir Thomas Watlington and Sir Hugh Myddelton are likewise to adorn this commercial building. The former, for which £450 has been allowed, will, with a new statue of Queen Elizabeth, occupy the only two niches on the east side of the area. The latter, with another, will be placed on the north exterior facing Bartholomew-lane, £435 being allowed for its cost. The figures are in a forward state, and it is hoped that they will occupy their several positions on the day of the opening of this important structure.

THE REGISTRATION.—In consequence of the recent decision of Lord Chief Justice Tindal, that lodgers paying a yearly rent of £10 were entitled under the Reform Act to the privilege of voting at elections, there is every probability that the constituencies of the metropolitan boroughs will this year be greatly increased. In the Tower Hamlets about 1000 claims have been sent in to the overseers; in the Ward of Cripplegate, notices have been served for 700; and in the borough of Lambeth there are no fewer than 1000 new claimants, the great majority of whom are lodgers. From this it is evident that the revision of the lists of voters will this year last much longer than usual.

INCREASE OF LUXURY.—The effect of the importation of pices from the West Indies is that such luxuries have been placed within the reach of the poorer classes, by the novel mode of having considerable numbers exposed in barrows and hawked through the streets for sale in the same way as the customary soap cherries and maca nuts, but with the addition that the public ears are assailed with the extraordinary cry of "Fine Apples, a penny a slice."

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES AT THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN.—On Wednesday the annual distribution of prizes to the pupils of this valuable institution took place in the great room of the establishment at Somerset-house. The hour fixed for the business of the day was four o'clock, and by that time the great room was filled by the pupils, and a large assemblage of Members of Parliament, artists, and other distinguished persons, amongst whom were several ladies. The walls of the room were covered with paintings in fresco, drawings, models, and other works of art, the productions of the students, of a very meritorious character. Lord Coltham having briefly opened the proceedings of the day, called the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone to the chair for the purpose of distributing the prizes. Mr. Gladstone made some very gratifying observations upon the progress which the School of Design, manifested by the productions of the pupils, had made within the comparatively short period since its establishment, and expatiated upon the important and useful results which must accrue from it to the extensive manufactures of this country. A debt of gratitude was due to the Government under whose auspices this great experiment of superintending an excellence in the ornamental arts, upon the proud pre-eminence which this country already enjoyed in those more purely of industry and ingenuity; and, for himself and his colleagues, he was happy to be able to declare their warm and anxious interest in its success, and their determination to lend it every co-operation in their power. (Cheers.) The Right Honourable gentleman also passed a high compliment upon the exertions of the council, and of Mr. C. H. Wilson, the director, to whose skill, talent, and discretion so much of the success which had attended the objects of the institution was due. This compliment was responded to by loud cheers from the pupils, re-echoed by many of the general company. Mr. Gladstone then proceeded to deliver the prizes to the successful competitors.

SOME LONDON FLORICULTURAL EXHIBITION.—This exhibition took place on Tuesday, in the Surrey Zoological Gardens, and attracted a large crowd of respectable individuals. The show of flowers was very good, and the selection for prizes made by the judges gave universal satisfaction. The collection of miscellaneous plants in pots was particularly fine, and from their showy, elegant appearance, added much to the beauty of the exhibition. In the evening the gardens were crowded, in consequence of the double attraction of the fireworks and flowers. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strélitz, honoured the exhibition with their presence between one and two o'clock, and expressed their high gratification at the show of flowers and fruits.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE NEW LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.—Lord Heytesbury, the newly appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, accompanied by his secretary, Mr. A. Court, left London on Thursday at an early hour, and proceeded by railway to Liverpool, en route for Dublin Castle.

NEW CHURCH AT WINDSOR.—On Thursday the Lord Bishop of Oxford consecrated a new church at Windsor, the foundation stone of which was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert in April, 1842. A large number of the clergy and laymen of distinction were present at the ceremony.

YESTERDAY the distribution of prizes to the pupils of the schools in union with King's College took place in the large theatre of the establishment. The chair was occupied by the Bishop of Lichfield, and there was a numerous company. When the speeches had been delivered, the chairman distributed the prizes, which consisted of valuable books and silver medals. The Bishop of Lichfield made some laudatory remarks upon the discipline and general character of the school.

MORTALITY OF THE METROPOLIS.—It appears from the official table of the mortality in the metropolis, that the number of deaths in the week ending July 20 was—males, 454; females, 442.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—A grand sailing match for three prizes, given by the above club, took place on Thursday. The results that contended for the prizes were as follows:—Champion, 15 tons; Galleon, 25 tons; Phantom, 30 tons; Enigma, 25 tons; Blue Belle, 25 tons; Dolphin, 11 tons; Sea Nymph, 10 tons; Fay, 12 tons. The prizes were for the first boat of the first class a superb silver salver; for the second boat, a silver gilt vase; and for the first boat of the second class, likewise a silver gilt vase, all bearing appropriate inscriptions. The die was cast from Greenwich to Gravesend and back. The start took place at half-past eleven. Precisely at 5h. 2m. 40s. the Blue Belle rounded the buoy at Greenwich, winning the first prize (the silver salver); the Champion, at 5h. 43m., winning the second prize (first class), followed by the Sea Nymph, who won the second class prize. On their coming in the several winning yachts were loudly cheered. The yachts which lost did not arrive till some time afterwards.

ST. BOTOLPH, ALDGATE, AND ST. KATHERINE'S REGATTA.—On Thursday the Scullers' Match, given by subscription of the lovers of aquatic sport in the parishes of St. Botolph and St. Katherine's took place, and attracted a large concourse of spectators. The match was for a new coat and badge, and several minor prizes. The distance rowed was from off the Custom house, and round a vessel moored off Down's wharf, Lower East Smithfield, twice each way. The fifth, or grand heat, was between Wing and Martell, two Irongate Stairs watermen. The former won easily.

THE STEAM BOAT PIERS ON THE RIVER.—On Thursday morning the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Chairman of the Navigation Committee, inspected the steam-boat piers above London-bridge. They disembarked at Blackfriars-bridge, and minutely examined the construction of the pier. His lordship examined persons who were present at the time of the accident as to the immediate cause of the disaster. It was quite manifest to the Lord Mayor that the planks connecting the dumb lighters with the pier had been of a thickness quite incompetent for the purpose for which they were laid down, and that the lighters themselves, and in fact all portions of the structure, were highly dangerous. The Lord Mayor and the city officers afterwards attended a committee at the Guildhall, and orders were issued to the water-bailiff and clerk of the works to set off from London-bridge and proceed up the river, and to compel the owners of all piers immediately to put them in a condition for the safe and convenient embarkation of passengers by steam-boats; and in the event of hesitation in complying with the regulations, the Lord Mayor declared that he would sign warrants, which the City Solicitor had prepared, for removing with a strong hand every pier not rendered conformable with the rules.

ANOTHER CONVICTION FOR ARSON.—At the Suffolk Assizes, held at Ipswich on Wednesday, June Monday, aged 32, was indicted for having set fire to a dwelling-house, in Waugheer, on the 25th of June last, the property of James Hadden. From the evidence it appeared that the husband of the prisoner having been confined for some offence against the game-laws, left his wife in great distress. The landlady had put in a distress for rent, and as he refused to pay proceedings, the prisoner was heard to threaten that she would burn the things in the middle of the room. The house was afterwards found on fire, and it had evidently been done by some one inside. Evidence was given to connect the prisoner with the transaction, and the jury found her guilty, but from the circumstances recommended her to mercy. Baron Alderson concurred in the recommendation, and delayed the verdict.—David Flower, aged 40, was indicted for feloniously setting fire to a shop, the property of James Heffer, at Farnham, Suffolk, on the 15th instant, but was acquitted.

FOREIGN.

ANOTHER CONTACT BETWEEN THE FRANCH AND THE MOORS.—The latest accounts from Fife state that a telegraphic despatch, dated from the village of Hill Barn, the 15th instant, announces that Marshal Rugens, having been provoked by a fresh attack on the part of the Moors, completely overthrew and pursued them as far as three days' march beyond Ouchda. He returned on the 15th to the camp of Lalla Margina. All the tribes are offering to submit, even those within the Moorish territory.

We are glad to hear that a treaty has been concluded and signed in London between the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the Queen of Great Britain and the King of Hanover, for the adjustment of the protracted and embarrassing discussions arising out of the Blücher dux. It is stated in well-informed quarters that a reduction of not less than one-third has been effected in the duties on the most important articles, and that the settlement of the State sera and charges has been embodied in a general treaty of commerce and navigation with the kingdom of Hanover.

GREAT MEETING OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, AT SOUTHAMPTON.

THE OLD ENGLISH FARMER,

A HOMELY BALLAD, SUGGESTED BY THE ABOVE ANNIVERSARY.

Here's a health to the Farmer who lives on the Land,
Made the best and the richest on Earth by his hand;
You may roam the wide world, but there's naught to be seen
That can rival the old English Farmer, I ween!

Derry down, down,
Down derry down!

What life is so happy? he's up with the sun—
He hears the Day's poetry sweetly begun
By the lark and the cuckoo, the swallow and mistle—
And sees the green lawn all bespangled with pearl!
Derry down, &c.

While chaffards in cotes, 'mid tumult and strife,
Lose all the best part of this quick-fading life;
He quaffs Hebe's cup at Aurora's first ray,
And lives twice as long as they do ev'ry day!
Derry down, &c.

He rules ev'ry station from castle to cot,
He's neither by Noble nor peasant forgot;
The peer and the ploughman together agree
That the farmer should never want company!
Derry down, &c.

Look round you—what treasure his riches unfold!
His granaries fill'd with those sheaves of bright gold!
His pens and his pastures all breathing with life,
And his home far away from all passion and strife!
Derry down, &c.

Then, a health to the Farmer who lives on the Land,
Made the best and the richest on Earth by his hand;
You may roam the wide world, but there's naught to be seen
That can rival the old English Farmer, I ween!

Derry down, down,
Down derry down!

This great agricultural gathering of farmers, farm implements, and anything, dead or alive, appertaining nearly or remotely to the culture of the soil, has for the last week been setting the pleasant town of Southampton in a mighty stir—diffusing, it is to be hoped, enlightenment and knowledge over the length and breadth of our agricultural districts, and certainly diffusing gold and silver at a very pleasant rate (for the recipients) among the pockets of the honest townfolk; in fact, teaching, literally, the man of the fields how to reap good harvests, and causing, metaphorically, the man of the town to do the same.

Trains and steam-boats—vapour by water, and vapour by land—have been pouring their thousands from every point of the compass upon the focus of Southampton, and the natural effect of the inordinate demand for the good things of this life consequently felt, naturally raised the price of those said articles to an equally high level.

The proceedings, as our readers may be aware, consist of an immense Show of Cattle and Agricultural Implements; meetings of Agricultural Societies during the day, and dinners of the same during the night. The ground chosen for the exhibition is at the village of Portswood, about two miles from Southampton. It is a sweet spot, surrounded by stately trees, from which here and there rise the handsome mansions of the resident gentry; one of which, that of Mr. Mott, upon whose grounds the exhibition took place, is accurately represented by our artist.

The general appearance of the show-ground may be easily described. Imagine, in the first place, a dusty road, bounded by magnificent trees, and covered with coaches, omnibuses, cabs, carts, and flies, everything in fact which ever went upon wheels, toiling their dusty way towards the scene of action; your approach to it is announced by a perfect street of booths, erected like the old Flemish House, with their gables towards the road: coloured lamps are suspended in most of them, intended, of course, to be very brilliant at night, and provisions of all kinds, good for the hungry and thirsty, are most invitingly exposed to view. Branching off the road, upon your left, and taking your way through irregular groups of canvass-constructed buildings, surrounded by groups of loungers, and tenanted by groups of merry-makers, you perceive the wooden walls—not of England—but of the Royal Agricultural Society's Show, extending before you. The ground enclosed forms a square. One-half of it is devoted to the implements, and the other to the live stock. The former occupies a space of about sixteen acres. Imagine this space—all enclosed in a square—divided into lines by long rows of open tents, stretching from one end of it to the other; and under these tents, ranges of implements of husbandry, of all shapes and sizes, simple and complex, intended for all manner of agricultural purposes; and each long line flanked by a double row of admiring and criticising victors, composed of well-dressed ladies and gentlemen, and stout burly farmers; and explained and exhibited by the inventors or their servants—call up all this before your mind's eye, and you will have some idea of the Implement department of the Show.

HARVEST HOME

THE CATTLE SHOW, PORTWOOD.

We now proceed to report the proceedings, on the respective days, Tuesday.

PUBLIC EXHIBITION OF THE WORKING OF THE IMPLEMENTS.

This was the most interesting portion of the day's proceedings, and attracted universal attention. The time fixed for the public trial of the agricultural implements to take place was twelve o'clock; but, for some hours previous to that time, the road leading from Southampton to the trial-ground was thronged, with vehicles of every description, conveying the interested and curious to the appointed place, distant about four miles from Southampton, on the farm of Mr. C. Cater, at Swathling. Many thousand persons were on the ground, consisting of the agriculturists of Hampshire, and the adjoining counties, as well as of numbers from the extreme western counties. The Queen, Brunswick, and two other steamers, arrived in the morning from Plymouth and Cornwall, full of passengers. All the steamers from the Isle of Wight were also full, notwithstanding many persons were prevented from coming in consequence of the rain. Among the parties on the ground we noticed most of the noblemen and gentlemen, and the landed proprietors of the county. The test trials, to determine the merits of the several implements, took place on Friday and Saturday, but were strictly private, the public not being allowed to approach nearer than the outside of the fields in which the implements were tried. These trials were conducted with great care and fairness: even the exhibitors of the various implements were confined to the attendance upon their own implements, and were not allowed to inspect the working of the others.

The judges were Mr. Outhwaite, of Catbrich, Yorkshire, and another gentleman, who conducted the proceedings most impartially, and in a manner which gave general satisfaction. The implements selected for the public exhibition of their working were those previously selected for competition before the judges in the private trials, which had occupied the two previous days; those adapted for light land at Mr. Cater's farm, at Swathling, and those adapted for heavy land, at Mr. Spooner's, at Eling. The field selected for the public trial to-day is a level one, of considerable extent, adjoining the railway, and is a clover ley. The ground was put in good order for working in consequence of its being unusually hard from the long drought. Precisely at twelve o'clock, the ploughing match commenced.

There were sixteen ploughs started, among which were two specimens of American ploughs, presented by Professor Col. The contrast between the working of these transatlantic ploughs and the English ones was most striking, and was the most perfect practical refutation of the self-congratulatory remarks of those who, on their return from England, stated that they had not seen any implement in England worthy of comparison with those of America. We particularly examined the work of these ploughs, and compared with the best and accurate furrows made by the English ploughs, which appeared as though cut out by a plane, they were coarse, rough, and irregular. The work of the competing ploughs, with the two exceptions we have alluded to, was generally good; especially so, considering the state of the soil. One of the ploughs was a new implement, made by Messrs. F., R., and A. Ransome, of Ipswich; it has a very convenient movable nose-piece, which adjusts the pitch of the share, either to take more or less hold of the ground, or laterally to give it an inclination more or less toward the land. This plough won the prize of a 10 and a silver medal in competing with the others, as a heavy land plough; and was the prize of £10 and a silver medal, in its competition on the light land. Another of the ploughs was a new implement, by the same exhibitors, the peculiar feature of which is that the mould-board of this plough is adapted for turning furrows of 4 inches deep, and 9 inches wide, so as to leave the angle of the furrow slice precisely at 45 degrees.

There was another and a strong plough by the same exhibitors, fitted for deep ploughing in tenacious land.

Mr. Lowcock's patent plough for laying furrows all in one direction, and which was awarded a prize of five pounds, was another of the competitors. The peculiar advantage in Lowcock's patent plough is that its construction admits of turning and laying the furrows all at the same angle, and in the same direction, to the right or left alternately, as it passes up or down the field; thus combining the properties of the turn-rest plough with the advantage of retaining the curved form of mould-board, as used on the most approved single ploughs.

An iron two-wheel pulverizing plough, invented by William Mason, constructed for a light soil, with the mould-board made to set wider or narrower as required, and pulverizing knives attached for breaking up old pastures, strong soil or land that requires harrowing and bringing to a fine tilth, was one of the ploughs tried; and the remaining others were—

A one-wheel or swing plough, by Messrs. Tasker and Fowler, of Waterloo Iron Works, Andover, which may be used with or without the skin coulter.

As iron swing-plough, by the Earl of Darby, which obtained a prize of five pounds at the Royal Agricultural Society's meeting at Bristol.

A two-wheel wrought iron plough, with patent coulter, by Messrs. Sanders, Williams, and Taylor, of Biddford, which is fitted for wheat or swing plough, and is worked by two or four horses.

A one-wheel plough, by Mr. Hugh Carson, of Warminster, suited for light soil.

A patent iron plough, for sand and other light land. It is made of iron, principally wrought. The peculiarities consist in the very taper and regular curve of the cutting and moving parts, i. e., the share and furrow-turner, to which parts the inventors have paid great attention, not only with a view to reduce the draught, but to make it suitable to as great a variety of soil as possible. Every part of this plough is so arranged, that a common ploughman may take it to pieces, and put it together, without the assistance of a mechanic. It can be worked either with or without wheels, or with one wheel, as required. It has a broad share to fit it for paring turf and stubbles.

An iron plough, trussed beam, and steel breast, invented by Ransome, and manufactured by Messrs. Sims and Brown, of Tolland Royal, Dorsetshire.

A one-wheel plough, invented by the exhibitors, Messrs. Barratt, Exhall, and Andrews, of Reading, which is fitted with an open turn-furrow for ploughing leamy and other adhesive soils, as it breaks the lower part of the furrow, and thus admits the air. The plough is extremely light, and has very great ease of draught.

Immediately after the termination of the ploughing match, the other implements, consisting of drills, harrows, clod crushers, and numerous other articles, were tried in an adjoining field, all of which seemed to excite general interest.

Throughout the day, the trains continued to bring in a great number of cattle for the show on Thursday.

WEDNESDAY.

The great point of attraction was

THE COUNCIL DINNER.

About 400 noblemen and gentlemen sat down to this dinner, which was held at the Victoria Archery and Assembly-rooms. Earl Spencer, the president of the Society, was in the chair, and the Vice-Chairman was the Earl of Hardwicke. Among the company present, we noticed the Duke of Richmond, Marquis of Downshire, Lord Ashburton, Earl of Egmont, Lord Sandon, Earl Ducie, Lord Chichester, Lord Fortescue, Lord Lilford, Earl Somers, Earl of Essex, Lord Camoys, Mr. J. T. Hope, M.P., Lord Scarborough, Mr. Handley, Sir Charles Lemon, Lord Hatherton, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, M.P., Mr. Hayter, M.P., Mr. Y. B. Shelley, Mr. B. W. Blanco, Hon. Mr. A. Court Holmes, M.P., Right Hon. W. Sturgis Bourne, Mr. Escott, M.P., Mr. Pusey, M.P., Sir Charles Burrell, M.P., Sir Charles Price, Mr. G. A. Coathope, Mr. Sotherton, M.P., Sir Charles Morgan, Col. Challoner, Mr. Bramston, M.P., Col. Henderson (Mayor of Southampton), Capt. Ward, R.N., Lord De Lisle, Mr. Napier, of Meath, the Duke of Leinster, Mr. Stephen Mills, Sir John Ogilvie, Mr. Hillyer, Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, &c.

After the conclusion of the dinner, which was admirably served, by Messrs. Bathe and Branch, of the London Tavern,

The noble chairman proposed the health of her Majesty the Queen, and he was sure that all present would heartily unite in drinking her health, placed as she was in her present interesting position. (Cheers.)

He next gave the "Queen Dowager, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family." (Cheers.)

Lord Ashburton then proposed "the health of the Scientific Gen-

Mr. C. W. Robin, of St. Helier, Jersey, the owner of the best cow in milk, 15 sovs.

No stock shown for the best in-calf heifer not exceeding two years old.

Mr. John Hume, of St. Helier, Jersey, the owner of the best yearling heifer, 7 sovs.

The judges highly commended Col. Le Comte's 1 year and 5 months old bull, also Mr. W. B. Gater's 2 years old bull, and Mr. John Hume's 4 years Jersey cow.

CATTLE OF ANY BREED OR CROP NOT QUALIFIED TO COMPETE IN THE FOREGOING CLASSES.

Judges—Messrs. Hall, Smith, and Palfrey.

Mr. W. Brine, of Tisbury, near Dorchester, the owner of the best bull calved previously to the 1st of January, 1843, 30 sovs.

Mr. Thomas Jenner, of Cowdray Park Farm, Petworth, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

Mr. Thomas Dowson, of Mitchell, Andover-road, the owner of the best bull calved since the 1st of January, 1843, and more than one year old, 20 sovs.

Rev. Mr. W. Nugent, the owner of the best cow in milk, 15 sovs.

Rev. Mr. W. Nugent, the owner of the best in-calf heifer not exceeding three years old, 15 sovs.

Mr. W. J. Cahoon, of Bendor, near Chichester, the owner of the best yearling heifer, 10 sovs.

The judges commended Mr. John Allport's 1-year-old short-horn and Devon cross bull; also the Duke of Buckingham's 3-years-old long-horned heifer.

SHEEP.

Judges—Messrs. Metcalf, Bacon, and Major Brown.

Mr. J. G. Watkins, of Woodfield, Umberley, Stourport, the owner of the best shearing ram, 30 sovs.

Mr. T. E. Pawlett, of Bepton, Beds, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

Mr. T. E. Pawlett, the owner of the best ram of any other age, 30 sovs.

Mr. T. E. Pawlett, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

Mr. John C. Watkins, of Woodfield, the owner of the best pen of five shearing ewes, 10 sovs.

Mr. John Beasley, of Chapel Brampton, near Northampton, the owner of the second best ditto, 5 sovs.

LONG WOOLLED SHEEP.

NOT QUALIFIED TO COMPETE AS LEICESTERS.

Judges—Messrs. Gillett, Elliott, and Elliott.

Mr. Charles Large, of Burford, Oxfordshire, the owner of the best shearing ram, 30 sovs.

Mr. Charles Large, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

Mr. Edward Handy, of Sevenhampton, Gloucestershire, the owner of the best ram of any other age, 30 sovs.

Mr. E. Smith, of Charlbury, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

SHORT WOOLLED SHEEP.

NOT QUALIFIED TO COMPETE AS SOUTH DOWNS.

Judges—Messrs. Chapman, Harris, and Morris.

No award to the owner of the best shearing ram.

Mr. Thomas Hutton, of Odilham, Hants, the owner of the best ram of any other age, 30 sovs.

Mr. W. Humphrey, of Chaddisworth, Newbury, the owner of the best pen of five shearing ewes, 10 sovs.

SOUTH DOWNS SHEEP.

Judges—Messrs. Weall, Emery, and the Hon. W. Gage.

Mr. James Webb, of Cambridge, the owner of the best shearing ram, 30 sovs.

The Duke of Richmond, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

Mr. James Heaven, Market Lavington, the owner of the best ram of any other age, 30 sovs.

Mr. Grantham, of Stoneham, near Lewes, the owner of the second best ditto, 15 sovs.

The Duke of Richmond, the owner of the best pen of five shearing ewes, 10 sovs.

Mr. David Barclay, M.P., the owner of the second best ditto, 5 sovs.

PIGS.

Judges—Messrs. Farncombe, Kemp, and Wiley.

Lieut.-Col. Thompson, of Lyndhurst, Hants, the owner of the best boar of a large breed, 10 sovs.

Mr. Pusey, M.P., the owner of the second best ditto, 5 sovs.

Mr. W. F. Hobbs, of Marshfield, the owner of the best boar of a small breed, 10 sovs.

Mr. F. M. Goodlake, the owner of the second best ditto, 5 sovs.

Mr. Pusey, M.P., the owner of the best breeding sow of a large breed, 10 sovs.

Mr. A. F. Falconer, of Christchurch, the owner of a small breed, 10 sovs.

Mr. J. House, of Wareham, Dorset, the owner of the best pen of three breeding sow pigs of the same litter, above 4 and under 9 months old, 10 sovs.

The judges highly commended Mr. Hobbs's Essex boar and his Essex sows. They also commended class 2 generally.

In the short-wooled sheep, the judges commended Mr. John Pope's old Dorset boar, 31 months old each; also, Mr. James Rawlinson's two rams, of 30 and 40 months old; and, Mr. Thomas Goodwin's and Mr. John Pope's Hampshire Down ewes.

In the Extra Stock, the judges awarded £10 to Mr. Charles Large, for his 4 years old Oxfordshire ewe; £7 to Mr. M. Goodall, for his 3 year old cow of the India and French cross; £2 to Mr. George Drake and £1 to ditto; £4 to Mr. T. B. Northall, for his South Down ewe, and £2 to ditto, and £4 to Mr. W. Sambury, for pigs £2 to Mr. Hobbs, £2 to ditto, and £2 to ditto, and £1 to Mr. Cahoon.

The "pleasuring" may be said to have commenced on this day, by all those who were determined to make the whole affair "a night's" on which the Times has this very neat piece of home philosophy:—

There are bulls and cows, and public dinners, for the supporters of agriculture, and a theatre, and even Van Amburgh and his lion; and it is astonishing how interested people are to see, when collected together on an occasion of the sort, things which, taken singly, they would neglect and despise. A very small portion of this bustle is to be attributed to the direct, though all to the indirect, fascination of the antiscience cattle. To see them, to meditate deeply, steadily, with heads on hips—upon their several propensities, their oleaginous development, and their "breed," is of course the great attraction of the agriculturists. They come to see the fat bullock, the "company" come to see the agriculturists and the other "right," and then, as so many elements not naturally associated—bulls, cows, farmers, lords, ladies, shopkeepers, lions, fiddlers, and showmen—is a very gay, giddy, extensive, motley multitude brought together, all agreeing in the one great object of killing time for a week, and affording each other amusement by seeing and being seen.

In the morning, the Duke of Cambridge arrived by a special train. His Royal Highness breakfasted with the Mayor, and then proceeded to inspect the Implement-yard, which the duke was permitted to enter, contrary to the society's strict rule.

THURSDAY.

This has indeed been a grand day for Southampton, and never before was the town and its suburbs so thronged. Not less than from 25,000 to 30,000 strangers must have arrived in the course of the day, in addition to the number of persons previously here. At a very early hour in the morning, steamers from the Isle of Wight, Dorsetshire, Portsmouth, the Channel Islands, and the whole western and southern coast, made their appearance in Southampton water, their decks and cabins laden with passengers. Coaches, carts, gigs, country wagons filled with farmers and their labourers, poured in, and literally blocked up the streets and roads. Indeed, the whole line of road from Southampton to the Show yards at Portwood, nearly two miles in length, was a continuous stream of vehicles and pedestrians, as crowded as the Strand at noon, through which, as Dr. Johnson remarked, "the full tide of human existence pours its mighty volume." In addition to this, the railway trains were continually arriving, twelve extra having been put on. A considerable number of people assembled round the station to witness the anticipated arrival of Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington, both of whom, it appears, the good folks here had made up their minds to see, though, under existing circumstances, there was but little probability that the Prince could leave Windsor or the Duke London.

The weather was favourable, and light fleecy clouds tempered the intense heat which has prevailed for the last two days.

Towards four o'clock, the leading agriculturists visited the Show-yard for the Pavilion-dinner, but the ground, in consequence of the price of admission being, according to custom, reduced in the afternoon, was still more thronged than in the morning. On the whole the exhibition was most satisfactory, and afforded the highest gratification to the numerous visitors.

We now come to a more detailed description of which formed the chief attraction in this day's proceedings. The Show-yard, for the exhibition of the cattle, as well as the Implement-yard, was thrown open to the public at an early hour this morning. The whole Show covers fifteen acres of ground, and is divided into three compartments. The first, appropriated for the stock, contained twenty sheds, each 252 yards long; some of the sheds were subdivided, to meet the various wants of the respective animals they were intended to receive. For instance, the sheds for the reception of brood mares were closely boarded and separated from the others; those for the stallions and bulls were of greater strength than the others. The boxes were in pairs of double iron hurdles.

The second compartment formed the Implement-yard, and contained nine sheds, each 252 yards in length. The third compartment, which was the smallest, was appropriated for the preliminary and private trials of the implements previously to their being sent to the official grounds. It was here that the steam-engines were tried, and their utility tested in setting in motion the numerous agricultural implements—such as the threshing, winnowing, chaff-cutting, and other machines. The Cattle-yard, which, previously to the judges' awards, had been kept strictly private, so much so, that Lord Spencer found it necessary to apologise last night at the Council-dinner, for breaking through the regulations by taking his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge to inspect it, was this day thrown open by completely removing the closely boarded barrier, nearly 600 feet in length, and thus forming the Cattle and Implement-yard into one. The coup d'oeil upon entering was remarkably striking, and appeared to engage the attention of numerous thousands who visited the scene.

At the extreme end of the Implement-yard there was one of Manning's portable wooden cottages, which had a picturesque effect. It was placed there for the location of the workmen and foremen in charge of the yard. The arrangements were most complete, and carried out with great strictness. A door was specially appointed for the entrance of the members of the council and the exhibitors, so as not to interfere with the entrances appropriated to the public. So strictly was this entrance kept, that his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was even detained some minutes before he was admitted, although he was attended by several members of the council. The plan of the show yards was arranged by Mr. B. Gibbs, and the sheds and other buildings were erected by Mr. Manning.

The stock exhibited this year was superior in several instances to that exhibited at most of the previous meetings. A new class was introduced here, to which prizes were awarded, of cattle of the Channel Island breed, among which were several very good specimens. The two years and four months old bull, belonging to Mr. W. J. Phillips, of Eling Vicarage, Southampton, which gained the first prize yesterday, was very much admired. The awards for the best horses, which were not read by Lord Spencer at the dinner yesterday, were as follows:—

FOR THE BEST STALLIONS FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES.

First prize, £20, to Mr. Thomas Gellin, of Baitley Woodbridge, Suffolk, for a cart stallion, four years old, bred by himself.

Second prize, £10, to the Earl St. Germaine, for an aged cart stallion.

FOR TWO YEAR OLD CART STALLIONS.

A prize of £15 to Lord St. John, for a cart stallion two years and two weeks old.

FOR CART MARES AND FOALS.

First prize, £20, to Mr. W. Powie, of Market Lavington, Devizes, Wilts, for a cart mare and foal; size of foal belonged to Mr. Tugs, of Postlewood, Hants.

Second prize, £10, to Mr. G. W. Roberts, of King's Walden, Hitchin, Herts, for a cart mare and foal; mare bred by himself; size of foal belonged to Mr. Hayden, of Arington, Cambridgeshire.

FOR TWO YEAR OLD FILLIES.

A prize of £10 to Mr. W. Powie, of Market Lavington, for a two year old filly, bred by Mr. R. Dainton, of Hemmingford Abbots, near St. Ives, Hants.

FOR THOROUGHBRED STALLIONS.

A prize of £30 to Mr. R. Curtis, of Basingstoke, for a thoroughbred stallion, five years old, by Langar, dam by Cervantes, out of Marsena, by Selim.

A black thoroughbred stallion, 4 years old, got by Shark Anchor out of Valencia, belonging to the Duke of Richmond, and bred by Lord George Bentinck, attracted considerable attention from its symmetry and beauty.

Among the Short Horns a bull of 2 years and 10 months old, belonging to Mr. Hayer, M.P., and which gained a prize of 15 sovs., attracted considerable attention, as well as one of the property of Mr. Maw, of Tetley, Lincolnshire. Mr. Maw's bull was perfectly white, a short-horned milk cow, belonging to Mr. John Booth of Kildrilly, Yorkshire, and several others in this class belonging to Messrs. Carter, Atkins, and the Duke of Buccleuch, were beautiful specimens of the class. Mr. Carpenter's, of Leominster, Hereford bull, which gained a prize of 20 sovs., was one of the finest specimens of the class. The bull belonging to Mr. Turner, which gained the first prize of 30 sovereigns yesterday, together with the bulls of the breed exhibited by Lord Portman, Mr. T. Harcomb, and Mr. Knollys, as also a milk cow and an in-calf heifer, both belonging to Mr. G. Turner, and which both gained prizes, were admirable specimens of the Devon breed. Some of them were most beautifully proportioned. One of the ewes in milk, of this class, had a remarkably beautiful calf by her side. The sheep occupied nearly four sheds. Among the rams of the Leicester breed were several very fine ones, with great broad flat backs. Among the long wools there was a very fine new Oxfordshire ram, which obtained the first prize of £20, and which is estimated at the value of £200. The extra stock occupied 30 pens. The hogs occupied only one division, and were not very numerous; although there were many among them superior to any that have previously attended these shows. There were several very fine bears, both of the large and small breed, among which there was a white one, belonging to Mr. Goodlake, which weighed 16 sovs., and an improved Essex one, only sixteen months old, weighing nearly 25 sovs.

THE DINNER AT THE PAVILION.

At four o'clock a public dinner took place at the Pavilion, specially erected for the occasion, and which is placed in a very convenient part of the town, the Fairfield. The Pavilion is similarly constructed to those that have been erected at the former meetings, when held at Derby, Bristol, Cambridge, &c. It is, however, not so large this year, as it is built only to accommodate 200 persons, whereas the previous ones were much larger, and capable of containing upwards of double that number. The ladies' gallery is constructed to contain 200. The high table at which the chairman, Lord Spencer, was placed, was capable of holding 36 persons, among whom were most of the nobility who attended the Council-dinner, with a few additions who only arrived in Southampton this morning. The vice-chair was taken by the Duke of Richmond. The table appropriated for the Vice-chairman and his supporters was also a raised one, all the others were on a level, whereas at previous meetings they were placed upon an inclined plane arising from a centre level area, and forming a perfect amphitheatre; we do not think the alteration this year an improvement. The whole of the arrangements of this dinner, as well as those of the Council-dinner yesterday, which gave so much satisfaction, were under the arrangement of Colonel Chillonier. About 1200 persons sat down to the dinner, that being the number of tickets issued, although the applications for them far exceeded that number. The dinner was a cold one, and was supplied by Mr. Fricker, of the Star Hotel, and like the one yesterday was well arranged.

MEETING FOR THE PURPOSE OF ESTABLISHING AN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

A public meeting for the above purpose was held at the Freemasons' Hall, at two o'clock. The attendance was not very numerous, which, indeed, could not be expected, as most of the agricultural victors were engaged at the Implement-yard. What, however, the meeting lacked in point of numbers was made up by the great respectability of the parties present, among whom were the Duke of Richmond, Lord Dugby, Mr. Pusey, M.P., Mr. Escott, M.P. (Oxford), Professor Playfair, Mr. Goddard, Dr. Buckland, Dr. Daubeny, &c., &c.

The chair was taken by Mr. Pusey, who briefly stated the object of the meeting, and pointed out the advantage that would accrue to the agriculturists from the establishing such a college. The project had been taken up by many of the leading agriculturists not only in the immediate district in which it was intended to establish the college, but in other and distant counties. Lord Bathurst had, in addition to providing a suitable farm of 400 acres, on which the college and other buildings were to be erected, advanced two thousand pounds in furtherance of the object. (Cheers.)

The Duke of Richmond, in proposing the first resolution, said that he appeared before them, not as a member of the Royal Agricultural Association, for the rules of that society precluded the members from interfering in any thing but the immediate object for which they periodically met; but he stood before them as a country gentleman anxious to promote an object so laudable and so beneficial to the agriculturists of the kingdom. (Cheers.) They all must regret that their early education had not given them the advantage of the knowledge of chemistry as practically adapted to agricultural purposes. He had declined to take shares in that society upon the principle that every shareholder should have time to attend to the details of the society to which he put his name, so that by so doing he might not mislead others to add their names upon the faith of seeing his name, and thereby supposing he would attend to its practical operations. He would avoid that evil, as he was aware that his many other avocations would prevent him from giving sufficient attention to the details. He, however, so highly approved of the society, that although he could not become a subscriber, for the reason he had stated, yet he most gladly gave a donation to promote its establishment. (Hear, hear.) He would not have the committee too sanguine of making any profit from the farm. He was a farmer himself, and he was aware that farming was not so prosperous as most other pursuits. He was of opinion that schools of agriculture were much wanted in the country.

Mr. Escott proposed the second resolution, and said that he gladly availed himself of joining a meeting that had so important an object in view. He, in common with many other persons, had long deplored the want of a proper establishment for the education of the agricultural population in pursuits adapted to their after life. A most important fact was developed and published by the agriculturists themselves, as the wish to establish a college originated from a farmers' club (cheers). The object of the meeting had his most cordial support.

The next resolution was to have been proposed by Lord Spencer, but the Duke of Richmond explained to the meeting that that nobleman was unavoidably absent, in consequence of being in attendance on his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who was inspecting the show yard.

The Duke of Richmond proposed, and Dr. Daubeny seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Pusey, for the service he had rendered to the agriculturists generally, and for his conduct in the chair.

Mr. Pusey briefly replied, and contemplated the meeting upon the object they had in contemplation being fully carried out, when they saw the noblemen present, and the member for the University of Oxford, as well as two of its distinguished professors, come forward to take them by the hand.

FRIDAY.

A general meeting of the society was held this morning at the Victoria Rooms, at which the President elect the Duke of Richmond, was inducted into office. The Marquis of Downshire, in proposing a vote of thanks to the retiring President, Earl Spencer, spoke in the most flattering terms of that nobleman's exertions, not only during the period of his office, but at all times, to promote the interests of the society, and of the agriculturists generally.

At the next annual meeting, which is to take place at Shrewsbury, in addition to the prizes given this year to the various classes of cattle, prizes will be given to the owners of sheep best adapted to a mountain district. Prizes will also be given for the best essays on various subjects connected with agriculture.

There was a ball last night (according to custom), which took place at the Victoria Rooms, and very fully attended—upwards of 400 persons being present.

This morning the show yard was again visited by many thousand persons, many of them attending for the purpose of purchasing some of the stock intended for sale. A great portion of the stock, brought only for exhibiting, and not intended for sale, was removed from the ground, and sent off by special trains from the temporary station made for the occasion at Portwood.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

On Thursday evening last Madame Fanny Essler took her benefit at this house. The entertainments commenced with Rossini's chef d'œuvre "La Gazza Ladra," with as fine a cast as the composer himself could possibly wish for. Gelsi was Nicetto; Mario, Glaniello; Fontana, Fernando; Favanti, Pippo; and though last, not least, Lablache, as the Pedroli. We have so often spoken of the beauties of this opera that it is needless to say more at present than that it never was more splendidly performed. The scene in which Nicetto reads the letter to the old Pedroli, was a complication of different interests. The fear of the father—the anxiety of the daughter,—and the managerial authority of the Pedroli, were most exquisitely portrayed. The trio or canon, "O Name benefice" was deservedly encored, perhaps it was never before so beautifully executed. This was decidedly the gem of the opera, although every scene was most exquisitely given.

In the ballet department the fair Servicieux distinguished herself more than a Ferdinand. It was quite delightful to witness (maugre the intense heat) the contrast between her and Cerito; or rather the union of two opposite kinds of grace. The house was crowded to excess by the first of nobility and fashion. We were delighted to hear from an authoritative Amateur of the opera, that early next season we shall be treated with a new opera by the "Swan of Padua"—the great Rossini!

NATIONAL SPORTS.

To those who have little else to make their hearts glad—God help them!—save summer and fair weather, July has set in one complete and joyous holiday. A gorgeous month it has been thus far; and it must be said goodly and grateful use has been made of it by those who most need rest for head and hand. A right pleasant sight it is to see the tens of thousands that daily go forth rejoicing on the bright, broad river—than which a prouder or a fairer never bore golden galleys or silken streamers. And beneath oak and plane, and sycamore—supper in the cool shade, or scattered over the emerald turf of courtly Hampton or Richmond, "the shaven" who may look upon the groups of trim adults, and jaunty youths, and maidens who thus make labour light and toll grateful, without seeing all the patriot in his soul, and his spirit rejoicing that he too is an Englishman! These are national sports, albeit of a class apart from woodcraft or exercises of skill or agility: these are the sports which have made comfort a word peculiar to our language, and borne an instinct of surdivoyance.

In the stirring business of the Course the week has been a blank; a pause being necessary to give effect—in every sense of the word—to Goodwood after the three glorious days at Liverpool. But the interest of the racing world has not been permitted to flag. The rumour of foul play on the late Derby has assumed a palpable form, and there is little doubt but that Balaun was made, or "served," as his late owner professionally expressed it in some of his last words. The deed of darkness is attributed to one of those gentlemen who make betting a pursuit. These are the agents without which, we are told, the turf could not exist! They might as well insist, that, unless there were sharks in the sea, there would be no white bait at Greenwich or Blackwall. What will become of the gentleman should the winding be brought home to him it is hard to say. Giving beans to a racer is not probably a misdeed according to the statute—at all events the Thames is not so far from the subscription room—not above a shilling cab-fare; and what good a little bathing would do him his warm weather after his warm work! One cannot but see the principle of penetration in the racing robes; that are now becoming identified with the news of the day, like the ordinary police reports, as commentaries on the residence offered to Parliament of the immoderate character of the turf and its profits.

The amateur of "river sports" as the amphibious regattas carried on between Wapping and Battersea are called, have been up and at it for these last four or five days. At Barking there was some good rowing on Monday—accompanied, however, by one of the most melancholy catastrophes of the season, caused by the breaking down of a rotten scumboat near, at Blackfriars-bridge. Myself, I regret several persons were drowned, whose bodies have been recovered, and it is feared many others. But unless some precautions of another nature are taken, worse remains behind. Hiding races with skiffs in the pool, through which countless steamers are at the same time carrying like chosen instruments of destruction is a sheer temptation of fate. None of these days we shall read of a whole regatta being chopp'd into mince meat; of a crew losing their heads as well as their souls; of an excursion begun in a "funny" terminating very differently. There was also a regatta at St. John's, Westminster, and a prize oar-wager match by the Royal Academy Club—won gallantly by Messrs. Atkinson and Robinson—as also rowing at Poplar, Blackwall, and other head-quarters of river water craft. The day before yesterday, also, the Royal Thames Yacht Club sailed their last match of the season, which we shall hereafter allude to—reverting for the present to its preceding match, which came off a fortnight ago. This was for a cup given by Captain Cockburn. It was Tom Sheridan (or somebody else) who said a consent would be a capital thing only for the music; as symphonies to orchestrate the regatta to yacht clubs. The Royal Squadron owes all its disorders to its race; the H. T. Y. C. is fast going to glory. As a meeting of the latter society is called for Monday next, especially to consider the matter of the Cockbridge dispute, we will not enter upon the merits or demerits of it, save to show the spirit of this case of legions. A member writes to a sporting paper on the matter, and thus concludes his letter:—"If an investigation be not entered upon without delay, I, for one, shall take up arms from the club, an example, I hear from others, that will be followed by scores of greater weight."

Now, if the member, by the rules of the club, to which he subscribes on entering the society, was entitled to call for an investigation, he could do so of his right; and the threat of "taking his name from the club" was unnecessary. If he was not so entitled, and held it out as a menace, he has given as grave cause of offence as could be offered to a company of gentlemen. We look with interest to the result as deeply concerning the position and character of the Metropolitan Yacht Club.

TATTERBALL'S.
Monday.—The large amount of the deficiencies on the Derby, and the slight prospect held out of even a partial settlement of them, continues to operate as a powerful to "excessive gaming" in the shape of betting, and will inevitably have a pernicious influence on book-making as a system—that it will stop it altogether, notwithstanding all that has been, or may be said and written against it, no one believes for a moment—these always will be backers of public horses, and always plenty to lay against them. Of the business transacted this afternoon little need be said; it was confined to some tolerably heavy investments on Franchise, Croton Oil, The Era, and Pride of Kidder, for the G. d. wood Stakes, and on Ethelred and The Curd for the St. Leger. For the latter race the Ugly Duck, who does not run at Goodwood, and The Princess, said to be in foal, are on the decline.

Bankside Regatta.—The twenty-sixth annual regatta for a new boat, and some excellent minor prizes liberally subscribed by the residents of the Clink Liberty, Southwark, to the watermen who had never before won a boat at Bankside, came off on Monday, and was well contested. The two first men of each of the two preceding heats swam in the last. Bash after a dozen strokes took the lead, closely followed by Kelly, when on rounding the five-point, Kelly took the first place, and maintained it throughout, Bush proving him very closely, and making a capital race. Knight was third, eight lengths astern of the second man.

St. John's, Westminster, Regatta.—The race was in three heats, with sixteen free watermen, comprising those who ply at the Horsley and at the Middlesex side of Vauxhall bridge; the distance contested in each heat being from house off the Horsley, up round a boat off Mile's, Thamesbank, down round a boat off the new Houses of Parliament, and back to the Horsley. The winner took the lead, and kept it decidedly after the first start, coming in first by some lengths. The race was respectably conducted throughout, and was won by Royal and Gardner after a well contested struggle.

Cricket.—MARTLEBORO CLUB AND GROVED WITH WENMAN V. SUSSEX.—This match was commenced at Lord's on Monday, and brought to a conclusion on Wednesday afternoon, in the presence of a highly fashionable and numerous assemblage. The score of the match was thus:—Sussex, 154; Martleboro, 92. At the annual meeting of the Jockey Club, notice was given that at the next meeting of the Jockey Club, a resolution would be made to the effect that no person who is a defender for bets shall be allowed to run a horse at Newmarket, either in his own name or in the name of any other person.

The Bentineck Testimonial.—The subscriptions amount to nearly £1500.

Grand National Archery Prize.—Complete arrangements have been made for the grand national archery prize, which is to come off at Knebworth, near the city of York, on Thursday, August 1. £125 will be laid out in prizes. No competitor will be allowed to take more than one prize. A grand stand will be erected on the ground, and every facility will be afforded to visitors to witness the sports of the day. A most interesting match may be anticipated.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Movements of the French Navy. Extract of a letter received at Lloyd's from their agent at Gibraltar, dated the 14th of July:—
 "The French Government steamer Piston, with Mr. Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville, arrived at this port from Oran on the night of the 5th inst.; she steamed for Tangier the following morning, and returned to the anchorage on the same evening."

"The French line-of-battle ship (of the first class) the Suffren, the Jenneppe, and the Troton, and the frigate Belle Poule, which were in Algiers roadstead, have this day sailed for the westward, said to be bound for Cadix to await the issue of the negotiations now pending with the Emperor of Morocco."

Extract from the Gibraltar Chronicle of the 19th of July:—
 "A frigate, signalled three leagues distant to the eastward this morning, did not show her colours until her Majesty's ship Warspite fired a gun and hoisted the demand as she passed Europa Point to the west, when she showed French colours. Her decks were crowded with people."

The sentence of the court martial on First Lieutenant Louis, Royal Marine, Woolwich Division, for leaving his guard at the Victroling-yard, Deptford, without due authority, and for being absent therefrom when the fire took place on board the freight ship Medea, on the 9th inst., was, that Lieutenant Louis be cashiered; but in consequence of certain mitigatory circumstances which appeared in evidence, and the high testimony borne to his character by his commanding officer, Colonel Parks, C. B., Commandant of the Woolwich division, Lieutenant Louis was recommended to her Majesty's favourable consideration, who, exercising her clemency, though fully approving the sentence of the court, has been pleased to order that Lieutenant Louis be permitted to return to his duty.

COUNTRY NEWS.

We regret to learn, that on Monday Stanningham church was struck by lightning and seriously damaged. —Stamford Independent.

Balloon Ascent.—On Monday, Mr. Hampson ascended in a new and splendid balloon from Vauxhall gardens, Birmingham. A fine ascent was never witnessed: the weather was calm, and the evening truly delightful. The balloon having attained an altitude of more than two miles, Mr. Hampson descended at Starchill near Wolverhampton. As it involves several novel points of construction, we shall engrave the new machine in our next paper.

On Wednesday morning an incendiary fire took place at the extensive home-stand of Mr. W. D. Green, of Greenstead-hall, Colchester. The fire originated with a large stack of old hay, and the flames soon communicated with two other hay-stacks (altogether containing between 80 and 90 tons), to a large bean stack, the produce of 20 acres, and a straw stack of about 140 tons. From them the flames spread with the greatest rapidity to a very large barn and stables, which were destroyed. The damage is estimated at £2500. A mob collected, some of whom smashed the windows and plundered the dwelling house; they also broke open the closets, from which they extracted Mr. Green's watch, and a portion of his plate, and from the wire-closets they took a quantity of wine, from the effects of which a number of them were seen rolling about the premises in a state of intoxication.

Incendiary Fire.—Thursday evening week, a fire broke out in a stable upon New Hall Farm, Maudon, in the occupation of Mr. Francis Bakley, but timely assistance being rendered, very little damage fortunately was sustained. From the prevaricating manner of the servant girl, Mary Ann Fitman, she was taken into custody, and has since confessed she is the guilty party, having, with a lighted paper from the kitchen, set fire to some hay which was in the rack in the stable. —Essex Standard.

MURDER NEAR STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.—Great excitement has been caused in Stratford-upon-Avon by a report of the discovery of a monster committed more than eighteen months ago, at Binton-bridge, near Stratford. Thomas Knight, one of the parties concerned, has made a voluntary confession; from which it appears, that three men, named Thomas Carless, Radenham, and "Sam," had been drinking at a public-house, when a Jew pedlar was present. On the Jew leaving the house they followed him to the bridge, knelt down, and took away his box. He cried out, and offered them £3 to spare his life, but they beat him until he was insensible; and then, having torn away a large stone from the bridge, they tied it with a pitch rope round his body, and threw him into the deep water.

SPREAD OF INCENDIARISM.—The Suffolk correspondent of the Morning Chronicle states that there have been no less than two incendiary fires in that county within eight days, dating from Sunday at midnight of the 16th of July, to Monday, the 22nd of July. A man named Clowe has been committed on the charge of being concerned in one of them. The Bishop of Ely has addressed a circular letter to the clergy of the Archdiocese of Sudbury, in which he states that the amount of these fires in Suffolk are so alarming, that he feels it to be his duty to call the attention of the clergy of his diocese in that county to this distressing state of things, and to advise them to take such steps in their respective parishes as they shall deem necessary for explaining to their flocks the great wickedness of those who are either directly or indirectly concerned in such unlawful proceedings.

A GAME OF CHESS.

A friendly chess party, the result of a challenge in the Illustrated London News, played between Mr. G. O. O.—, Liverpool, and Mr. J. W. P.—, a member of the Pottery Chess Club; commenced January 15, 1844, and concluded July 12, 1844.

(1) A novel, but injudicious mode of opening the game, as it prevents the K K from being moved to R 2nd, which is generally the strongest position for it in the opening.
 (2) A weak move, setting up a premature attack, and giving White an opportunity of weakening his position.
 (3) Better cover with Q R.
 (4) White's second and third moves give Black this opportunity of breaking up the position of three pawns, which should have presented a shelter for the K on his castling.
 (5) This appears to have been moved to prevent White from pinning K with Q R; and then addressing K P to it; but would not the sacrifice of his K for K P, followed by checking with Q K R 2nd, have opened up a good attack for Black?
 (6) Q K R 2nd would, in shape, have been answer.
 (7) White has abandoned a position which might have enabled him to set up a strong attack. By doubling his rooks on the Q file, he is exposed to Q, and pushing on Q K R, instead of this retreating, he might have pushed on Q R.
 (8) Was a queen, and placed his K in what will be found to be a strong position.
 (9) By moving the offered rook, and pushing Q to a corner from whence she has no retreat, White allows his opponent to write from him another pawn.
 (10) Instead of this comparatively weak move, Black should have adopted the move which his opponent allows him another opportunity to, not by which he wins the Bishop.
 (11) If White goes pin, Black takes K; Black checks with Q R, and then takes Q R, coming off with Bishop clear.
 (12) It would have been folly to have held out longer with his struggling forces against Black's superiority, both in number and position.

THE BURNS FESTIVAL.—Great preparations are making in Scotland to give all possible effect to the great celebration in honour of Scotland's bard, on the 6th August. There is to be a procession of trades, and of parties in Civil and fancy dresses, passing towards Alloway Kirk, over the new bridge of Doon, and back by the "Auld Brig," to the monument, where the sons, sisters, and wives of the bard will receive the greetings of the throng. A concert will be given in the open air, Wilson and Templeton being engaged for the occasion. A collection will be taken of 10 a pavilion erected for the purpose, and which is calculated for 3000 persons, where all manner of rational festivity will be enjoyed. The Earl of Eglinton, Professor Wilson, and many other distinguished individuals will honour the celebration with their presence. The invitation to the Ayr Town Council to join the procession, was, at their meeting on Wednesday, enthusiastically responded to; and what with magistrates of towns, public bodies, Archers' Societies, Freemasons, Odd Fellows, Scottish presbytery, &c., with bands of music, and the town, neighbourhood, and line of walk decorated with the choicest offerings of the forest and flower-garden, the demonstration out of doors at the meeting with the Sons of Burns in the cradle-land of the poet, will be a spectacle of the most gratifying and ennobling description. In the interior of the pavilion, however, the effects will be greatly heightened by the glowing orations which those master-minds who have signified their intention of being present, may be expected to deliver on a theme on which their kindred genius renders it a labour of love to expatiate. It is our intention to present our readers with a copious and interesting account of this national festival, with beautiful illustrations, and we beg to refer them to an announcement on the subject, given elsewhere.

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.—The beautiful weather of the last few days has had a wonderful effect on the crops. The harvest in the county of Essex has already commenced, and in the neighbourhood of Romford has become very general. Several fields of wheat, barley, and oats have been cut, and throughout the counties of Kent, Sussex, Essex, and Surrey, grain of every description presents a most luxuriant appearance. Notwithstanding the drought which has prevailed for such a lengthened period throughout the whole of the agricultural districts, which had a serious effect on the early crops of grass, and which it was calculated would have caused hay to be exceedingly dear, the late refreshing showers have caused the crop of afterwards to be most abundant, and the mowers are now every where engaged in cutting the second hay harvest. Some wheat and oats have already been housed in the most excellent condition. Some samples of the new wheat were exhibited at Mark Lane on Monday last, the produce of an extensive farm in Essex. The hop grounds of the county of Kent are looking extremely beautiful. Should the present fine weather continue, the harvest will become general throughout the country in the course of a week or ten days.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Among the recent wonders connected with travelling, may be mentioned a recent experimental trip to London. The directors of the Dover railway, M. Bares, Chief of the Public Works, and M. Drouot, Secretary of the Belgian Legation in England, left London by the Dover railway at twenty minutes past six o'clock in the morning. The train arrived at Dover at fifty minutes past eight o'clock, after stopping at Folkestone twelve minutes; the steamer was in readiness, and left Dover at twenty minutes past nine o'clock, and arrived at Ostend at fifty minutes past one o'clock. The passage from London to Ostend was thus completed in seven hours and a half, including the embarkation and all stoppages, which at least occupied forty minutes.

The ship Crusader, bound from Halifax to London, was cast away about the 11th of December, on the island of Cape Wapowogure, and all the crew and officers perished. Three dead bodies were found washed up on the beach of the island, near the spot where the wreck was lying. A boat, with five persons in it, was observed by the natives a few hours after she struck, but it was impossible to render them any assistance, on account of the dreadful state of the weather, otherwise they would have been saved, the natives being very friendly.

A letter from Constantinople dated the 3d July, gives an account of a beautiful atmospheric phenomenon which was seen on the previous Sunday. The atmosphere was hazy, but without a cloud. Thermometer about 90 degrees. An immense meteor, like a gigantic Congreve rocket, darted with a rushing noise from east to west. Its lightning course was marked by a streak of fire, and, after a passage of some 40 or 50 degrees, it burst like a bombshell, without detonation, lighting up the hemisphere with the brilliancy of the noonday sun. On its disappearance a white vapour remained in its track, and was visible for nearly half an hour. Many of the vulgar folk upon it as a very bad omen, whilst others attribute it to the warm weather which continues.

A Frankfurt journal publishes an account of the population of Prussia, from which it appears that, in Prussia Proper, and all the States under the Prussian Crown, the number of the inhabitants was, in 1840, 14,936,340. This number, however, must have increased considerably since 1840, for after England and Ireland, Prussia is, we believe, the State of Europe in which the population increases most rapidly.

The Marquis of Londonderry has left town for the north, with a view to arrange, if possible, the unhappy differences now existing among the colliery population in that district.

The wounded men from the army of Gwalior disembarked from the ship Wardour, on the morning of the 21st inst., and proceeded forthwith to Chatham, in medical charge of Surgeon Wood, 9th Royal Lancers, and Assistant Surgeon Mapleton, her Majesty's 4th Foot, who were selected at Gwalior for this arduous duty. It would appear that the results have been most satisfactory, only one casualty having occurred amongst these brave fellows on the voyage. It is gratifying to learn, too, the very great kindness and attention that were evinced towards the wounded by the authorities in India.

The first railway ever formed in the British colonies is about to be constructed in the island of Jamaica, between Kingston and Spanish Town. The length is twelve miles, though powers have been obtained from the House of Assembly to carry the line some miles further if the progress should think it desirable. Although the engineers and superintendents of the works have not yet left England, yet it is expected, from the easy gradients on the line, the abundant offers of labour already received, and the forward state of the iron work which is in course of preparation in this country, that the line will be open in December twelve months. This will be the first line of railway ever constructed by the labour of free negroes.

Private letters from Kassel, announce the proximate arrival in this country of that celebrated statesman and diplomatist, Count de Nesseltrode.

According to accounts received at the Jerusalem Coffee-house, there was a great scarcity of water at the island of Acre, and every one had been on allowance for three months. Vessels waiting water were obliged to go for a supply to Sidon, and the cattle, sheep, and people, were dying for want.

It is stated that a considerable reduction of the fares between Liverpool and London is about to be made almost immediately, the directors of the Great Junction and the London and Birmingham Railway Companies having both decided in favour of such a step. This is one of the first results of the cordial understanding which now exists between the two companies.

During a storm of thunder and lightning which passed over the neighbourhood of Gloucester on Thursday afternoon, an old labouring man, named John Lamb, seventy-one years of age, who was working in a potatoe field near Churchdown, between Gloucester and Cheltenham, was struck by the lightning and killed instantly.

The Lords of the Treasury have agreed to propose a grant for the completion of Nelson's Monument. The total sum required for the completion of the work is £12,500; namely, for granite steps, £1000, four commemorative subjects in bronze, £4000, four lions, £2000, and architect's commission, £500. The Lords of the Treasury recommend a vote of £5000; which, with subscriptions in hand, will be sufficient for the purpose. A well-known artist, Mr. R. Park, the sculptor, offered to the Government to complete the monument for £1000, which was rejected. However, he has since undertaken to complete the monument on his own responsibility, and at his own cost, rather than that any further difficulty should occur in the matter.

Major General Sir Robert Sale, his heroic lady and their widowed daughter, Mrs. Stuart and child, arrived at Lyme Regis on Tuesday, and subsequently left for London.

The Russian frigate Aurora has arrived with a quantity of gold, and it is said with some valuable presents for her Majesty's use. The property contained in wooden boxes weighed just six tons, and has been safely deposited in the vaults of the Bank of England. It was removed at Gloucester that the gold was sent to this country for the purpose of being refined, and that the frigate could remain three weeks in the river, for the purpose of taking it away when so prepared.

A dreadful fire took place on the 1st inst. at Drontheim, in Norway. Several streets and public edifices are stated to have been burnt to the ground. A similar disaster occurred at Cronstadt, in Transylvania, on the night of the 30th ult.; more than 90 buildings were destroyed. It is stated also, in a German paper, that the fine market-place of Marburg has been burnt down.

An explosion of gas, the consequences of which were frightful, took place on Monday evening, at the Porter's lodge of No. 25, Rue de la St. Jean, Faubourg St. Denis, Paris. A vent being opened in the pipe supplying the wine-shop in the same house, the porter, whose lodge is very dark, took a lighted candle too near to it, and the gas caught fire. Two children of the unfortunate man were killed, and his wife so severely wounded in the leg that she was necessarily carried to the hospital.

THE LATE MR. THOMAS HUDSON.

This celebrated song-writer, who, by his comic effusions, was "wont to set the table in a roar," was born in April, 1791, in Mount-street, Lambeth; and was, consequently, at his decease a few weeks since, in his fifty-fourth year. He was the son of Mr. John Hudson, of the Stamp-Office, Somerset House. He was, at the usual age, apprenticed to a grocer, and subsequently commenced business in the metropolis. But, "Tom Hudson" (as he was termed in convivial circles) preferred the delicieux vices of the sweets of his own trade. In the year 1820, he commenced singing his own songs in private parties; soon after which he wrote lyrics for the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens. About this time he commenced publishing his songs periodically; and we believe some fourteen or fifteen parts to have been issued, with ultimate advantage to the author, if not with direct profit. They abound, as the reader may be aware, if not with direct profit. They abound, as the reader may be aware, if not with direct profit. They abound, as the reader may be aware, if not with direct profit.

Though well known in the convivial circles of the metropolis, Hudson was not a dissipated man, for his habits were the reverse of intemperance; his talents at impromptu were very great; he has often caught up some incident which occurred at the table, or availed himself of the unexpected appearance of some public character, to produce an appropriate joke or compliment, which never failed to tell upon the company. Tom, however, was by no means an Apollo in voice; but, "the new song, composed by the singer," excused his defects of vocal execution. His more studied efforts were characterised by great humor and knowledge of life, and an abundant stock of those grotesque images which give the finish to a comic picture. With the middle and lower phases of London life, and the ridicule which has been attached to citizens and Cockneys, he possessed an extensive acquaintance; indeed, his perception of the ridiculous was altogether extremely nice. He was modest and retiring in his manners; and few men ever filled a "throne of human felicity" (as Dr. Johnson calls a tavern chair), with so humble a consciousness of his own merits. His features were rather of the mediate cast, and rarely partook of the ludicrous glow, with which he was wont to light up the faces of others. He made many friends by his genius, as well as by the genuine worth and kindness of his nature; the majority of his earlier effusions, we have been told, received a few finishing touches from the hands of young men of classical attainments, who likewise furnished the mottoes for the songs, mostly selected from the poets and satirists of antiquity.

Notwithstanding his careful habits, and his many points of excellence as a husband, father, and friend, Hudson died in straitened circumstances; and now that "Poor Tom's acolyte," his widow and children are left in distress. A number of his warm-hearted admirers have therefore announced a Vocal and Instrumental Performance for the benefit of Mrs. Hudson and her family, at the Concert-room of the Princess' Theatre, on Wednesday evening next. All the artists for the occasion have kindly given their services; and the officio enumerates among the vocalists, the Misses Dolby, Lacombe, Lanza, and Williams; Mrs. W. H. Seguin, and Mrs. C. E. Horn; Messrs. Manvers, Spogle, Scagrin, Horncastle, Robinson, Fitzwilliam, Ransford, Edney, and John Parry. Among the instrumental performers are M. de Mayer, Muschler, W. H. Holmes, Rosconi, Sedgewick, Blagrove, Richard-on, and Balar Clatterton. The concert will be under the distinguished patronage of the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, Council of Aldermen, and Mr. T. Dancombe, M.P.; and we trust that respect for the amiable character of the deceased, as well as sympathy for the condition of the survivors, will secure a successful pecuniary issue to the performance. With the view of directing the attention of our readers to this occasion, of "all mankind's concert," as well as with the object of commemorating a man of genius in an eccentric line, it is true, but not without its sweet uses, we have prefixed the head and front of the meritorious song-writer to this slight sketch of his career. It is a rare thing to find men who provide for the amusement of others at the expense of the world's vices as was poor Tom Hudson; and such worth should be promulgated in proportion to its rarity. A kindred spirit has penned the following # Lines to his memory, by an old friend.

Of manners meek, with wit and wit and wit
 As rich as ever made "the table roar;"
 His shafts, tho' bright, ne'er hurt the gentlest heart,
 For every one was an unbroken dart—
 Wit forg'd it, HOMERUS temper'd it, and then
 'Twas shot at random by the best of men;
 For well he knew where'er it chanc'd to fall,
 No feasting would follow—"was not gall"
 He dipp'd the arrows of his genius in—
 To wound another's feelings he held in;
 And by his own example fairly prov'd
 That satire, not at all caustic, may be lov'd!
 He was a minstrel of eccentric vein—
 To hear him once you'd hear him o'er again
 A hundred times, and when those times were past,
 Just pleas'd, as first you were, you'd be at last!

LORD HEYTESBURY.

Lord Heytesbury, the subject of our present sketch, is the successor of Earl De Grey in the Lord-Lieutenanship of Ireland. The name of his lordship is not so well known as those of most of his predecessors, from among whom it might have been expected that the successor to this office would have been appointed. The title is not an old one, nor has the present possessor of it taken that part in the warfare of politics that ensures a mighty niche in the heavy columns of the debates, and a daily notoriety from the superlative praise or the superlative abuse of the "Leaders" of the organs of the respective parties. He is a moderate, sensible, and temperate man, with resolution enough to resist, and perception enough to concede, where he finds either to be necessary; in short, his opinions hit that middle point between extreme opinions, which it appears to be the object of Sir R. Peel to adhere to in his Irish appointments, and of which the character and disposition of Lord Elliot, the Secretary for Ireland, is an example.

William A'Court, Baron Heytesbury, is of a Wiltshire family, of which the seat is Heytesbury House, in that county. The title is a creation of 1829, the patent being dated in January of that year. This family is an old one, and has given several representatives to the borough of Heytesbury, almost continuously, from the year 1722 down to the creation of the title.

The present Lord Heytesbury is the son of William Pierce Ashe A'Court, a colonel in the army, and a lieutenant-colonel of the 2nd Wiltshire Militia, who was created a baronet in July, 1795. He was born in 1779, and is, consequently, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. He married the grand-daughter of the first Earl of Radnor. By the marriage of his sister to the present Earl of St. Germain, he is related to Lord Eliot, the present Secretary for Ireland, so that there is greater probability, from the connection both of relationship and office, they will act together with more cordiality than has sometimes been known to exist between the Viceroy of Ireland and their Secretaries.

Though comparatively unknown to the world of politics, Lord Heytesbury has very creditably filled a rather difficult post in the diplomatic service of the country, having for some years been Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. Petersburg. He was, we believe, acting in this capacity at the time of the revolution of Poland, and it redounds to his credit that he opposed as much as possible the violation of those articles of different treaties under which the independence of Poland was guaranteed; it is to be lamented that his efforts were fruitless and that the absolute power of the Russian Autocrat broke through all stipulations, causing himself the revolt which he afterwards so severely punished. It is by no means impossible that the conduct of Lord Heytesbury on that occasion may have recommended him to his present station. He has also supported his reputation as resident at other European Courts. His Lordship's son, the Hon. W. H. A. A'Court, is member for the Isle of Wight.

Lord Heytesbury was sworn in as Viceroy of Ireland at a Privy Council held at Buckingham Palace, on Wednesday se'night. It is stated that his Lordship has consented to retain in their offices the great majority of the gentlemen forming the household of his predecessor. Colonel Bowles, who, it was thought, was to be Private Secretary, is to be first Aide-de-Camp, and Controller. Mr. A'Court, who is at present Secretary to Lord Eliot, is to be Private Secretary to Lord Heytesbury. The following Aides-de-Camp, Captains Lyndsey, Cole, and Meade, and Lieutenant Sir William Don, Bart., it is understood, go out.

NEW EXETER 'CHANGE.

Among the metropolitan improvements in course of completion, we are glad to notice a little Arcade between Wellington-street, North, and Catherine-street, Strand, and forming an elegant and convenient communication between these thoroughfares. The Arcade itself, as our engraving shows, contains ten neat shops, with dwellings above: it has a well proportioned cover, and is lit from above by a metal-framed skylight, of corresponding design. The design is neat, though it could be wished that the architect, Mr. Sydney Smirke, had aimed at higher embellishment. The roof of the Lucerne Arcade, in the Strand, is a very tasteful illustration of our meaning; with its series of elegant arches and pendentive domes, each of which terminates in an eye or circular skylight. Mr. Smirke's light, on the contrary, is a very common-place conservatory roof. The cover, fascia, piers, &c., of the Arcade have arabesque decorations, designed and executed by Mr. L. W. Colman, of Mount-street; and now that the colours are fresh, these ornaments have a very sparkling effect. At each end is an imitative bronze gate, surmounted by the coronet of a marquisate (the Arcade having been erected by the Marquis of Exeter), whence its designation. The fronts in Wellington-street and Catherine-street, are in the style of the street architecture of the reign of James I.; and the contrast of the fine red brick with the tasteful stone dressings, has a handsome effect. The frontage, in each instance, extends considerably beyond that of the Arcade itself; that in Wellington-street being chiefly appropriated as the new offices of the Morning Post journal.

Our readers at a distance must not, from its name, assume this Arcade to occupy the place of Exeter 'Change, now only kept in popular remembrance by a clock, inscribed on its dial with "Exeter 'Change" in place of figures, upon the front of a house in the Strand, adjoining the 'Change site.

The New 'Change is the third building of its kind erected in this locality; for the original Exeter 'Change was taken from "the New Exchange," built in 1608, on the site of the stables of Durham House, opposite the Adelphi Theatre. It was opened by James I., and was named by him, "Britain's Bourse."

"THE CITY OF LONDON" IRON STEAM-SHIP.

This magnificent iron steamer has just been constructed in the Clyde, by Mr. Napier, at the expense of £40,000, for the Aberdeen and London Steam Navigation Company, for steaming regularly between Aberdeen and the metropolis. She made her first voyage from Aberdeen to Wapping the week before last, in an unusually short space of time; though the wind was adverse, and she had on board, besides passengers and a cargo of goods, 210 head of cattle, and 700 boxes of salmon. She left Wapping, on her return to Aberdeen, on Saturday last, and accomplished the passage in 38 hours.

The City of London is of admirable symmetry, and nice proportion of length, breadth, and height; which detract from her apparent magnitude. She is, however, a stupendous vessel, and commodiously planned; her large dimensions giving scope for every accommodation. Her actual measurement is as follows:—

	Feet. In.
Length between perpendiculars .....	215 0
Length over all .....	231 0
Breadth of beam between paddle-boxes .....	31 0
Extreme breadth across paddle-boxes .....	32 6
Depth of hold .....	28 0

Her two engines together are rated at 430-horse power, and her registered tonnage is 732 tons—her measurement, 1110 tons. The poop stands 4 feet above the main deck, and is 65 feet long, and nearly 40 feet broad. The cabins are spacious and comfortable, and the ornaments are much more chaste than usual. This applies more particularly to the cabinet-work of the great saloon. The paneling, doors, and roof, are of solid oak, polished; the chairs and sofas, of oak also, are covered with green Genoa velvet; the mirrors, without being so profuse as to create confusion, are numerous enough; and the light is admitted through coloured glass, on which the royal arms, and those of London and Aberdeen, are finely depicted. The state-rooms are roomy, comfortable, and, withal, most thoroughly ventilated. There are six of them, containing two berths each, in the saloon, four of which enter from the saloon, and two from the lobby. Two gentlemen's sleeping cabins, each with twelve berths, and a ladies' cabin, with sixteen berths, enter from the lobby. Besides the berths aft, there is a gentlemen's cabin forward, with twenty-six berths—in all, 110; the whole have spring mattresses, are ventilated from the roof and sides, and are unusually roomy. The ladies' cabin is, as it ought to be, the most elegant and comfortable place in the ship; and the accommodation for steerage passengers is very superior. The comfort even of the dumb brutes, which will always form a large proportion of the passengers from Aberdeen to London, has not been overlooked. There is a large lower deck, in which they will enjoy fresh air, without exposure to the angry elements without.

To give additional security, the vessel is divided into four distinct compartments, each water-tight—so that, although she were to spring a leak, either forward or aft, there would be no danger of the ship filling, or of that still more dangerous accident in a steamer, the extinguishing of the fires in the engine-room. This same engine-room, by the way, is very tastefully and commodiously laid out; and the engines themselves are much admired for exquisite workmanship, strength, and finish. The boilers are four in number, and can be used separately in case of accident.

One excellent quality in the City of London, and one that will be gratefully acknowledged by passengers who are apt to get sick, is the almost total absence of the disagreeable tremulous motion that is experienced in most steamers. On the paddle-boxes, where it should be most sensibly felt, a great number of the passengers, in the trip north—some of them well able to judge—sat for hours, and acknowledged that certainly the tremor, in this instance, had been minimized.

In a pleasure-trip, this superb vessel accomplished the voyage from Greenock to Aberdeen, a distance of 540 miles, in 42 hours, or at the rate of about 13 miles an hour. Captain Cargill, by whom she is commanded, speaks highly of the ease with which she may be managed. With the exception of the Great Britain, which has not yet been to sea, she is the largest iron steam-ship afloat.

We congratulate the enterprising Company on having added this fine steamer to the number of powerful vessels already on their establishment. The resulting social and commercial advantages are thus illustrated in the Aberdeen Herald:—

The voyage between London and Aberdeen is now achieved in a few hours; whereas, formerly, it always occupied days—not unfrequently weeks. Thanks to the almost miraculous power of steam, the broad Atlantic is now crossed in less time than our sailing vessels used sometimes to require between our own port and that of London. As to comfort and accommodation for passengers, comparison is out of the question. But greater advantages still have resulted in the speedier transmission of articles of commerce; and in no instance has this been more strikingly or beneficially exemplified than in the conveyance of cattle to the London market—an advantage to a great agricultural district the ours, of the very highest importance.

STATUE OF THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

[Mr. E. Hodges Baily, R.A., has just completed his model of the statue of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Sussex, which is to be executed in marble, according to a vote of the Grand Lodge, for Freemasons' Hall. It has been exhibited by the sculptor, and has received the highest commendation.]

Grand Master of our mystic tie,
Though now thy honour'd bones may lie
In Kensal cold—
Enca'd in stone—in marble here
Almost in life thou dost appear,
A wonder to behold!

Here is the good fraternal smile
That lit thy living lips erewhile
With grace and truth—
And here's thy manly—burly form
Grown large by nursing feelings warm
E'en from thy very youth!

The crabbed-will'd—the cold of heart
Will soon from lusty health depart
And haggard show—
While they whose blessing 'tis to be Possess'd of sweet philanthropy
Each day will thriving grow!

And thus with thee it was—from child
To man thou wert as generous—mild—
And good a thing,
As ever grac'd humanity—
It was a pleasant sight to see
The Brother of a King

Low veil his bonnet to a girl,
And call her his "beloved pearl"
When made his Queen—
'Twas grateful, too, to see him fight
For a most suffering people's right,
And boldly stand between

The wrongs they bore for Judah's land,
And the unchristian tyrant's hand
That crush'd them low—
He's gone at last, but will survive
As long as memory can live
Or genius here his image show! W.

The statue is seven feet six inches in height, and the pedestal six feet: and his Royal Highness is represented standing upright, in the action of addressing an assembly. He is habited in the robes of a Knight of the Garter, and, in addition, wears the insignia of the Guelphic order. The sculptor has been very successful in the delineation of the features, and in imparting to his work the characteristic traits of the figure of the illustrious personage it is designed to portray. Like all the statues Mr. Baily has hitherto executed in an upright posture, this is remarkable for its ease and natural aspect; and more especially for the firmness and stability with which the figure stands upon the pedestal. The robes, though gorgeous in character, are yet not frittered in detail, but present a broad and massive effect. At the side is placed a small altar, on which the masonic emblems are figured.

Paris, 23rd July.

It is not at present in Paris that Parisian fashions are to be seen; they are now only to be met with at the watering-places, and on the borders of the Rhine. At Basle, a fête takes place every two years, when the carabiniers of 22 cantons assemble to try their skill. In addition, this year is the fourth centenary of the battle of Saint-Jacques, where 1500 Swiss contended with 30 000 troops: the Swiss were destroyed, but Swiss liberty was established. This double fête attracted crowds of strangers and natives, and great interest was excited by an English Lord having entered the lists for the first prize with the carabine; there being two hundred prizes and six thousand carabiniers to contend for them, he was considered successful in having obtained the third prize, and he was cordially congratulated by his compatriots and the numerous French visitors who were at Basle.

Our correspondent assures us that the coup-d'œil was magnificent. The gay costumes of the Swiss from all the cantons, in their best attire—the flowing lace of the Fribourgeoises—the flower-decked hats of the young girls of Lucerne formed an admirable contrast with the toilettes just arrived from Paris.

The shape and size of hats continue the same, but the ornaments and accessories are very varied.

White crape hats are ornamented with roses and crêpe lisse.

Paille de riz hats are ornamented with flowers. Capotes of straw-colour crape are trimmed with biases of lilac and straw-colour.

Summer toilettes are mostly composed of badge, chameleon silks, and coloured tarlatanes, accompanied with lace scarfs and shawls, or with mantelets of embroidered muslin, and with crape, tulle, or paille de riz capotes.

Barbare dresses are mostly trimmed with volans, as most suitable with soft materials, whilst organdies, and other starched materials, always have plaits. Fasons and embroideries are adopted with transparent materials. Many tarlatanes are embroidered in colours; the skirts are plain, but the volans are studded with pea spots, and the festoons bordered with the same.

THE KING OF SAXONY IN A DILEMMA.—While the King of Saxony was at Liverpool, he determined to make a theatrical visit. His Majesty and suite drove to the Amphitheatre, and actually got into one of the boxes of that house, where the coolness of their reception—the audience knowing nothing of the rank of the illustrious visitor—induced his Majesty to make an inquiry, which convinced him that he was in the "wrong box." The royal party beat a speedy retreat, and arrived at the Theatre-Royal, where the King intended to go, about a quarter of an hour after the commencement of the "Love Chase," where the audience, being on the qui vive, rose and cheered heartily as they entered the stage-box.

On Monday the usual annual meeting of the proprietors of Drury-lane theatre took place in the saloon, and was fully attended. Lord Glenall was in the chair. The report, read by Mr. Dunn, was to the effect, that the late season, under the management of Mr. Dunn, had been more prosperous than any season for a considerable time past, and that the committee had concluded an agreement, for a further term of three years, with that gentleman, determinable, at the option of either party, at the end of the first; and they trusted that, with the renewed exertion of the lease, a still more favourable season even than the last might be anticipated. The report was confirmed, and thanks were voted to Mr. Dunn.

FITZ-STEPHEN.

"THE OLD SAILOR."

In the year 1806, James Fitz-Stephen commanded a fine crack that traded with Biscay for wine and wool; and so highly was his honesty and uprightness esteemed, that cargoes to his account were frequently shipped on credit, both for the Irish and the London markets. He had married a lady of the name of Blake, to whom he was greatly attached, and everything seemed to promise a life of happiness and prosperity. It is a circumstance with Spain had not only raised him many friends in that country, but he had also caught much of the strongly inflexible character of the Biscayans, which gradually became blended with his own. In 1807, when Philip, the heir to the crown of Castile, and father to Charles V., visited England, James Fitz-Stephen was selected on his departure to pilot the royal ship to the Spanish shores, an office which he performed very ably; and Philip, to testify his satisfaction, granted him several exclusive privileges and immunities in his trading transactions with the city of Bilbao.

At an early age, his only son, Lynch Fitz-Stephen, accompanied his father in his voyages, and by diligent application became a smart active lad; but his parent, being strongly attached to domestic enjoyments, yielded to the persuasions of his wife to remain on shore, and though he did not entirely relinquish the sea, yet he fully established himself as a merchant, and carried on a very prosperous commerce, occasionally visiting Bilbao in pursuit of business.

Young Lynch continued his maritime life under other masters, but as soon as age and experience would sanction the trust, he was appointed to command one of his father's ships, and for some time he acquitted himself with credit; but, the dark-eyed beauty of Spain soon infused him to get the fair-haired, cooing maiden in Galway, who loved him with an intensity bordering on fervent devotion.

"And you are going to leave me, Lynch," said she, as he came to bid another farewell, previous to his departure for Biscay; "the heart of me is very sorrowful when you are away, but 'tis sadder I should be but for the certainty of your honour and fidelity, and sure I may rely on them, Lynch?"

"Indeed, dearest, and you may do so most implicitly," returned the young mariner with fervour, whilst a pang of absence and contrition told him that his confidence in his integrity was not altogether merited. "Who else, love, should occupy my thoughts, or be treasured in my breast? No, no; it is my own Aileen who possesses my undivided and unceasing affection, and never will I betray her to sorrow and anguish."

She laid her head against his breast, and after some persuasion she promised to give him her hand at the altar on his return from the voyage he was then about to make. They parted. The young man's cargo was on board, and he was amply furnished with money to liquidate former claims, as well as to purchase a full freightage of the choicest wines for home. He was cordially welcomed at Bilbao, and took up his temporary abode at the residence of an old merchant, to whom his cargo was consigned. With his son, Don Sebastian, he had formed an early friendship, and through his introduction, he had become acquainted with a female of exquisite beauty, Donna Clara, who admired the young and warm-hearted Irishman—she was incapable of feeling a more generous attachment.

His vessel was loaded—the time for his departure drew near; the account with the merchant was unsettled, and his money had been entirely expended in dissipation, and rich presents to Donna Clara. As far as the unsettled claims and value of his homeward cargo went, the unhappy state of his affairs would prove no detriment to his sailing; for his father's credit and responsibility were unimpeachable; and, once in his own country, he would find no difficulty in deceiving his parent, whilst he might trust to the chapter of accidents to rescue him from threatened disgrace. But to leave Donna Clara seemed to be almost impracticable, and she, too, had declared the utter impossibility of surviving their separation.

Lynch had informed the merchant that he had brought no funds, but that his father would remit the whole amount on the following voyage, with which arrangement the Spaniard appeared to be entirely satisfied; but the young mariner was thrown into a state of distressing consternation when it was proposed that his friend Don Sebastian, who had long been desirous of visiting the British Isles, should take a passage with him to Galway, and there receive the balance due, to furnish funds for his intended excursion—he could neither decline nor refuse the proposition; therefore, disarming his alarm, he expressed himself gratified at the prospect of companionship with so desirable a mate.

Among the crew of the crack was a foster-brother of the commander, who was greatly attached to him; and, the man had at all times evinced an entire devotion to the interest or pleasure of the young ship-master. Although unqualified to give counsel, Lynch made him his confidant, and consulted him on most occasions, so that Phelim MacConnor was in a great measure aware of the perils in which Fitz-Stephen had become involved.

They were now at sea; the wind was fair, the weather propitious, and every hour carried Lynch Fitz-Stephen nearer and nearer to his home; that home which he could not think of without feelings of dread. He trembled when he contemplated the just anger of his father—the utter loss of his own good name—and what was becoming every minute more painfully acute, the conviction that Aileen, the fond, cooing, and affectionate Aileen, would never be his.

The bright reflection of the clear full moon was dancing on the dark blue waters as Lynch stood alone leaning over the taffrail of his ship in silent and absorbed meditation. The swelling sails were filled with the freshening breeze, and the vessel marked her track upon the ocean in dazzling brilliancy and light. But her commander heeded not the glories which presented themselves; the heavy gloom of his conscience fell like a dark cloud upon all around him, and threw a damp and misty veil between the present and the future. He sometimes felt half resolved to inform his friend Sebastian of what had occurred, and to cast himself upon his generous sympathy; but shame and pride deterred him; he could not muster sufficient assurance or courage to acknowledge the villain he had practised, and he much doubted whether the high spirit of the Spaniard would not revolt at a proposal for concealment. Once married to Aileen, and her fortune, which was ample, would be at his disposal, so that he could restore the money he had so fraudulently embezzled and squandered. But would the noble-minded Sebastian become a consenting party to the perpetration of such a treacherous act of duplicity? He was thus debating the matter with himself, till, almost unconsciously, he exclaimed aloud, "No, no—I cannot—will not do it."

"It is the only way to save you," whispered the voice of Phelim, who had silently approached and overheard the exclamation; "when he is dis-posed of—and it may be done secretly enough—we can tell our own tale and devil a soul will know anything about it at all."

"What do you mean, Phelim?" eagerly inquired his commander, although he was well acquainted with the purport of the intimation; for conscience told the unhappy man that similar designs had crossed his own ruminations.

"Mene!" returned Phelim, cautiously, in the same low tone, "why what should I mene? You will soon anchor in Galway Bay, and a pretty reckoning there'll be anyhow if he arrives safe. Arrah then, captain, sure and you know that dead men can tell no tales?"

Lynch Fitz-Stephen was silent for several minutes. He looked upon the sparkling foam of the ocean, but there was an unnatural redness in his hue; he gazed upwards at the bright clear sky, but the face of the heavens seemed to be tinged with blood. At length he forcibly uttered, "Never, Phelim, never! Do not mention such a thing again."

"It is well, captain dear, that you understand me," responded the foster-brother, with earnestness. "Oh, but it's alwy enough to comprehend matters

THE DOG BILL COMMITTEE—DRAWN BY T. LANDSEER.

DOG-STEALING.

[Mr. Liddell moved that the Select Committee on Dog-stealing (Metropolis) be composed of the following members:—Mr. Liddell, Captain Rous, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Henry Berkeley (Bristol), Mr. Beckett Denison, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. Fitzroy, Mr. Mackinnon, Sir John Yarde Buller, Major Beresford, Viscount Barrington, Mr. Montague Gore, Lord Arthur Lennox, Sir Robert Pigot, and Mr. Richard Hodgson.]

Come all you thieves of idle dogs,
And idle dogs—or thieves,
And listen to our Muse to-day,
As plaintively she grieves!
Your members have been stealing all—
Now, get ye in a stew—
For Members of our Parliament
Are stealing over you!
Each M.P.'s a Columbus now,
With dog-bill in his hand,
As though each new found puppy were,
In fact, a new found land!
If this be justice unto you,
We're sure it's far-fetched, very;
Must dogs have bills as well as birds?
Then justice is Dog-berry!
Yet so it is! dogs stolen now,
Alas! and more the pity!
Have been returned to Parliament,
And got into committee!
Old sporting members of old clubs—
White, Crockford, Brooks, or Boodle,
Will soon examine all your race,
From bloodhound down to poodle.
To answer legal questions then
No more must you de-mur,
They'll get at every man and thing
That's going to a-cur!

So far their zeal concerning you
All human reason flags,
They would transport the Isle of Man
To save the Isle of Dogs!
Let every mortal from this day
Who men of dogs would diddle,
Unleash all his wits, and so
Beware of Mr. Liddell!
John Bull! fill thy precautions head
With more precaution fuller!
To hide the bull-dog in thy yard
Away from John Yarde Buller!
Dogs, list to your committee's voice—
No more let stealers admonish you,
But let the world laugh while it hears
The Commons' House examine you.
You little terrier! quiet, you!
No more of that 'ere larking;
Or else Hal Berkeley there will think
You're just arrived from barking!
Stand firmer on your pins, old hound,
Less tipsy and repining,
Or you'll make Beresford believe
You've hardly left off wine-ing!
What, Pug! come hide those ivory teeth,
Curl less that tail capacious,
Or some pug-nose will take offence
At you, and turn pug-nacious!
Spaniel, drop down thy modest ears,
Or Kelly will be laying
Odds that you saw this moonshine law,
And sudden fell a-baying.
Pigot and Lennox stately sit,
Although their benches are low;
But 'mong the dogs they catechise
Who's member pray for Carlo!
Mackinnon hath a hungry look,
And eyes that seem to say,

I wish the other dogs would bring
Up something on the Tray!
Miss Fanny bolts, while Fitzroy cries
Halt—back her—stop her—ease her;
And Gore makes commentaries on
The evidence of Cæsar!
Rous loudly says—not mincing ought—
I'd like to see the witch
That all you pretty pups have brought
To represent Hounds-ditch!
While Denison greets Pompey now
In most familiar manner;
Smith eyes the skin of "black and tan,"
As though he were a tanner.
Barrington's dog-star rages now,
For his wise head hath what I call
A dogged wisdom in his eyes
Which makes him look dogmatical.
Now speak ye up, ye canine tribe,
To framers of our laws;
And when they've tak'n your evidence,
Why you may take your paws!
They surely see their dogs meet now—
As dogs ne'er met at will;
They've brought them to the scratch without
One cat's clause in their bill.
But dog-thieves never more shall make
A living at their ease;
The more the dog is bred to them,
The less he's bread and cheese!
And idle dogs that go astray,
Must all go home, says "Solon;"
For though they may have stolen away,
They never can be stolen!
Some of you white ones twice dyed red,
That men who stole might sell you,
Will be, when your committee barks,
Read a third time, I tell you!

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—The final meeting of the Commissioners of Fine Arts for the season took place recently at Gwydyr House, when the following six artists were chosen for the execution of works on given subjects for the decoration of the New Houses of Parliament:—Charles West Cope, Hyde-park Gate, Kensington Gore; John Calcott Hensley, 1, High-row, Kensington Oval Pitt; William Dyce, 12, Royal-terrace, Adelphi; Daniel Macise, 14, Russell place, Fitzroy-square; Richard Belgrave, Hyde-park Gate, Kensington; William Cave Thomas, 27, Baker-street, Portman-square. It is understood that the commission to each artist will be to execute a cartoon upon a given subject, to be afterwards transferred to fresco in the usual manner for the decoration of the interior of the House of Lords. The six subjects are, it is supposed, intended to fill the six panels forming the interior of that apartment. The Commissioners having also inspected the models for sculpture in Westminster Hall, state, that they consider the exhibition as highly creditable to the country. At present they limit the selection of artists to three—viz., Mr. Calder Marshall, John Bell, and John Henry Foley, for employment in decorating the New Palace at Westminster. The Commissioners expressly state, however, that the selection of these gentlemen does not imply the exclusion of other sculptors. The Committee appointed to inquire into the present state of the building of the New Houses have made a report, from which we take the most essential extracts. They say:—"Your Committee have examined Mr. Barry as to the progress already made in the buildings of the New Houses of Parliament, and have endeavoured to ascertain from him the probable time that will elapse before the whole of the works can be completed, and the period at which the two houses may be occupied for the transaction of public business. He has stated to them, that, were it urgently required, the houses, and a certain number of committee-rooms and other offices, might be prepared for occupation at the commencement of the year 1845; but your committee do not feel themselves justified in affirming that such occupation could take place without inconvenience to the members, or impediment to the further progress and satisfactory completion of the building; and they think it right to observe, that the general arrangements for ventilation cannot be completed till the commencement of the year 1847. Your committee have examined various parties as to the course hitherto adopted by Mr. Barry, with reference to alterations of the interior arrangements shown in the plan approved by committee of both houses in 1836. They impute no blame to Mr. Barry for that course, and have every reason to believe that all the alterations hitherto made have been confined to the convenience and general effect of the building; but, looking to the misapprehension that appears to have prevailed as to these proceedings hitherto, they are prepared to recommend that in future Mr. Barry should make a half-yearly report of the progress of the works to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; and should also submit to that Board any alterations which may hereafter be deemed advisable, and accompany such report with plans of the alterations proposed."

THE IOWA INDIANS.—A party of Iowa Indians, from their hunting grounds, 100 miles west of the Mississippi, are now on their passage to England. The party consists of the head of the tribe, who, with some of his chief warriors, their wives and families, will amount in number to 15 or 16 persons. It is the first time that the principal chief of a tribe has ever quitted his native shores for a foreign land. They are possessed of a splendid wardrobe, including every article of Indian attire, and travel with their tents, camp equipage, canoes, and a beautiful collection of rifles, bows and arrows, and other implements manufactured by savage art, and used both in war and in the chase. The Iowas, unlike the Ojibways, will not, during their stay in this country, occupy lodgings, but will be engaged in some open space in the metropolis or suburban districts, where they will exhibit their habits of life, their mode of warfare, and, where practicable, the navigation of their canoes, and also give a performance of their characteristic dances, rites, and ceremonials.

A New York paper gives the following as the argument of a simple-minded African at a meeting of the Anti-Slavery Convention:—"My grandfather was a King in Africa! a King! You see before you some of de royal blood! But de Americans cum and stole away de son ob a King, to make a slave ob him. Wat d'ye tink ob dat? Perhaps you don't tink much ob it; but what would de Americans say, if de Algerians war so cum and carry off young Bob Tyler?"

FRANCIS ALBERT AND HIS FRIENDS.—Prince Albert, having determined to devote some portion of his leisure time to the management of bees, has caused a portion of the royal domains, in the immediate vicinity of her Majesty's aviary, to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying this intention into effect. Two beautifully-constructed hives, of American manufacture, filled with bees, were brought to Windsor, on Wednesday, by Mr. Skoll, the patentee. Mr. Skoll, who is a Quaker, was in attendance at the spot where the hives have been fixed, to explain the nature and the peculiarity of their internal arrangements; by means of which the surplus honey can be easily removed, without (as is the case with the usually-constructed old-fashioned hives) destroying the industrious inmates. It has been communicated to the Prince, that bees in these hives will make three times as much honey as they will need for their winter subsistence; thus giving, as it were, two thirds of their labour to their landlord for the rent of their habitation. The Queen and the Prince, not leaving Frogmore House until within a few minutes of two o'clock (the hour for her Majesty's luncheon), had not time, on their return to the Castle, to inspect the hives. Mr. Skoll, who was waiting alone, with considerable anxiety for the arrival of her Majesty and his Royal Highness, ran out to them when he saw them pass by the entrance of the new aviary, and thus addressed three illustrious personages, with his hat undodged, of course, being a Quaker:—"Friends, won't you look at the hives? They are all fixed, Friends; pray, come and look at them." The Queen and the Prince, however, hastily passed on to luncheon at the Castle, laughing heartily; evidently very good-humouredly enjoying the temporary disappointment of their "Friend" in dress. It is expected that the new aviary will be placed under the superintendence of Mr. Walters, who has the entire care of her Majesty's rare and highly curious collection of fowls, &c., at the Royal Aviary.

THE RIOTS IN AMERICA.

NOTWITHSTANDING the history of the past generation and the experience of the present one, with respect to America, do each furnish matters of unpleasant contemplation to England, there is yet a very general disposition on our part to think the best we can of the Western Republic. Pity it is the citizens of the "free and enlightened" state will not give us more cause to think better of them than we do; and less frequent occasion for thinking worse. Our older grievances are as much forgotten here as if they had never existed; and all that made the English Government of the day so little, and the name of Washington so great, is now surrounded with the dimness and mists of tradition. We have had Napoleon on our hands since then; and if Waterloo itself is more frequently recalled to our recollection by the existence of "the Duke," than by any sense of its consequences, it is no marvel that Bunke's Hill is remembered no more, or only as one of the "battles long ago," which are given over to the historian of the past, having no effect on the present or the future. These old quarrels are here quietly inurned, though they still stir and work on the other side of the Atlantic, in July orations, and other more questionable shapes—a thing more, perhaps, to be regretted than wondered at. To come down nearer to our own times, there are many matters about which we have no small reason to be dissatisfied with our Western offshoot. The "Pennsylvanian Bonds" business is not yet either forgotten or forgiven—for men and nations are alike in this, that they sooner pardon an open defeat than being made the victim of a swindle—and in this country, the transaction we allude to is considered nothing else. But we repeat, notwithstanding all these causes of discontent, old and new, there is a vast mass of public opinion in favour of America and her people: the whole English nation are not bondholders, and every body (though the assertion is scarcely a safe one) has not read the sarcasms of the Rev. Sydney Smith.

We wish, for the sake of both countries, that the good opinion that does exist may increase; but we have our fears on the subject, and they have been augmented by the last accounts from the "States."

In one of the principal cities of the Union, a riot which swelled into something not unlike a civil convulsion, has taken place, the origin and progress of which exhibit some sad defects in the working of the Republican Constitution. In the first place, in the very land, as it has been called, of religious freedom, there is evidently as much religious bigotry and intolerance abroad in society as there might be found in the statute-book of England, or, still worse, of Ireland; the difference being that in England, the old oppressive and intolerant laws have become dead and inoperative, from the freer spirit of the community, while in America it is the people who persecute with the most indiscriminating violence. The madness which the mob of London caught from their mad leader, Lord George Gordon, more than "sixty years since," is revived in all its fatal licentiousness by the inhabitants of the "City of Brotherly Love,"—the capital of the state founded by the sect who, above most others, learned the lesson—which they so fully practise—of Toleration, in the school of Persecution. There is nothing the Americans so strongly insist on as the fact that they are a "progressing" people, and they look with very thinly-disguised contempt on the states of the "Old World," for their want of the "movement" principle. It is but questionable progress, we think, that carries the present back into the worst barbarities of the past. How fast are they proving that their Constitution is a deception! It declares all men equal and free, and upholds a system of oppressive and degrading slavery, with such determination, that the friends of liberty can hardly hope for its cessation. It announces religious freedom to all—but burns the churches and chapels of those who hold a different faith!

The promise of the Constitution and its performance are truly of no less together. In fact, taking the discrepancies between the theory and practice of the Constitution, the weakness of the Executive Government, the vicious principle of pushing party and election into the administration even of the criminal laws, the continual fever of excitement in which every one is kept by being always electing or preparing to elect,—are producing results most injurious to public and private morality. Many have hitherto looked on America as an example by which we should profit; but there is too much reason to fear that she will become only a beacon to warn us what to avoid. We may envy the physical well-being of her people, but it is more due to her vast territory, which, stretching to the south and west, will give space, and life, and action to the unborn generations of centuries to come. We can admire, too, the enterprise and energy of the race—though, to our cost, they have pushed their "smartness" beyond the verge of honesty; but we cannot extend that envy or that admiration to her political constitution, which seems to produce actual oppression without intending it. Of the cheapness of her Government, we do not doubt; the mere machinery of a State is not costly, and the Governments of Europe are more oppressed by their public debts than their public establishments. This is an evil that will never be felt by America, if she persist in denying her debts when payment is demanded. Whether it may not procure her expulsion from the money market of the world as a defaulter, is another question, one which the Americans themselves may yet find it difficult to answer.

Every public event of importance in the United States, so far as it exhibits the working of their political and social system, is sure to attract the attention of Europe: the late riots at Philadelphia will attract that notice, and the result of it will be an unfavourable impression both of the governing power and the body governed. It shows the existence of national hatreds and religious jealousies ready to shed blood without scruple; it shows that the Government is not strong enough to check that spirit; and, when driven by peril to property to interfere, acting without decision or promptitude. It is also evident that in the cities of America, as well as in the old and corrupt capitals of Europe, there are masses of savage and desperate men, made so by ignorance, vice, or want, or probably by the combined action of the three things so often found together, and who are ready to turn every accident to an opportunity of plundering. Even from this evil, the larger capabilities of America have not saved her.

THE BRITISH FLEET IN THE GIBRALTAR ROADS.

It is a goodly sight to see
The hundred-years-old greenwood tree
Vast, in its burly pride, among
Thousands of brothers, old and young,
Rearing, majestic as they stand,
A forest on the mighty land!

Too rooted in their strength to fall,
The Goddess Nature built them all.
When they are born by branch and stem
Man works his strength to build with them,
And every sturdy trunk that falls
Makes one link in our wooden walls.

The axe, the saw, bring them no wreck,
They turn to rib, to mast, to deck!
They form our ships—when they meet
Strong on the waters—lo! a fleet!
So the land-wood of grand old trees
Has grown a forest on the seas!

Behold it! Yonder looms a Rock
To stand the cannon's wildest shock,
To bid the loud war's thunder roar
Nor tremble on its iron shore—
Yet cannot its stone strength compete
With the proud firmness of that fleet!

There, on the waters, far away,
Gaze on it as it rides to-day.
Its firm peace-anchors grasp the deep,
And all its great war-thunders sleep.
Most royally it holds its place
With Ocean proud of its embrace!

Yet, 'neath that rock, by snow or sun,
It could do what it once hath done,
And wake, as it hath woke before,
And startle lands from shore to shore,
And build new trophies up to fame,
And crown again our British name.

A Nelson-inspiration thrills
The souls that fill those wooden walls,
And hands and hearts and hopes are there
That spurn defeat and scorn despair,
And in the fight would own no cry
Whose echo was not "Victory!"

'Neath every rock, near every land,
So far may our Ship-prowess stand,
Where Commerce flies with golden wing,
A peaceful, bright majestic thing;
But, with a war-dance hark! hark!
King of the Waters of the World!

ENGLISH AND FOREIGN SHIPS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.—According to the latest reports from Gibraltar, the following ships of war are in that bay:—Her Majesty's ships Calliope, Albatross, and Warrior; the Danish frigates Gefion and Thetis; the Norwegian frigates Fenix and Josephine, and a sloop of war; the Norwegian frigate Josephine has the Prince Oscar on board. The force the French have there with the Prince de Joinville is as follows:—The Jemmapes (three-decker), the Triton and Suffren (both two-deckers), the Belle Poule (frigate), and the following armoured vessels:—The Gaillard, Assolant, Volage, La Phare (armoured frigates); and the Bulie and Pluton (steamships). In addition to these there are two steamers and a long of war in Tanager. The Dutch have at this port the Bayne and Jaren frigates, and the Stellendam corvette. The Swedes have the Freia and Jaguar frigates, and a heavy Swedish corvette. The Spaniards have a 74 gun ship (name not known), the Christina frigate, the Manzanera (32 guns) brig, besides six or seven smaller vessels of war.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.
The Paris papers are devoid of important facts. The Journal in honour of the "three glorious days" of the late Revolution have been celebrated in Paris this year with great effect. Unfortunately, however, three lives were lost, and several persons severely injured, in the rush made by the crowd at the termination of the fireworks to see the illuminations. The late sculler, Jules, who was killed in the late race, is contained in the following letter, dated March 1st:—
"Steamer, La Ville de Paris, entered at this port at five o'clock A.M. I, orderly officer attached to Marshal Sedgwick, came as passenger from General Bugeaud. From information which may be recalled I learned that the Government had had received despatches from Morocco, to the effect that he had ordered the Calipha, who the French troops, to be put into chains, and to be placed at the disposal of Bugeaud. The Marshal replied that he should refuse to do so until he had received further instructions from his Government. In the mean time he should continue his operations against the Emir Abd-el-Kader, and was continuing to burn the villages and destroy the sierras territories. The same day (1844) the Marshal sent despatches pressing nature to the Prince de Joinville. The French army is with provisions, and in high spirits. Subsequently Oran on the evening of the 22d, the Deputes has adopted the Paris and Strasbourg Railroad Bill of 17th August 31. The quantity of business still remaining for consideration of the Chamber of Deputies, the Parliamentary session cannot, it is said, be before the 6th of August.

At the Theatre Francaise a new drama, in five acts, has been produced, under the title of "Béatrice," being the first production of a maiden muse. The author, M. Victor Segur, seems to have drunk deeply at the same fountain as M. Victor Hugo and M. Alexandre Dumas. This piece, abounding in all the faults of inexperience, contains nevertheless some powerful scenes, and, on the whole, it was very well received, though not of a nature to command anything like lasting popularity.

SPAIN.

The Madrid letters of the latest date are destitute of interest. The Cadix papers mention that the Prince de Joinville was still there on the 20th ult.; that an English squadron had arrived in the bay of Tangier, and that one vessel had entered the port. The Prince de Joinville had made a remonstrance on the subject to the commanding officer of the squadron, from whom he received every satisfactory explanation, and afterwards returned with his fleet to the bay of Cadix.

The siege of Saragossa had been raised.

PORTUGAL.

The letters from Lisbon of the 20th ult. state that on the previous Sunday the Duke of Palmella broke a blood-vessel in his lungs, and still continued in a very dangerous state, though not given over by his medical attendants.

The French frigate Adour had arrived from Cadix. She is one of the vessels belonging to the Prince de Joinville's squadron, which she left at Cadix.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has addressed an official communication to his colleague of the Finance Department, stating that he will be able to effect a reduction of about 15 centes in this branch of the expenditure.

A most decided case of Asiatic cholera had taken place on board a Prussian vessel at Lisbon. The patient, however, was in a fair way of recovery.

GREECE.

Accounts from Athens state that some sensation had been created there, in consequence of a supposed attempt, on the part of a servant of government, to assassinate King Otto. This singular accident occurred in the forenoon of the 17th ult., about ten o'clock. A man in the uniform of the gendarmes rushed suddenly past the sentinel at the front of the palace, towards the garden, with a large paper petition in his hand, which he began to wave, shouting at the same time "Long live Alexander the Great." The sentinel called to him to stop, and pursued him as he approached the private door of the palace, as all access to the interior by this side is prohibited. The second sentinel, seeing what was going on, placed himself before the door, and presented his bayonet, calling to the gendarme to stand. The unfortunate man then drew his sword, and getting past the soldier, rushed to the corridor, when the sentinel finding it impossible to stop him otherwise, transfixed him with his bayonet, and he fell severely wounded. By some it is doubted whether the man had any intention of attacking his Majesty, and they believe that he really intended to present a petition to the King. There is no doubt the man was deranged. His case is very singular. His name is Kinnas, and he is a native of Asia Minor. He is a man of about six feet high, of a prepossessing appearance, and arrived during the whole of the revolutionary war, though not yet more than 40 years of age.

TURKEY.

Adverts from Constantinople of the 10th ult., allude to the great excitement produced there by the publication of a French pamphlet, in which the Turkish Minister of Finance and a celebrated banker and contractor are accused of a long-continued and enormous system of plunder upon the state purse. A report was in circulation at Constantinople that the Russians had been beaten in a severe battle with the Circassians, and had lost a large portion of their army. This report, however, requires confirmation, as several of the letters make no mention of it. A letter from Tahrirah gives further accounts of an earthquake which took place there on the 12th of May. The shock was felt at Ispahan, Kashan, Behkan, and the intermediate country. At Kashan many houses have been thrown down, and several people killed. The great Mosque Musoudi Sah, at Ispahan, has been injured. At Mossanna more than half the houses have been ruined, and many of the inhabitants have been killed, and others badly wounded. In some of the villages in the savanna the houses have been left standing.

THE UNITED STATES.

MOON RISING IN PHILADELPHIA.—The royal mail-steamship Britannia has arrived with accounts from New York to the 15th ult., and Boston and Halifax to the 14th. The New York papers contain accounts of the renewal of the riots at Philadelphia between the native Americans and the Irish Catholics. The disturbances were of a very serious character, and it is difficult to give an accurate version from such a mass of details as the papers contain, but we believe the following comprises the main incidents of the origin and progress of the affray:—On the 13th ult. a report prevailed that a number of monks had been conveyed by the Irish Catholics to the Church of St. Philip de Neri, in Queen's-street, Southwark, Philadelphia. The report caused much excitement; the street was soon crowded with citizens, the sheriff and two officers were sent for, the building was entered, and ten or a dozen monks were found. A committee of the citizens was subsequently appointed, and, after much consultation, the church was again entered, to search for more monks. It is solemnly asserted, in a document signed by the committee and an alderman, that they were met at the church door by two Irishmen, with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets. These were immediately disarmed. The party entered a room, and found 27 monks. The great was found officiating at the altar; he was seized, and asked if he had any arms or ammunition. He replied in the negative. They subsequently found a quantity of arms, bullets, cartridges, powder, and percussion caps. The excitement increased greatly after this. Crowds poured in from all the surrounding districts, and multitudes appeared to be so threatening, that troops filled the streets, and thereabouts were heard in every quarter against the Irish party, respecting whose intentions the most abject fears were prevalent. On the next day the excitement increased, and a mob assembled before the church in the evening, with appearances so dangerous as to draw to the spot a military force, with two field-pieces, under General Callender. The general threatened to fire unless the crowd dispersed, and promptly arrested and confined in the church Mr. Naylor, an ex-member of Congress, who attempted to interfere. It does not appear, however, that the crowd did disperse, or that the threat was then put into execution. On the contrary, tumultuous proceedings continued during the night. Two pieces of cannon were brought to bear on the church by the mob, and on Sunday morning the doors were battered in, and Naylor released. He besought his rescuers to disperse quietly. They said they would of the Irish military company of "Hibernia Greys" left the church. The soldiers did so, and were pelleted with stones by the mob. Some fell wounded; the rest fired, killing two or three of their assailants, and then attempted to escape. They were pursued by overwhelming numbers, and many of them wounded by their own bayonets, or beaten unmercifully. Meanwhile the church, being undefended, the mob rushed in, tearing and destroying everything within reach; and the riot continued to rage until General Callender again appeared on the scene, and again took possession of the church. This was at eight o'clock on Sunday evening, and for a short time it seemed as if order was about to be restored.

Soon afterwards, however, a new riot broke out, and led to more fatal consequences. It commenced in a collision between another party of the military, called the "Callender Greys," commanded by Captain Hill, and a portion of the mob which they were trying to disperse. The order to fire was given, it is said, without notice, and a murderous discharge took place up and down two of the principal streets. Seven, it is stated, were killed instantly, and a great many, including some females, badly wounded. The crowd fled in all directions, but collected again. A mob broke into a public building containing muskets, carried away a considerable number, and commenced firing on the soldiers, who soon found themselves exposed to an irregular discharge from several positions on every side. The mob soon obtained possession of three cannon, taken from on board two vessels lying in the river. They also had procured a considerable number of muskets and other fire-arms. The cannon were loaded with various substances, one of them with a thirty-foot chain, which was killed or wounded a number of the military, particularly the members of the National Academy, a company of Native Americans. The firing with muskets was kept up busily, and the mob took shelter in, and fired from, the houses and alleys in the vicinity upon the military, who changed their position, and were drawn up in front of St. Philip's Church, which recedes a short distance from the street. The military had obtained the upper hand when the accounts came away, but tranquillity was by no means restored. Several of the rioters had been arrested, and examined on charges of riot, high treason, and murder.

It was impossible to ascertain the numbers killed in these riots. One paper estimates it at 13, and the wounded at upwards of 50.

The New York papers give dreadful accounts of the destruction of property and life by the overflowing of the western rivers. For a region of more than a thousand miles, along the Missouri and Mississippi, above St. Louis, the inhabitants have been deprived of their cattle and crops, and in many instances their houses and barns also; while the soil itself, for hundreds of thousands of acres, has been either actually injured or totally destroyed.

Under the head of "Important from Nauvoo," the New York Herald gives the particulars of the murder of Joe Smith, the prophet of the Mormons, and also of his brother Hyrum. They were murdered in cold blood by a gang of ruffians, who attacked the goal in which the prophet and his brother had been placed for security. There was a tremendous excitement at the west in consequence of their deaths. A dreadful civil war was expected.

The steam-ship Great Western arrived out at New York on the 7th ult. The commercial news from New York is rather more favourable.

The Washington Hotel, a large and handsomely furnished building, situated in Broadway, was destroyed by fire on the 5th ult. Loss, forty thousand dollars.

There has been another boat accident on the Ohio, of which the Cincinnati Gazette gives the following particulars:—The steamer Palatine caught on fire just above the mouth of the Ohio on the 19th. When the alarm was given, the wildest confusion prevailed. A rush was made for the first which was suspended at the stern of the boat; fourteen passengers crowded into it—one of the ropes was cut to prevent others from getting aboard, and all in it were precipitated into the water. Two of them only escaped. The rest, in seeking to avoid death by fire, met it in the flood of waters around them.

MEXICO.

The accounts from Mexico to the 20th of June are important. The Mexican Congress has refused to grant Santa Anna the additional 30,000 men and 4,000,000 of dollars which is required for the invasion of Texas. Mexico, it is stated, has now a force of 30,000 men.

The letters from Monte Video are of the 21st of May. The war there was raging fiercer than ever, and previous very scarce.

IMPORTANT EVENTS AT TAHITI.

It is not many months since that the English public were startled with the announcement of the aggressions of Admiral Dupetit Thouars at the island of Tahiti. His conduct towards the defenceless Queen Pomare excited general indignation here, albeit, some of the excited and unequal spirits of La Jeune France thought proper to do the French Admiral honour and present him with a sword. A correspondent of the Times, a British officer, a title which guarantees the authenticity of his statements and is a sure proof of his personal honour, gives a very interesting narrative of the events which have occurred at the island subsequently to the period when Admiral Dupetit Thouars forced the Queen to accept the so-called Protectorate of France. This correspondent commences by explaining some circumstances connected with the first occupation of Tahiti, which French "triumph-donated" of the sort of persuasion used by the French to induce Queen Pomare to accept of French alliance. He says, in a letter dated Papeete, March 2:—

The paper presented to the Queen was worded in such a jesuitical manner as to deceive Europeans the belief that it was a voluntary act of the Queen; whereas the alternative was the French guns opening on her people, and leaving her without a shelter. The French pretext was on such a wretched basis, of the Queen placing a crown set round with coconut leaves, and not inserting some device to please the French in her private flag, in her flag to bind any one not willing to do so. Some answer was wanted to haul down her flag. This answered for want of a better: 400 marines were landed in presence of two of the Queen's chiefs; her flag was violently taken down, and the French colours then hoisted; they are still flying. The Queen, being apprised that it was the intention to arrest her, and place her eldest son (a boy about seven years old) on a nominal throne, governed by a French regent, fled to her Majesty's ketch, the Bastille. She was received by Lieutenant Hunt, who gave up his accommodations to her Majesty, her husband, and three children, with some other persons of rank. She has resided for several weeks on board this little vessel, not being permitted to land. Some time ago, hearing that her subjects had fled from their houses, had assembled in the mountains, and were in a great state of excitement, of her own accord she despatched a letter, which was signed by the French governor. It has been continued into treason against the Majesty of France. I append an authenticated copy, and mark it No. 1.

The narrative of the British officer proceeds as follows:—

Some of the chiefs were invited in and secured—one of them loaded with iron. They are all confined on board the Bastille. A proclamation was published ten days ago; it is also appended, and marked 2. These chiefs merely fled, degrading the punishment their friends had received.

On Sunday week soldiers came to a house where the Queen's female attendants resided; they threw their things and the Queen's furniture about, turned them out, and have turned the house into a prison. The poor people, having no shelter, have, since then, resided in the French chapel.

The French governor has striven every nerve to put this place into a fit state of defence; he boasts that if two months more he given him, he would defy any ship to enter. The small island in front of the harbour is having an eastern embankment of 32 feet raised on it; 15 32-pounders are to be mounted, also barracks built for the garrison. Commencing the entrance to the harbour barracks are built, and a battery being erected, to be armed with 14 8-pounders. Other works are being constructed behind the town on the rise of the hill. The French war steamer went with the proclamation to prevent the natives passing on the isthmus. Some of them returning to their houses, have been stopped; several have lost their money and other property. The governor has gone with 400 soldiers to erect a fort, and has the people in an Englishman went with him as a pilot to take the frigates and steamers as far as water would permit. The acting governor has issued a proclamation, which I also enclose and mark 3, declaring this place in a state of siege. All English officers are obliged to be on board at eight o'clock P.M. Last night parties were found destroying all English boats based on the beach; a few canoes were seized and dragged to their country have had their property seized. An owner of a vessel, who has just sold it to the French Government, not being able to procure any English house, is residing with his wife and his young children in a native one. He wrote mentioning that his wife is ill, daily expecting for confinement, and requesting he might be permitted to keep a light, but has been refused. He called on the acting governor, informed him of the dangerous state of his wife—the same sympathetic reply was given, that no exception could be made in his favour.

A French officer, high in employ—no less a person than the Commissary-General—the day before yesterday publicly stated, in presence of some Englishmen, that if the natives rose, and are joined by any Englishmen, he would go, and with a pistol, be the first man to shoot Mr. Fritchard, the British consul.

The letter then states that the French commandant of police had arrested Mr. Fritchard, the British Consul; the details of this proceeding will be found in the next page.

The following are the official documents referred to in the narrative of this ominous and disgraceful transaction:—

No. 1.—POMARE'S LETTER TO THE CHIEFS.
Health to you all. I make known to you that our ship of war is about to leave; it has been sent for by the Admiral to return to Oahu. There is here a small ship of war to watch over us—another is coming. Do not listen to the men who will pay you by reporting that we shall not be assisted. Britain will not cast us off. Let our conduct be good, and wait until the despatches arrive.
This is my word to you—do not on any account cease evil to grow. If no more distress the French men. Have great patience. Take me for a pattern, and follow me, and let all of us pray very earnestly to God that he may deliver us from our trials as he formerly did Hachchak.
Peace be with you all.
POMARE.

No. 2.—FRENCH ESTABLISHMENT OF OCEANIA.
In the name of the King of the French. The Governor of the French Possessions to the people of Tahiti.
Tahiti, Kaitaka, Potevau, and Teraite, refused to listen to my word of peace; in consequence I declare them rebels.
Their goods shall be put under sequestration. Eight days are given them to make their submission. The district refusing their refuge shall be laid under a contribution, which shall be fixed according to the importance of the district. The persons friendly to peace and the laws remain tranquil under the protection of France. The severity of the laws shall reach the guilty.

No. 3.—FRENCH ESTABLISHMENT IN OCEANIA.
The commandant for the time being of the Society Islands declares what follows, viz:—
Art. 1. Until the return of his Excellency the Governor, the establishments of the bay comprised between Corcoran Point and the barracks of the Urane are declared in a state of siege.
2. All European and native residents must be within their houses at evening gun-fire, and not receive any person after that hour.
3. After evening gun-fire until that of morning, the patrols, commanded by an officer, and police rounds, commanded by a commissary of police, can demand entrance to open by force and search any house that may appear suspicious, or in which they may suspect a meeting of persons besides those who inhabit the house.
4. At evening gun-fire all the fires in the native houses must be put out.
5. The boats of foreign ships, of whatever nation, must have left the beach at evening gun-fire, taking with them their whole crew and all the passengers who have come on shore during the day. It is forbidden that any officer, sailor, or passenger should sleep on shore.
6. From one gun-fire to the other, foreign ships are warned that, besides the shots to which they would expose their men in sending a boat on shore, the crew of the boat will be arrested, and the boat immediately sunk or destroyed.
7. If the patrol or rounds of gendarmes find in the houses when they visit people who do not reside there, besides the arrest of those persons, of that of the proprietor, the confiscation or immediate destruction of all wine, alcohol, or other spirits, the houses may be destroyed, and their materials transported, at the convenience of the commandant for the time being, to construct guard-houses, inclosures, or useful shelter for the garrison.
8. Whether the establishment preserve its tranquillity, or that it should become disturbed by any cause, it is expressly forbidden to Europeans and native Indians to leave their houses. Those who do not conform to this order will expose themselves not only to arrest, but to the fire of the patrol.
9. The agents of the native police, whose duty it is to watch at night, shall come each night to the barracks of the gendarmes, which they will not leave for their duty without a light, and accompanied by a French gendarme.
10. The officers of the establishments whose duty or any other motive shall require their being out of their house after gun-fire, must have a light.
11. At evening gun-fire, all white-boats and canoes belonging to residents of natives must be hoisted up at least ten times the length of the boat from high-water-mark. Any boat or canoe found afloat after eight o'clock will be sunk or destroyed.
12. All white-boats, boats, canoes, manned by natives, or containing any who may come into the bay, or who may wish to leave it during the day, must come to the station-house, that they may be searched, to make sure that they do not contain alcohol, wine, provisions of war, arms, or anything suspicious.
13. Boats of French men-of-war who wish to come on shore, or remain there, after gun-fire, must be provided with a light as well as the officers of the fleet.
14. It is forbidden to strangers and natives to fire or explode bombs, whether by day or night, in the whole space in the state of siege. Transgressors will be arrested, their arms seized, and their houses searched.

ACCIDENT TO THE STARLIGHT STEAMER.—On Sunday evening, the Starlight, under Charles boat, on her passage down the river, at nine o'clock, ran foul of Westminster bridge, and received such damage as prevented her from making the pier by at least ten feet, at which distance she grounded, fortunately for all on board, at low water. The passengers got safely on shore, and next day the vessel was got afloat, and was towed away to the Company's wharf for repairs.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

A telegraphic dispatch has been received in Paris, which gives the following summary of the news brought by the Overland Mail:

The Indian Mail arrived at Marseilles the 29th July, bringing news from Bombay to the 19th June, and from China to the 1st May.

The fact of Lord Ellenborough's recall was known at Bombay the 6th June, on which an express was immediately dispatched to Calcutta. His lordship would have known his recall, it was expected, by the 15th.

The assembly of the Schlesische diets passed off most orderly, but the result came to be not yet known.

The revolution in the Prussian has as yet had no further consequences than the defeat and murder of King Sig.

The district of Boonahampt has been taken possession of without resistance, and has, it appears, been restored to the Maharajah.

The papers by the Overland Mail have since been delivered in London, and we submit the only details of interest regarding the death of Lord Singh.

On the evening of the 6th of May the troops encountered the enemy, who, however, were to be seen in the day, retreated and took up a strong position in a village named Nourunghat, some distance from the right bank of the Beas. On the morning of the 7th the troops of the state advanced, and the insurgents being drawn out in line a cannonade was commenced. The General Sir Hugh Smith having been mortally wounded by a cannon ball, which crushed both his legs, and received besides a severe cut across the shoulder, one of the generals of the army of Lord Singh asked leave to go and see him. This officer, named G. J. Singh, was on his way met by Lord Singh, by whom, after an altercation, he was shot; his followers immediately fell on Lord Singh and put him to death, and his head having been struck off was forthwith sent to Lahore. Nourunghat Singh also fell in the conflict, having first offered to surrender, but afterwards repented an overture to make a prisoner of him, and the soldiers being deprived of their leaders fled. The news of the victory, and the head of Lord Singh, reached Lahore almost simultaneously between ten and eleven at night, and a salute was immediately ordered to be fired in commemoration of the great victory obtained at Nourunghat by some forty thousand men, with one hundred and twenty guns, over not more than a thousand insurgents. At Lahore it was said that the loss on both sides was one thousand men killed. The wounded were not taken into account.

NEWS FROM CHINA.

The populace of Canton rose against the quarter where the factories are situated, but the tumult was promptly put down.

The following is given as the origin of the dispute at Canton:—It appears some Manilla seamen, belonging to a Swedish ship at anchor at Whampoa, had some quarrel with the Chinese, who began to pelt them with stones, upon which the Manilla men charged the mob, and it is said stabbed a Chinese. The mob, however, after having been dispersed in the first instance, soon returned, and three stones at the women in the Company's garden, and the latter had to take to their boat. As usual in such cases, the mob then assembled in front of the factories in formidable numbers, and some apprehensions were entertained that they might proceed to violence, but a detachment of police and soldiers was sent by the authorities from the city, and the mob was dispersed soon after dark without having done any damage.

MURDER OF THE HON. FENNING MURRAY AND PARTY.—We are sorry to learn from the Hong Kong Gazette, of the 23d April, that Commander the Hon. Fenning Murray, who had proceeded with a couple of vessels to Borneo to form a settlement there, and to establish friendly relations, was betrayed and treacherously murdered, with several of his party, by the Sultan of Culi.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

The following official account has been received of an attempt upon the life of the King of Prussia. The document was issued at Berlin in the form of a circular letter to the Prussian Legations, from Baron Bismarck, the Minister of Foreign Affairs:—

The Lord has presented a great calamity! At the moment that his Majesty, on his journey to Emsbrunn, in Saxony, went into his carriage, in which his Majesty already was seated, for the purpose of driving to the railway terminus, a madman fired both barrels of a double-barrelled pistol at him. One of the balls missed altogether, and the other, without wounding, only left a slight trace on the breast of his Majesty. Her Majesty the Queen escaped the imminent danger by just at the moment accidentally leaning forward; and it is thus that the ball, which otherwise inevitably would have hit the Queen, passed behind her. Their Majesties, notwithstanding this dreadful event, proceeded, nevertheless, on their journey to Emsbrunn, where, Heaven be thanked, they arrived in safety. The perpetrator has been arrested, and has undergone a preliminary examination.

Berlin, July 26.

(Signed)

Bismarck.

The following is an extract from a publication of the Minister of Police on the subject:—

The perpetrator was, with a great deal of caution, saved from the rage of the populace, and committed to the water-house. He has been identified as a man by the name of Teufel, formerly Burgmaster of Stotken, and states, as the motive of his crime, that several petitions for another appointment had been without effect. He has been committed for trial.

Department of Police, Berlin, July 25.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The business transacted was principally of a routine character. The royal assent was given by commission to a number of bills, among which were the Salisbury Disfranchisement Bill, and the Act for the Amendment of the Law relating to the Transfer of Property Bill and the Act for the Amendment of the Law relating to the Transfer of Property Bill and the Act for the Amendment of the Law relating to the Transfer of Property Bill.

The Duke of Buccleugh explained the provisions of the Metropolitan Buildings Bill, and moved the second reading.—Lord Campbell opposed the measure, on the ground that it was an improper interference with private property. On a division, however, the second reading was carried, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The house met at noon, to discuss the Merchant Seamen's Bill, which went through committee. The Criminal Justice (Middlesex) Bill and the Consolidated Erections Bill were read a third time and passed. Several other bills passed through a stage with rapidity.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS AND DONATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in moving the second reading of this bill, stated that the object of it was to remove anomalies in the existing law; and assured the house that the measure was framed in the spirit of peace, and with due consideration to the circumstances of Ireland. The Roman Catholic Church in that country would not accept an endowment from the state, but it was desirable that individuals who were actuated by a spirit of piety should be enabled to contribute to the comfort and independence of that body of persons who were the religious teachers of a large proportion of the population of Ireland. If the bill were accepted in the same spirit, it might, he believed, become the foundation, the cornerstone, of that temple of peace which the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) near him had expressed a confident hope might be raised at no distant time, when the Queen of this realm should visit her Irish dominions, and appear on her throne in the west, actuated, he was sure, by the kindest feelings towards all her subjects, and appealing to the hearts and affections of a generous, a gallant, and a still loyal people.—Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Russell did not put the same construction on the bill, to which they objected, as the Catholics of Ireland considered it might operate to their prejudice. Mr. Russell also said that the Government had not consulted the Roman Catholics respecting the bill.—Lord Alington, on the other hand, returned thanks to the Government for the conciliatory spirit evinced in the measure.—Sir R. Peel defended the Government, professing, in the same tone as Sir J. Graham, their sincere desire to benefit the Roman Catholic population. Sir Robert read extracts from a work of Mr. Scully, showing the disadvantages under which Roman Catholic charities labour in the existing state of the law; and after explaining how these disadvantages are removed by the bill now in progress, appealed to the house whether it must not be discharging to a Government that carries by law the burden of improvement, to be met with these ungenerous comments upon their motives.—A counter-charge ensued, which was chiefly of a religious character, and a motion was made to get rid of the second reading, but eventually the bill was read a second time, by 21 to 5. The bill also went through committee. The house adjourned at half-past ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

ROMAN CATHOLIC PENAL ACTS REPEAL BILL.—The Lord Chancellor moved that the report on this bill be brought up, and entered into a lucid explanation of the grounds upon which it had been framed. Various penal acts against Catholics, passed in barbarous times, were still on the statute books, and it was thought just as well as expedient to repeal them.—Because from their very absurdity and severity it was impossible to enforce them. The Lord Chancellor mentioned twenty-four penal measures against Catholics, of which we select a few samples. For instance, an act of Edward VI. directed a certain form of prayer to be used in all churches, and forbade any person from attending any different form under pain of imprisonment. It was found impossible to compel Catholics to renounce the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope in this realm, and yet persons who did acknowledge it were subject to the penalties of imprisonment, and even high treason. By an act of Elizabeth persons were compelled to attend their parish church at least once a week; and persons who became recalcitrant to the Church of Rome were also subject to the penalties of high treason. Another absurdity was, that every Catholic priest who said mass was liable to a penalty of two hundred marks, and every person who heard it to a penalty of one hundred marks, although it was notorious that mass was now said in all the Catholic churches. The Lord Chancellor then proceeded to say that he now came to another of these penal acts, the Statute of Elizabeth, which required all persons to conform, and provided that all persons who did not attend their parish church should be called upon to conform; and that if they refused or neglected to do so, they should be liable to the penalties of felony if they remained in this country; and further, if they shipped the realm and went abroad, and afterwards returned to this country, they should be liable to the penalties of felony. That act of Elizabeth he also proposed to repeal. The next of these statutes which he proposed to deal with was a part of the same, provided that any person professing the Roman Catholic religion must not be found at any place where three miles from his usual place of abode, under the severest penalties; and whatever might have been the grounds for passing that act originally, in this travelling age it would be considered a most barbarous law. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) Then there was a statute of William and Mary, which enacted that no Catholic should be permitted to come within ten miles of this metropolis. (A laugh.)—The Bishop of London opposed the bill, on the ground that it involved such important interests of the Church that the heads of the establishment ought to be consulted, and that such a measure ought not to be passed at this late period of the session.—Lord Brougham warmly advocated the bill, and ridiculed the idea of maintaining statutes which, from their rigour or absurdity, could not be enforced.—The Bishop of London did not divide the house, and the report on the bill was received.—Adjourned at half-past eight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

There was another interesting sitting to-day, which was devoted to the dispatch of a variety of bills. The following were read a third time and passed:—The Protection of Poultry Bill, (Ireland); the Customs (New South Wales) Bill, the Books and Engravings Bill, the Courts of Common Law Process Bill, the Courts of Common Law Process (Ireland) Bill, the Military Pay Bill, and the Privy Council Bill.

The Earl of Lincoln obtained leave to bring in a bill to empower her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods to form a terrace and esplanade, with convenient landing places for the public, on the Middlesex shore of the river Thames, between Westminster and Blackfriars bridges. The noble earl, however, explained that he did not mean to press the measure this session, his object being merely to give an opportunity of showing the details of it to be considered.

The house was then for some time occupied with business of an unimportant character, and while it was in progress, Mr. Cripps noticed that there were not forty members present. The house was counted, and the fact being ascertained, an adjournment necessarily took place.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house met at twelve in the day. The following bills were successively read a third time and passed:—The Grand Canal (Ireland) Bill, the Spirits (Ireland) Bill, the Pierhead Improvement Bill, the Woods and Forests Accounts Bill, the Clerks to Attorneys Bill, and the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.

Various other bills also underwent discussion.

THE OUTRAGE AT TAHITI.—In answer to questions from Sir C. NAPEIR, Sir R. PEEL said the Government had received accounts from Tahiti, and, presuming on the accuracy of these accounts, which he had no reason whatever to call in question, he did not hesitate to say that a gross outrage, accompanied with gross indignity, had been committed upon the British Consul at that island. (Loud cheers.) Her Majesty's Government received information of that on Monday last, and the first opportunity was taken of making those communications to the French Government which her Majesty's Government considered the circumstances of the case to call for. (Cheers.) That outrage was committed by a person in temporary authority at Papeete. We know that, in fact, it was not committed in consequence of any authority given for that purpose by the French Government; and he must presume, therefore, assuming that the statements we have received were correct—that the French Government would at once make that reparation which this country had a right to require.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S EXPERIMENT.—At the evening sitting, Lord LINGFORD called attention to Captain Warner's discovery and the recent experiment at Brighton, which the noble lord said was either a gross imposition, or else demonstrative of the possession of some formidable destructive power, the exclusive possession of which would be of vast importance to this country. The latter was his belief, which he could not refrain from expressing. All great inventions—gunpowder, steam, and so forth—were matters for incredulity before their powers were developed. Lord Lingford proceeded to give an explanation of the various negotiations which had taken place with the present and preceding Governments. He said, the Board of Admiralty, like all boards, treated the matter with indifference, neglect, and contempt. Lord LINGFORD was dilatory, Sir Robert Peel polite; the friends of Mr. Warner were referred from one department to another; and the commission to which the matter was entrusted required experiments which involved too much expense and disclosure, as well as leaving the question of remuneration without a sufficient guarantee. At first Mr. Warner had asked £40,000 as the value of his two inventions, but he had subsequently agreed to refer it to arbitration, being satisfied that Sir Robert Peel would not act unjustly, on proof of the value and importance of his discoveries. By the liberality of private individuals he had been enabled to make experiments, ending in the device of one of Brighton; and, however destructive the power thus created, its possession by this country would be a preventive of war. Brighton, for instance, could be easily reduced to ashes, but Mr. Warner, with a steamer, could set at defiance any approaching hostile fleet. Lord Lingford concluded by moving for the production of the correspondence between Mr. Warner and the Government.—Sir R. PEEL rose immediately to accord the motion for the correspondence, and gave a full explanation of what had taken place between the Government and Captain Warner, who said he was in possession of two instruments of most destructive power—one called the invisible shell, and the other the long range. Of the latter Captain Warner gave the following account:—"I can project 100 shells of most destructive power, and I can repeat the operation with rapidity. If I throw them into Guinevere, in a few hours not a man would be left alive in the place. (Laughter.) This I can accomplish at almost any distance. By means of my long range I could bombard a fortress, and with a single vessel could cut out a fleet in defiance of the portico. (Hear, hear.) I could have demolished Algiers, instead of merely damaging it, as was done by Lord Exmouth, with his splendid fleet. (Cheers and laughter.) After that I could, with a comparatively small fleet, undertake to destroy Toulon." ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Sir R. PEEL stated that the Government did not wish to treat a person possessed of such a power with disrespect, and detailed the course which had been adopted. He (Sir R. PEEL) had required experiments to be made before competent professional men, whose opinions would guide and guarantee the Government, before it was committed to any pledge. It was a rule, that parties professing to have made discoveries should make the experiments at their own expense; otherwise the Ordnance Office would break down under the weight of applications. That very day, for instance, had brought him four letters from individuals professing to be in possession of secrets as destructive as the "invisible shell." Yet this rule was relaxed in favour of Mr. Warner, who, however, closed the commission appointed by the Government, by his preliminary demand of four hundred thousand pounds. After some further explanations, Sir R. PEEL defended the determination of the Government not to promise payment of any sum whatever, without a previous conviction of the merit, and a thorough knowledge of its efficacy; and he cautioned the house against any departure from this rule.—In the course of the discussion which followed, Sir C. NAPEIR spoke of the experiment in a sarcastic tone, and said there was nothing new in it, that it was performed forty years ago, and that every child fancied he knew of some strong explosive power.—Mr. WALKER treated the experiment of Brighton as ridiculous and childish.—Sir GEORGE CORRIJN said he had received a report from an artillery officer, who had watched the Brighton experiment, and was assured that the explosion was produced by some force like nitrate of silver, or others known to chemists, but which required contact and management, and therefore useless in active service against an enemy. The Government would reward the inventor of a useful and serviceable projectile.—Lord LINGFORD again gave his opinion that the Brighton experiment was a good fait one, and renewed the expression of his confidence in Mr. Warner's destructive powers. The motion for the production of the correspondence was then agreed to.

A debate ensued on a motion of Mr. M. GIBSON, that the house should take into consideration the petition of Mr. Heathcote, a superintendent of factories, dismissed on the allegation of having written an anonymous letter to Mr. Peel, and—Sir J. GRAHAM explained the motives which had induced him to dismiss Mr. Heathcote.—On a division the motion of Mr. Gibson was agreed, and the house adjourned at a quarter to twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Insolvent Debtors' Bill was read a third time and passed. In answer to some questions from the Marquis of CLANRATHEN respecting the late aggression by the French at Tahiti, the Earl of ARBUTHNOT made some remarks in a spirit similar to those of Sir R. Peel in the House of Commons. The noble earl expressed his belief that what had taken place was within the slightest rearrangement or even knowledge on the part of the French Government. I believe (said Lord Arbutnot) that will be a good end to the enemies of peace between the countries, and it will be turned by them to good account. (Hear, hear.) But, my lords, I have every reason to believe that, by the exercise of a spirit of justice and moderation, this unfortunate affair will not lead to serious consequences. (Hear, hear.) I have reason to believe that the French Government will take the same view of the matter that I do. I believe, also, that at this very moment Queen Pomare is restored to full power. The Highways Bill went through committee. The discussion on the Law Courts (Ireland) Bill was by consent adjourned, and their lordships rose at half-past seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

In the morning sitting much miscellaneous business was disposed of. After a short discussion, the Savings Bank Bill was read a third time and passed. The Marriages (Ireland) Bill was committed, and ordered to be read a third time on Saturday.

The South Sea Company's Bill, the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, and the Bishop of London's Estate Bill were read a third time and passed.

Sir James GRAHAM moved the order of the day for going into Committee on the Charitable Bequests (Ireland) Bill, and stated the nature of some amendments which he meant to propose.

The report of the Arts and Crafts Bill was brought up, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow. The remainder of the evening was occupied in discussing the several clauses, thirteen of which, with various amendments, were agreed to.—The house adjourned at a quarter past 11.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Metropolitan Buildings Bill was read a third time and passed, and some formal business was gone through.

Some discussion then took place upon the subject of the recent execution of a British subject at Toulon by the Maltese authorities.—Lord CLANRATHEN stated that her Majesty's Government had taken care that justice should be done in the case of this Maltese. The Earl delayed to return until he consulted the British Government, and the criminal was presently put to death.

On the question that the Railway Bill be read a third time, the Bishop of London moved an amendment to the fifth clause, on the ground that it legalized Sunday railway travelling. At the suggestion of the Duke of Wellington, however, the discussion was postponed till Monday.

Lord WHAMPELDER having moved the third reading of the Unlawful Oaths

(Ireland) Bill, a very long debate arose upon the Irish policy of the Government. The bill was then read a third time and passed, and the house adjourned soon after ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The house assembled at twelve o'clock. Mr. J. YOUNG, the Speaker, was directed to issue his warrant for a new writ for the borough of Dudley, in the room of Thomas Hawkes, Esq., who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' BILL.—On the order of the day being read for going into committee on the Insolvent Debtors' Bill, the Solicitor-General entered into an explanation of the chief provisions of the measure. The bill was divided into three branches: the first related to the law of cessio bonorum; the second, and most important, proposed the abolition of imprisonment for debt in execution under actio; and the third introduced some important amendments into the machinery of the Court of Bankruptcy; and it was his (the Solicitor-General's) earnest and conscientious conviction, that the measure would be attended by the most beneficial effects. The hon. and learned gentleman proceeded to read several passages from the evidence taken before a committee of the house on the subject, the tenor of which went to show that the abolition of imprisonment for debt would not have the effect of abolishing bona fide debts, but only that of making tradesmen more careful. After some discussion the house went into committee on the bill. The clauses were agreed to; after a protracted debate the Chairman reported progress, and the report was received, in order that the bill might be reported and recommissioned on Monday, to enable the Government to introduce the compensation clauses.

In answer to a question from Mr. DENNIS, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he had for some time been in communication with the India Board relative to a new arrangement for a communication with India. He believed that this new plan might be carried into effect on the 1st of Jan., 1845.

After a brief discussion, the Art Union Bill was read a third time and passed. The house then resolved into committee on the Charitable Bequests (Ireland) Bill—Sir J. GRAHAM said he intended to propose several amendments, and, with that view, to recommend the bill. The right hon. baronet stated that these amendments had been framed with a view to meet the objections made to the bill on the other side.—Mr. WALKER said he believed these amendments would be satisfactory. The clauses proposed by Sir JAMES GRAHAM, were read a first time, and the bill was ordered to be recommitted.

The Debtors and Creditors Bill went through committee, and also the Transfer of Property Bill, and the Arms (Ireland) Bill.

The Private Partnerships Bill was read a second time. Mr. HENRY submitted several resolutions respecting Savings' Banks, and moved that they be taken into consideration next session.—The motion was negatived, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER having objected to the principle of printing motions for next session.

The house adjourned at half-past seven o'clock till to-morrow (Saturday).

SENTENCE OF DEATH.—At a court-martial, on board the St. Vincent, 120, in Plymouth Sound, on Wednesday, Admiral Sir D. Milne, Bart., G.C.B., the Commander-in-Chief, President; a private marine, named Joseph Noble, was found guilty of slaying Mr. Pomare, a native prince, of the Malacca, and was sentenced to be hanged at the yard-arm of one of her Majesty's ships. The unfortunate prisoner is recommended to the merciful consideration of the Crown, on account of his good character, and as the assault was committed in a moment of great excitement, and under circumstances which it is hoped will produce a favourable impression on his behalf.

TAHITI.

Intelligence has just been received of a renewed act of French aggression at Tahiti, which Sir Robert Peel, in Parliament, has already characterised as "a gross outrage, accompanied by a gross indignity, committed upon this country in the person of its officer."

By H.M.S. Vindictive, which arrived at Portsmouth on Friday last, there have been received Valparaiso papers to the 1st of May, and correspondence of importance, from which we learn that Mr. Pritchard, our Consul at Otahite (Tahiti), came home with part of his family in the Vindictive, having been exiled from that island by the French authorities in the most arbitrary and unjustifiable manner, without trial or inquiry of any kind, but merely upon the bare suspicion of having influenced Queen Pomare in her unconquerable hatred of the French. A portrait of her Tahitian Majesty, with the details of her deposition by the French, will be found in No. 25 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and the perplexing position of the poor Queen is elsewhere narrated in our present paper.

The facts of Mr. Pritchard's arrest are stated in a letter addressed to the Times, by a British officer, dated "Papeete, March 6," from which it appears that the French commissary-general, on March 4, publicly stated in the presence of some Englishmen, that if the natives rose, and were joined by any Englishman, he would go, and with a pistol be the first man to shoot Mr. Pritchard! This gentleman was, for many years, a missionary at Tahiti; for ten years he has served his country as British Consul; he is beloved by Queen Pomare, respected and looked up to by the people, and universally well spoken of by the commanders of English vessels; all which has rendered him obnoxious to the French. On the morning of his arrest, a placard was stuck up, signed by the captain of a French corvette, according to Mr. Pritchard the rebellion of the natives, and holding his life and property responsible if a drop of French blood were spilt!

The arrest took place as follows: Mr. Pritchard left his house to go on board her Majesty's steamer Cormorant, to see some of the officers; he had only a few yards to walk from his gate to the jetty. The commandant of police, who had been observed all day prowling about, ran out of the guard-house without his hat, seized Mr. Pritchard, and hurried him off, followed by some soldiers. Immediately on hearing it, the commander of the Basilisk, and the British officer above-named, went to the acting Governor, M. d'Aubigny, who refused to tell where Mr. Pritchard was confined. After some demand, he gave a paper to Lieut. Hunt, which he also read aloud: it stated that a French sentinel had been attacked on the night of the 2nd to 3rd of March; and that, in reprisal, he, M. d'Aubigny, had caused to be seized "one Pritchard, the only daily mover and instigator of the disturbance of the natives. His property shall be answerable for all damage occasioned to our establishments by the insurgents; and if French blood is spilt, every drop shall recoil on his head." This document was placed in French, English, and Tahitian, on the different public places. "Thus," adds the correspondent, "has a British subject, and he our Consul, and the representative of the Majesty of England, been treated as a common convict, seized in open day, in the presence of his family, hurried like a vile malefactor along the streets, jeered at by the French soldiers, as he was dragged in front of the barracks."

Mr. Pritchard was then taken to a wretched black-house, or wooden hut, behind the French Governor's house, who, since the exile of the Queen, has occupied her habitation. Here he was kept a close prisoner, no one being allowed access to him; as is proved by the following document issued by the French commandant:—

RELATING TO THE PRISONER WHO HAS BEEN TAKEN.

The head of the department will treat him with kindness and politeness. The soldiers will serve him in every necessary way, sweep his room, make his bed, and keep every thing clean—each thing necessary for a prisoner of distinction will be done.

The prisoner will have light from five A.M. till eight P.M., when at gun-fire the light will be put out. At eight o'clock in the morning a basket can be sent, containing meat, clothes, dressing things, books, &c.; at four P.M. a second basket may be sent when the first shall be returned. Neither strangers nor any of the family of the prisoner can communicate in person with him. The baskets will pass through the soldiers, under the inspection of the commander. All letters addressed to the prisoner must pass through the hands, and under the inspection, of the commander in person, who, when necessary, and that they contain nothing wrong, will let them pass. If the letters are found to be things to the prisoner, he is convenient they will continue; if not, they can be changed, or anything more by applying to the particular commandant.

The sergeant on duty will not suffer any one to come near the barracks—such persons will be ordered off.

It is expressly ordered to the sergeant of the prison-house not to allow the prisoner to leave the basket to mount up the stairs or to see the prisoner, neither to enter under any pretext through the bars.

The mentioned labour will attend each day at eight and nine o'clock to explain to Mr. Pritchard any wishes he may have to give to the people at the prison-house.

Mr. Pritchard was, at length, released from prison, at the intervention of Commander Gordon, on the condition that he was not to be landed on either of the Society Islands. The Consul was compelled to leave his wife and part of his family at Tahiti, as he was not suffered to go to his house for an instant, to make arrangements on their account, or to take any of his papers. The Cormorant brought him from Tahiti to Valparaiso a day or two before the Vindictive left that port. Mr. Pritchard is now in London, and his case is undergoing the strictest investigation by our Government. He has brought with him two of his daughters, whom he received on board from another of the Society Islands, Eimeo. They were on a visit to a missionary there, and the Cormorant remained an hour, in order that they might join their father.

The poor Queen Pomare was still on board the Basilisk, under the protection of the British flag, and wept bitterly on the Cormorant's departure, on seeing Mr. Pritchard, who has been her faithful friend for so many years, thus treated in her own dominions.—Simonde's Colonial Magazine for August.

The three annexed Engravings are from sketches by Mr. Jolliffe, just received, with the intelligence, from Tahiti. The first illustrates the circumstances of the Arrest; the second, the Interior of the Block-house, or Prison; and the third, the Dungeon itself. All may be relied on as faithful representations of the principal stages of this eventful affair.

ENCAMPMENTS OF THE PITMEN IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The unfortunate dispute between the coal-owners and pitmen of the north of England still continues, with as little prospect of an amicable adjustment as ever. It is the longest strike (seventeen weeks), ever recorded of this important branch of our national industry; and its extent may be judged by the fact of 20,000 of the miners petitioning for the interference of the Legislature. As the difference appears to be a matter of wages, principally, we decline entering into details, especially from the very contradictory statements of either party, which have been laid before the public. The owners of the mines provide cottages for their workmen near to the pits in which they are to be employed; these are granted rent free, and as the men refuse to accept of the terms offered them by their masters, the latter have demanded possession of the houses inhabited by the former, and numerous forcible ejections have been made; several defalcations from the men's union, the arrival of many Irishmen, and an importation of Welsh miners, rendering such a step necessary that those willing to work might have the usual accommodations. The old hands, thus driven forth, have betaken themselves to the waste grounds, lanes, and highways, where they have erected temporary huts, those near to Cramlington and Seghill extending about two miles in length; but every here and there in the extensive coal field of Northumberland and Durham, near to the mines, towns and villages are to be seen of those picturesque but wretched abodes of unfortunate creatures, many of whom possessing large families of seven or eight children are huddled in the small space they have been enabled to allot to themselves; further adding to their misery by selling their household goods and necessary covering, which, from the glut of the market, bring but very small prices.

Heretofore, all had been peaceful and legal in the behaviour of the ousted men, until within the last few days, when fearful symptoms of mischief have exhibited themselves by the houses of obnoxious individuals having been fired into. At Waldrige, near Chester-le-Street, some malicious person fired through the window of a Mr. Walker, a deputy, and severely wounded him and his wife, who were asleep in bed: another attempt was made at the house of a "black-leg" at Rainton, but no personal injury accrued. At South Moor colliery, the houses of two men were attacked with fire-arms; but they having placed tables against the windows, the shots (nails) proved harmless. In addition, several petty larcenies have been perpetrated; the ropes of the inclined planes cut, and some wilful destruction of railings and other property. The fears arising from personal injury have caused the South Moor colliery to cease its partial working. A number of Cornish miners, who had entered into engagements with the owners of Ratcliffe colliery, near Warkworth deserted their employment; a reward of £50 was offered for their apprehension, and twenty persons were taken into custody at North Shields, and conveyed back again to their work. The Marquis of Londonderry has addressed his numerous workmen. He has also issued an edict to the shopkeepers of Seaham to prevent the men being supplied by them with goods. Surely, this unhappy dispute might be arranged by some philanthropic and uninterested individuals.

PITMEN ENCAMPED.

DEATH OF DR. DALTON.

Another sun of science hath just set—
But e'en beyond the precincts of the deep
Some tributary stars around him weep
And cast his lustre back upon us yet—
The blaze of genius never all departs
But leaves a twilight gleam—soft—behind,
Enough to interest most careless hearts
Or rouse to rapture the ecstasies of mind?
Happy were he who could a moonlight trace
Of the departed luminary look,
And steal from out the dull and dismal grave
A glimpse of his mind's eternal ghost!

We regret to record the demise of this great and good man, who closed his long and useful life, unexpectedly, but apparently without suffering, at Manchester, on Saturday morning last.

THE LATE DR. DALTON.

On the 18th of April, 1837, Dr. Dalton, then in his 71st year, had a severe attack of paralysis, and a second attack on the 21st of the same month. After an illness of some months, he partially recovered his strength; though his articulation was less distinct than before. On the 17th of May last, he had a third paralytic attack, from which he so far recovered, that on the 19th ult. he attended a meeting of the council of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and received an engrossed copy, on vellum, of a resolution of that society, passed at its annual meeting, recording "their admiration of the zeal and perseverance with which he has deduced the mean pressure and temperature of the atmosphere, and the quantity of rain for each month, and for the whole year; with the prevailing direction and force of the wind at different seasons in this neighbourhood, from a series of more than 200,000 observations, from the end of the year 1793 to the beginning of 1844, being a period of half a century." In this resolution the members of the society earnestly prayed that the venerable philosopher might long be spared to honour their meetings with his presence: within eight days he had ceased to exist. On the occasion of the resolution being presented, the doctor received it sitting, and, being unable to articulate a reply, had prepared one, written with his own hand, which Mr. P. Clare read as follows:—

I feel gratified by this testimony of kind regard offered to me by my old associates of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester. At my age, and under my infirmities, I can only thank you for this manifestation of sentiments, which I heartily reciprocate.

This was the last appearance of the venerable philosopher in the society of which he had so long been the president, and whose proceedings had so long derived honour from his giving to them the sanction of his presence and his name.

On Friday he registered the temperature with his own hand, though he could scarcely hold his pen. Next morning he was found in bed in a state of insensibility, and he died before a surgeon could reach him. The writer of an excellent memoir of the philosopher, in the Manchester Guardian, says:—"On visiting the chamber of death several hours afterwards, we were struck with the serene and placid expression of the countenance of the venerable man, which had the appearance of the healthy repose of a brief half hour, rather than the deep and lasting slumber of the grave. His fine massive head, venerable with the silvery hairs of age, and with the still more characteristic expression of a benighted spirit, with which, even in death, his brow was radiant, was a solemn, but a pleasing picture."

John Dalton was in his 78th year, which he would have completed on the 5th of next month. He was born at Eaglesfield, near Cockerham, in Cumberland, where he attended a school kept by a member of the Society of Friends, until his twelfth year. He then opened a school in his native village. He had an early tendency to mathematical pursuits, and contributed largely to the Gentleman's and Lady's Diaries, from 1794 to 1798. In 1788, he commenced his "Meteorological Observations," which he continued to the day preceding his death. He next accepted the situation of Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, in the New College, Mosley-street, Manchester, from which he withdrew in 1799, when he began to teach mathematics and natural philosophy privately. In 1794 he joined the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and from thence became a constant and liberal contributor to their Memors. In 1803 or 1804, he made his greatest discovery, that of the Atomic Theory, or the application of mathematics to chemistry, described by Davy as the greatest step in modern science.

Dr. Dalton for many years lectured in public at Manchester, first in 1805; and in London at the Royal Institution, in 1804 and 1810. He was elected as Fellow of the Royal Society in 1821 or 1822. On the first opportunity, he was admitted a corresponding member of the Institute of France; and a few years afterwards he was elected one of the Foreign Fellows, of whom the number is very limited. He was President of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, which office he attained in 1817. He was also a member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the Royal Academy of Sciences of Berlin and Munich, and of the Natural History Society of Moscow, an honorary member of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh, and of the Philosophical Societies of Bristol, Cambridge, Leeds, Sheffield, and Yorkshire.

In 1822 he visited France, where he was duly honoured by the Institute. In 1826 he received from the Royal Society, for his scientific discoveries, the first of the gold medals awarded from the munificence of George IV. In 1833 Dr. Dalton had granted him a pension of £150, subsequently increased to £200 per annum. He first attended the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, when held at Cambridge; and through his presence at the next meeting at Oxford, the University presented him with the degree of D.C.L. In 1834, upon a similar occasion, he visited Edinburgh, when the Town Council presented to him the freedom of the city, and the University of Edinburgh the degree of LL.D. In 1835 he once more attended the meeting of the Association in Dublin.

His perseverance was untiring. He paid an annual visit to his native mountains of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and there pursued his investigations of the constitution of the atmosphere. When at home, no sooner was the dust of the morning broken, than Dr. Dalton repaired to his laboratory, where he remained teaching his pupils, and at the same time pursuing his manipulations, till nine at night. These long hours of mental toil were for years protracted in during six days in the week, with the exception of the Thursday afternoon, which Dr. Dalton allowed himself as a period of relaxation.

There is a fine portrait of Dr. Dalton, painted by Allen, whence one engraving has been copied. In 1841 the sum of £200 was raised for a full-length statue of the great philosopher, which was executed by Chantrey, and adorns the entrance hall of the Manchester Royal Institution.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our Manchester Correspondent is informed that what is called the Speaker's Gallery of the House of Commons consists of the front part of the Strangers' Gallery—that is to say, the lower seats partitioned off are devoted to persons who have orders from the Speaker.

"Yamouchee."—We have already stated that we do not intend to translate Yamouchee in our journal.

"H. G."—The copy of the sermon preached on the installation of Sir Charles Lyell has not reached us.

"Doubtless."—Is thanked for the suggestion. How can the sketches be obtained?

"Books."—The paragraph relating to the fall of a portion of Beachy Head is no longer in its details.

"I. K. F."—The dress still worn occasionally in the Highlands of Scotland is not ancient, but an incongruous, fanciful costume. (See Mr. Fitch's remarks on British costumes.) The notice to quit must be given as our correspondent informs.

"I. C."—Caroline, is thanked. The illustrations suggested would be interesting, though severely to place in a newspaper.

"Caroline."—Should refer to a small volume, entitled The Language of Flowers.

"E. F. H."—Castles Chambers.—Thanks; and the interest of the subject has been exhausted.

"N.L."—The portrait in drawing was furnished by a friend of the deceased.

"A Constant Reader."—Agatha, should write to the editor of Simmons's Constitutional Magazine.

"I. H."—Illustration.—We occasionally insert ground plans as well as elevations of buildings.

"Q. in a Corner."—Kingston.—The large print of "London in 1843" can be had by order of any newspaper. We have not room for the paper on the age of Agatha. Write again to the Post-office.

"Pipp."—Should write to any bookseller in Chancery.

"A Subscriber."—Spencerham.—The charge will depend upon the length of the suit.

"Positive Proof."—Apply to the Banker by whom the stock was invested, or to his solicitors.

"A Subscriber."—Common-street.—Thanks.

"A V."—We will see.

"An Old Subscriber."—Dunpatric.—The Harrgate water is highly beneficial in cases of gout, and the accommodations of the place are good. Will you correspond favour as with a description of the New Pump Room, at Harrgate?

"S. O."—Luton, should continue the Saturday's edition, to insure the latest news.

"Reviews."—Next week.

"G. M. D."—Glasgow.—Under consideration.

"O. K."—Boston.—The price of Vol. I. of our journal is 25s.; of Vols. II. and III., 18s. each. The present number is 11s.; and the back numbers may be had by order of any newspaper.

"X. Y. Z."—"S. G."—We do not know the whereabouts of the Orbiting Indians.

"R. W."—Liverpool, and "R. J."—Dudley, are thanked for their correction of our statement last week, that the Rocky Island was wrecked in 1839; whereas the Rocky Island was lost off Puffin Island, August 17, 1831.

"P. W."—Chelsea.—The Royal Union Dictionary, published by John Ainslie, is the latest French dictionary, and has already been much approved of.

"W. B."—New Run; "D. W. H."—Edinburgh; "W. F. G."—Dublin; "H."—Liverpool, will each be entitled to the large print.

"A Birmingham Mailer."—Whenever opportunity offers.

Lives on Down, by "H. H.," are unobtainable.

"W. F. G."—London.—Cricket shall not be forgotten.

"A Subscriber."—Hovehill.—Yes.

"A Subscriber."—Corran.—The portrait in No. 116 represents Mr. Roberts, who lately had a concert at the Music Hall, St. Paul's.

"A Subscriber."—The new American live-axe shall appear next week.

The illustrations of Hamilton's new edition, promised last week, are unobtainable, on account of the great number of engravings in the present number.

"A Subscriber."—Common-street.—Will be favoured us with a sketch?

BURNS' FESTIVAL, ON THE BANKS OF THE DOON.—The commencement of our promised coverage of this grand national festival is unavoidably deferred until next week, when we shall be enabled, not only to present to our readers the portrait and recent illustrations of the genius of Burns, but also the most attractive scenes and incidents of this great and exciting festival, the notice to be completed in our journal of August 17.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1844.

CLOSE as the session is to its termination, the Government does not despair of carrying some measures, which, having been in abeyance for some months, are suddenly revived and pushed through their final stages with great rapidity. The Insolvent Debtors Bill, for instance, will soon become law, and though there has been some jealousy awakened by the measure between Lord

Cottenham and Lord Brougham, as to the preference given to their respective bills on this subject, the committee of the Peers having amalgamated some of the provisions of both, so that the measure is now something like Colman's "two single gentlemen rolled into one," yet the public have reason to rejoice that so much improvement has been effected by it at last, whoever it may belong to. To come safely out of the hands of Lord Brougham seems something like an escape to be thankful for; but the quarrels of their legal lordships having ceased, let the people estimate what they have gained. First, imprisonment is abolished for any debt under £20. This is clear enough from the 40th clause of the bill:—

After the passing of this act, no person shall be taken in execution upon any judgment obtained in any superior court, or county court, or court of requests, or other inferior court for any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed £20, exclusive of the costs of such judgment.

The next clause carries the enactment into immediate effect, by releasing all persons at present in custody for debts under the specified amount. Here is a vast improvement, and the value of the measure will be better estimated when we reflect on the large number of debtors throughout the kingdom rendered incapable of any exertions that might be useful either to their creditors or to themselves; the state, too, of the debtors' prisons attached to the local and inferior courts has been long known to be of the worst description. Even in so large and populous a place as Birmingham, the Secretary of State found it necessary to send down a special inspector to report its condition. Many others were probably worse rather than better. These miserable abodes of misfortune will now be cleared of the greater number of their tenants, never again, we hope, to be similarly occupied. We ascribe the incarceration of this class of debtors to misfortune rather than misconduct, because daily experience proves that the fraudulent debtor avails himself of a too easily given credit on a much larger scale; the sharper and the profligate do not restrict themselves to debts of £20. We appeal to the proceedings of the Insolvent Court for abundant confirmation of our assertion.

The Lord Chancellor has, at the eleventh hour, revived another measure which will do away with many anomalies in our statute-book. The example of the qui tam actions, brought upon the old and forgotten statutes against gaming, seems to have sharpened the perceptions of other parties, placed by the letter of old laws within the gripe of the common informer. The penal laws against the Catholics, passed at various periods between the reigns of Edward VI. and William the Third, though long since repealed, in fact, by time and public opinion, are still existing. They fell into desuetude from the utter injustice and cruelty in which they were conceived and passed; and the vindictive hatred of their authors made them overshoot their mark. The natural sense of justice in the mass of mankind recoiled against their cruel absurdities. The penalties recapitulated by the Lord Chancellor, on Tuesday evening, appear barely credible to the present age; but there they stand on the statute-book, and evidences of what some call the wisdom of our ancestors, but which may more fitly be termed their ignorance, their bigotry, and their love of oppression raging without check. These enactments have long been dead in fact—but, like frozen vipers, it would be possible to revive them, to the working of incalculable mischief. This possibility the Lord Chancellor wishes to destroy. Thousands on thousands do not even know that such laws exist; but now that notice is drawn to them, there is no course open but at once to repeal them. Stimulated by the profit to be derived from penalties and forfeitures, there would soon be no lack of informers undertaking a "holy war" against Papistry; and in such cases the judges would be obliged to carry the enactments into effect, unless released from the disagreeable duty by an "Actions' Suspension Bill." This danger is distinctly pointed out by Lord Campbell; but if any informers have speculated on the chances, they will be disappointed. The enactments in question, having been long dead, will speedily be buried and put out of sight, leaving those who read them as legal curiosities to wonder how they could ever have existed. It is curious that some of the worst of these laws were passed under Charles II., whose mother was a Catholic Princess—whose Catholic subjects were his most zealous defenders—and who, for a great part of his life, owed the bread he ate, and the roof that covered him, to the hospitality of a Catholic King and people. But we must do his memory the justice of saying, that the acts he authorized are far surpassed in oppressiveness and iniquity by those of William III.

APPEAL the sensation caused by the destruction of the John O'Gaunt by Captain, or—as Sir R. Peel calls him—Mr. Warner, the debate in the House of Commons on the subject will be read with some interest. Captain Warner has proved to the satisfaction of the world that he can blow a vessel to pieces. Granted, says Sir R. Peel; but before we buy your secret, we should wish to know something of the modus operandi; can it be applied without preparation on board, or under, or beside the doomed vessel? If it cannot, it is useless, for an enemy must be a very simple one that will let you come near enough to prepare your torpedo, or infernal machine of whatever kind it may be. Then as to the implement called in the reports the "long range;" of that no proof has been given, except on two mysterious vessels blown up "at the close of the last war," unknown to anybody but Captain Warner "and another." All this, says the Prime Minister, who, in such matters, is caution personified, does not satisfy him; he has no doubt that the Captain can do all he says he can; what remains unproved is whether he can do it in such a way as to be practically applied in the "art of war."

to thunder, strike the walls
Of rock-built cities, bounding nations quake,
And monarchs tremble in their capitals.

He who says he could destroy the city of Algiers from a single vessel, and then, after a slight refreshment, cross the Mediterranean, and with the same remnant of his ammunition, lay flat the fortifications of Toulon, is in possession of a marvellous secret. After this, the destruction of ships and fleets, which "are but boards," is a very minor achievement.

The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make
Their city create the vain title bore,
Of lord of tide, and arbiters of war;
These are thy royal and the snowy flocks,
They meet into the great of wars, which war,
Alike the Armada's pride, and spoils of Treason.

To Capt. Warner they can be but toys indeed. Seriously, the power must be a tremendous one, and yet the Government shows no anxiety to possess it. Sir R. Peel says he has so many offers of secrets of the same kind, that if the Board of Ordnance were to test them all, it would have nothing else to do. On the day of the debate he had had four proposals from persons having invented instruments such as destructive as Captain Warner's. In fact that compositions of the most tremendous powers exist, is known to every chemist; nor are proposals to use them in war by any means novelties. Fulton, the first man who applied steam to the propelling of vessels, invented a sub-marine ship-destroyer that was tried by the three Governments of England, France, and America, and came to nothing at last. He could blow up a ship as completely as Captain Warner; but he failed in proving that his plan was practicable if the ship attacked stood on the defensive. This is the point to be demonstrated by Captain Warner; and till he does this, it is quite certain the present Government will not enter into any agreement with him. Nor can we think the Government to blame for its caution: £400,000 is a large sum; the point in dispute is not the possibility of producing certain results—that is admitted—but when a thing is proposed for actual use, it is necessary to ascertain whether the means of effecting these results are adapted to the rough manipulation, and capable of being applied in the midst of the thousand difficulties that must be encountered in the face of an active and skilful enemy, with, perhaps, adverse elements to boot.

CAPTAIN NORTON'S SHELL.

(To the Editor.)

In your paper of Saturday last, after giving a full account of Capt. Warner's successful experiment of Brighton, you also make mention of my sub-marine Perforator Shell. This Shell I constructed about four years ago, in consequence of having read in the "Transactions of the Royal Society," that it would be desirable if a shell could be constructed so as to explode by concussion, on reaching the bottom of the sea; as by that means the depth might be ascertained. This Shell is not applicable to Artillery; but the Commission Shell that I invented, is applicable to Artillery of all sizes, and has been pronounced by the select committee of Artillery Officers at Woolwich, in their official report to the Master-General of the Ordnance, dated 15th October, 1843, to be "simple, safe, and efficacious, being well adapted for horizontal fire with high velocities, and to explode the instant of striking solid substances."

I am, &c., J. NORTON,
U. S. Institution, 25th July. late Captain 34th Regiment.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last her Majesty and Prince Albert took an airing in a pony phaeton, the Prince driving. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their accustomed airing to-day. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite and the household attended, en masse, to the morning in the private chapel of the Castle. The Royal Family were taken out in an open carriage this afternoon.

Monday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the pleasure grounds of the Castle this morning, and went out in a pony phaeton in the afternoon. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, were taken a drive in an open carriage. His Grace the Duke of Wellington arrived at the Castle this evening, on a visit to her Majesty. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager attended divine service at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, on Sunday. Her Majesty was attended by Countess Dowager and Earl Howe.

Tuesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked as usual this forenoon in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Esquire in Waiting, afterwards went to inspect the Scots Fusilier Guards, on duty here. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Alice were taken airings in the gardens and slopes of the Castle. Her Majesty and the Prince rode out in the afternoon. Sir R. Peel arrived at the Castle this evening from town, on a visit to her Majesty.

Wednesday.—The Queen Dowager paid a visit to the Queen and Prince Albert to-day, at the Castle, from Bushy Park. A breakfast was afterwards served to the royal party, including the Duchess of Kent and Prince Edward of Wales. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, took an airing in a pony carriage; and the royal children were also taken out for a drive.

WINDSOR, Thursday evening.—(From our own Correspondent).—The Queen left the Castle, this evening, between 8 and 9 o'clock, and proceeded, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, through the Slipes, to Adelaide Lodge to breakfast. The infant Royal family were taken for their accustomed airing in the immediate vicinity of the Castle. Sir James Clark, after having had an audience of her Majesty this morning, left the Castle for town, and returned this afternoon. Dr. Lister and Dr. Ferguson have not left Windsor during the day. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Countess Josephine Wrottesley, and attended by Lady Charlotte Dundas, arrived at the Castle, this afternoon. Between six and seven o'clock her Majesty and the Prince Consort took an airing in a pony phaeton and pair in the Home Park; the Queen, in answer to the courteous appearance of the weather, not venturing more than a few minutes drive from the Castle. Notwithstanding her Majesty still continues in good health, and to be in the enjoyment, we rejoice to state, of her usual excellent flow of spirits, it is the opinion of the Queen's medical attendants that the suspicious event, in which every one of her royal and all-cherished subjects is looking forward with intense interest and anxiety, will not be much longer delayed.

PRESENT FROM THE EARL OF ORKNEY TO HER MAJESTY.—Two very beautiful emeralds, found by the Earl of Orkney, upon his estate at Faplow, near Madrashead, have just been presented by his Lordship to the Queen. They have been placed in her Majesty's Azyry, in the Home Park, with the other rare and curious birds belonging to her Majesty, at Windsor.

PRINCE ALBERT'S APARTMENT.—Five tastefully constructed bee-hives (in addition to two others which arrived at Windsor last week), of American manufacture, in the form of castles, were brought to Windsor Castle, on Wednesday morning, by order of Prince Albert, and placed in his Royal Highness's apary, at the Royal Dairy, in the Home Park. By an uniform temperature which is kept up in three fires, the bees are preserved throughout the winter, providing, at the same time, efficiently for the health of the colony, and allowing the surplus honey to be taken in the purest state.

THE DUKE OF WINDSOR'S ENTERTAINMENT TO THE ROYAL FAMILY.—On Wednesday evening the Duke of Windsor gave a magnificent banquet at Aspley House, which was hosted by the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Gloucester, and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The whole of the party had collected in the picture gallery by a quarter to eight, at which hour dinner was announced. The banqueting board, as usual at all the Duke's entertainments, displayed a princely service of gold and silver plate. It is always a rule to have the Portuguese pique on the table when the public and gallant Duke is honoured by the presence of royalty at his table, as on this occasion that magnificent piece of plate was arranged along the centre of the table, occupying nearly the entire extent of the table from top to bottom. On the sideboard, at the south end of the room, was a splendid assemblage of gold ornaments, plate, and the like. The table was lighted from the ceiling by the exquisite modelled gold chandelier, given to the Duke by the Corporation of the City of London, which, from that fact, are highly prized by his Grace. Covers were laid for thirty-four. It was nearly ten when the dinner circle raised to the saloon, and there partook of tea and coffee. The concert took place in the Waterloo Gallery—the spacious and richly-embellished apartment where the Waterloo banquet is annually held.

BANQUET AT HOLDENESS HOUSE.—The Marquis of Londonderry gave a princely entertainment on Monday evening, at Holdeness House, to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and a distinguished circle of the nobility. The banquet was succeeded by a soirée musicale, the invitations to which included nearly all the fashionable world in town.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Wednesday, at Trentham, Staffordshire, the Marquis of Lorn, son of the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, led to the altar the youthful and lovely Lady Elizabeth Gower, eldest daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of York, and many distinguished persons were present. The happy event called forth much joy and strong public demonstrations in the neighbourhood, among all classes.

DEATH OF DOWAGER LADY ASHTOWN.—The Dowager Lady Ashtown died at Dublin, a few days since. Her ladyship, who was only daughter and heiress of Dr. Robinson, married, 25th May, 1783, the late Lord Ashtown, who died in 1840. There was no issue by her marriage with his lordship, the title on his death devolving upon his nephew, the present lord.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

MORPETH, July 25.—The foundation of an intended new church has this day been laid in this town by Lord Alaric. The church is dedicated in memory of St. James the Great.

We have to announce the death of the Rev. Dr. Lawrence Gardner, rector of St. Philip's, Birmingham, who expired, on Friday week, at Sanson, near Shrewsbury, at the age of 76. In addition to holding the above valuable living, he was canon residentiary of Lichfield.

CONFIRMATION.—On Wednesday morning the Lord Bishop of Winchester held a general confirmation in the parish church of Oldham, Hants, when upwards of four hundred youthful candidates were admitted to the solemn rite. The right reverend prelate delivered a highly impressive charge. His lordship intends holding a series of confirmations in Guernsey and Jersey during the course of the autumn.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign Office, which was attended by all the Ministers. The Council broke up about half-past four o'clock.

THE NAVIGATION OF THE RIVER.—In pursuance of the recommendation of the Lord Mayor, the Navigation Committee and the Watermen's Committee have suggested some regulations for the navigation of the various steam-boats on the river. The attempt as proposed by these rules are, that in future no steam-boat is to carry beyond a certain number of passengers, according to its tonnage, and that proper persons are to be appointed to see that the regulation is not violated; and also that no boat is to be permitted to go beyond a certain rate of speed; and the places of embarkation are to be upon a secure and uniform footing. At a meeting of the Court of Common Council on Wednesday, the report of the Navigation Committee relative to steam boats was agreed to, and referred back to the committee to be carried into execution.

A NEW STREET TO BIRMINGHAM.—The Commissioners of Sewers for the City have given orders for making a sewer, which is now in course of execution in Broad-street, preparatory to a new street being formed, which it is intended to lead to Edgbaston, passing by the Eagle Tavern, across Sherburn-street, and thence to the new street, which is now in course of execution. Several houses will have to be removed between Broad-street and Chiswell-street for the thoroughfare which, when completed, will open a new line of road from Southwark Bridge and Chiswell-street to Edgbaston. A new church will also be built on the line in Broad-street, for which purpose the old workhouse of the parish of Edgbaston will be taken down.

A STATISTICAL IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths within the metropolis during the week ending Saturday, the 27th ult., amounted to 1,066; the weekly average of the last five weeks being 996, and of the last five years 916. The number of persons who died between the period of birth and the age of 15, amounted during the last week to 245; between 15 and 60, to 330; and from 60 upwards, to 195. The ages of two persons are not stated. Of the total number 514 were males, and 552 females.

NEW PIER AT VAUXHALL-BRIDGE.—A pier for the landing and embarking of passengers by the steam-boats above bridge is in progress of formation at Vauxhall-bridge. It will project into the middle of the river on the east side of the bridge, in the same manner as the erection of a similar kind at Southwark-bridge, the only difference between them being, that the present portion of the pier at Southwark-bridge is carried through the iron work of the arch on to the bridge, the pier at Vauxhall-bridge being carried on the river bed, whereas the passage for the new pier at Vauxhall-bridge will be carried direct from the pier on to the bridge.

FIRE IN THE ROYAL-ARTILLERY.—At about half-past seven o'clock on Wednesday evening, a fire broke out on the extensive premises of Messrs. Roper and H. W. of 233 and 234, High-street, Finsbury. The fire originated in the engine-room, to which place, by the opportune arrival of the engine, and a plentiful supply of water, the damage was confined.

GREENWICH PENITENTIARY DINNER.—On Thursday a meeting of the subscribers to the dinner intended to be given to the Greenwich penitentiaries, in commemoration of the erection of the Nelson Monument, and in memory of the immortal hero, Nelson, was held at Wilby's Rooms, for the purpose of receiving from the committee a report of their proceedings, and the reasons why the dinner had not been held, as well as to give an account of the expenditure of the funds under their control. The meeting was presided over by Admiral Sir Edward Codrington. The report of the committee gave an account of their proceedings from the time they were first appointed to the present time. The amount originally subscribed was £407 7s. 3d., and the balance in hand was £347 6s. 2d. £61 is due, having been expended in printing, &c. It was agreed that medals should be presented to each of the Greenwich penitentiaries, commemorative of Lord Nelson's victories, and the residue of the funds should be divided among the wives, widows, and families of the seamen who participated in Nelson's victories. The value of the medals was stated to be very small. It was also stated that £61 6s. 6d. had been subscribed in response to the Nelson Statue before it was erected. The meeting closed with thanks to the committee for their services.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MR. DUNCAN AND FRANKS O'CONNOR AT BIRMINGHAM.—On Tuesday a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Birmingham was held in the Town Hall for the purpose of giving a "public welcome" to Mr. T. S. Duncan, M.P., on the occasion of his visiting that borough in company with Mr. F. O'Connell. The Mayor was called to the chair, and having explained the object of the meeting, Mr. Clarke, a Chartist, moved a resolution thanking Mr. Duncan for his conduct in regard to the opening of letters at the Post-office, and for his opposition to the Masters and Servants Bill. Mr. Duncan, who was very warmly cheered by the meeting, returned thanks for the honour which had been conferred upon him, and assured the meeting that he had only performed what he felt to be the duty of an independent member of Parliament; but he was proud to find that his services had met with the approbation of the men of Birmingham. A resolution of want of confidence in the present House of Commons was next agreed to, and Mr. F. O'Connell having delivered himself of a speech, the meeting terminated.

CHARGE OF MURDER AGAINST PRIZE FIGHTERS.—Last week an inquest was held at Northampton, on the body of Frederick Fitzhugh, who lost his life in a pugilistic contest with a man named Campbell. It was proved that Fitzhugh's father had said, he would bring his son home a corpse rather than he should give in. The fight was for the sake, in order to decide, according to the slang phrase, which was the best man. The jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the father, and all the secondaries and backers of the men.

BRUTAL MURDER AT LIVERPOOL.—On Sunday last a murder was committed in Peter-street, Liverpool, by a tailor named Owen Leonard, upon his wife, under appalling circumstances. They kept a sort of lodging-house, occupying themselves the ground and upper room, and letting off the second floor to some poor men who gained a precarious livelihood by working about the town. Leonard himself occasionally followed his employment of a journeyman tailor, but from his dissipated and vicious habits, he appears to have been seldom successful in getting any work. It seems that for a long time past Leonard and his wife lived upon the worst possible terms, and that, particularly on Sunday evenings, they kept the neighbourhood in a constant state of turmoil, by fighting with each other, and smashing the chairs and tables of the house. Some of the inhabitants allege that both were in fault upon those occasions, but that they both drank. It was about half-past one o'clock on Sunday morning when the dreadful occurrence took place. The lodgers were asleep and carving in their apartment at the time, when suddenly Leonard rushed into their room, and accused one of them of paying too much attention to his wife. The man denied the charge; an altercation between the parties ensued, which for a time ended by Leonard striking his wife, and the man striking Leonard in return. Leonard subsequently fastened the street door, and in the presence of his son, a lad of thirteen years of age, deliberately took out his razor and began to sharpen the edge, muttering some threats at the same time as to what he intended to do to his wife. In a short time Mrs. Leonard came down stairs, and almost immediately upon her entering the apartment he struck her a blow on the head with his clenched fist, which fell her to the ground. He then caught hold of her by the hair, and with the razor partially cut her throat, first on one side, and then on the other. After he had mangled her in this brutal manner, he suddenly raised the razor and cut off a part of her nose. She being a powerful, muscular woman, made a desperate effort to release herself from his grasp, and in the struggle he gave her another deep cut with the razor upon the left leg, and also two other slashes upon her arms. The female screamed terrifically; so also did the lad, who was present during the transaction; and in a short time the house was surrounded by the people of the neighbourhood. The door was speedily opened, but before an entrance could be effected, the crowd was hindered at seeing the unfortunate woman, from whose neck, legs, and arms blood was flowing profusely, either killed or pushed by her brutal husband down the steps and into the street. Here she lay upon the pavement for a short time in the greatest agony, but at length was removed to the infirmary, where death speedily terminated her sufferings. Leonard was taken into custody upon the instant. The officer found him in the act of washing the blood from his hands, and he discovered the razor under the table. The wretched man was immediately conveyed to Bridewell, but he betrayed but few symptoms of concern at the awful situation in which he has placed himself. He is sixty years of age, of rather diminutive stature, and an Irishman by birth. His wife, also a native of the same country, was about the same age, and extremely corpulent. It is said that Leonard has before made several attempts to cut her throat. He had frequently been jealous of his wife. An inquest was held on Monday on the body of the poor woman. After the witnesses had deposed to the facts, the coroner asked the prisoner, with the usual caution, whether he had anything to say? The prisoner said, "I will say nothing at the present." The coroner then briefly referred to the law of the case. The jury, without retiring from the box, in a few moments returned a verdict of wilful murder against Owen Leonard; and the prisoner was committed on the coroner's warrant to take his trial at the assizes.

SCIENCE OF A CHRISTIAN AT GRAVESEND.—A day or two ago the Rev. G. Harris, minister of one of the churches in the City, committed suicide at apartments he had taken for himself and family, at St. George's terrace, Gravesend. The unfortunate gentleman, who was about forty-eight years of age, left town last Saturday week with his lady and two daughters, in hopes that a change of air would benefit his health, he having for the last three months been in a very desponding state of mind. It appears that at a late hour on Friday night he retired to his bedchamber, Mrs. Harris retiring to rest next. A few seconds only had elapsed before she heard a heavy fall in the room. She immediately rose, and perceiving Mr. Harris lying on the floor, got out of bed, and made the awful discovery that he had laid violent hands on himself. The police were called in, when he was found to have inflicted a mortal gash in his throat with a razor. An inquest was held by Mr. Cartier, on the body, and a verdict of "Temporary insanity" returned.

THE CASE OF POISONING AT KINGSTON.—An inquest, which had been adjourned, was held last week at the Railway Tavern, Kingston New Town, before W. Carter, Esq., on the body of Mrs. Susan Turner, aged 29, who had died very suddenly a few days before, in consequence, as was alleged, of having taken a draught made up by a chemist there, which draught turned out to be tartaric acid, and the husband of the deceased swore that the chemist was drunk when he prepared the medicine. A partial post mortem examination had taken place, but there were no signs of poison. After a great deal of discussion, the jury returned a verdict—"That the deceased died on the 14th day of July, but from what cause we, the jury, have no positive evidence proved to us." This verdict leaves the matter open, and a further investigation is probable.

INCENDIARY FIRE NEAR GRAVESEND.—On Tuesday morning a fire was discovered in a mansion belonging to Thomas Collier, Esq., near Old Milton church, where a large stock of oats, containing thirty-two quarters, was in storage. The efforts of the police and others proved effectual, for the burning stack was escaped unimpaired. The police, from information they received, apprehended a man at the name of Jonathan Rothwell. He was conveyed before Messrs. Oaks and Spencer, the magistrates, at the Town-hall, before whom he underwent an examination. Several witnesses were examined, who proved seeing the prisoner leave the field in which the stack was situated, and proceed up the Milton-road, towards Gravesham; and when taken into custody and brought to the station-house, Sergeant Penson noticed a quantity of oats and straw lodged on his hat and other parts of his attire. The prisoner was remanded.

STRIPPED NERKIE AT NOTTINGHAM.—Some excitement has been produced in the neighbourhood of Fishhill-street, Nottingham, a place inhabited by the lower classes, in consequence of a report that a woman named Burton had admitted poison to her husband. At the inquest, evidence was given to the effect that the deceased's wife had repeatedly threatened her husband, and behaved in the most violent and cruel manner towards him, and several witnesses distinctly swore that she had declared she would give him an inch of cold steel, and that she would poison him out of her sight. It was also proved that, on Friday last night, in the afternoon, deceased's wife sent for a pintworth of arsenic and soap, as she said to kill bugs with; but, although the soap was found, the arsenic could not be traced; and it is believed she administered it to him, as he died in great agony, and much contorted. He was taken ill on the Monday, and expired on the Monday following; but no medical man was called in by his wife, and he was unable to move. The jury, after having all these particulars, wished to have a post mortem examination of the body, and the coroner accordingly adjourned the inquiry. There is no doubt the result will be "Wilful Murder," as the evidence of arsenic in the body has been clearly detected.

RAKE HARBOR AT BIRMINGHAM.—A young man named Stanley Warner, connected with the eastern department of the Birmingham Town and District Bank has absconded with £12,000 in notes. Warner however was soon afterwards apprehended at Chester, and a number of notes were found upon him. He was examined on Monday before the Manchester magistrates and was remanded.

STRIKE OF THE PYRRENS.—The Time Mercury contains an account of another immense meeting of miners held on the Town Moor, Newcastle, on Tuesday, and which was one of the largest during the present strike, there being from 25,000 to 30,000 persons at one time on the ground. Everything was peaceful, but the men expressed a determination to continue the struggle. The cry was, "no surrender."

THE WRECK OF THE JOHN O'GAFFNEY.—On Wednesday a heavy sea removed the hull of the John O'Gauffney, the vessel destroyed off Brighton by Capt. Warner, and after a good washing by the waves, she separated into three pieces, and drifted on the tide towards the Chain Pier. The long boat, attached to the fore-part of the vessel, soon became detached, and drifted ashore eastward of the pier, without having sustained, apparently, the slightest damage. She was immediately seized by several fishermen, who claimed her as their own, but the representative of the lord of the manor stepped in, and put his veto on the boat, and also upon the fragments of the wreck which came ashore piecemeal in the course of the night. The greatest curiosity was evinced by the spectators, some hundreds of whom had assembled upon the beach, to see where the vessel was struck; but what with Captain Warner's destructive power, and the taking of the sea, the vessel literally tumbled to pieces, leaving no possible chance of tracing the exact spot where the vessel was struck.

THE HARVEST.—The harvest has commenced very generally in the south of England, and even the spring crops, such as oats and barley, have turned out better than was expected. Some winter-sown oats have proved very productive, and the crop has been already housed in some places in excellent condition. When the harvest is not commenced, the late splendid weather has advanced the crops so rapidly, that the utmost exertions of the husbandman and the employment of all the hands he can command, will be required to gather it speedily in.

HIGHLAND SHOW AT GLASGOW.—The Scotch papers contain long accounts of the preparations for this meeting, which takes place next week. The entries far exceed those at any previous meeting, and include exhibitors from the most remote, as well as from the highest cultivated districts of Scotland. There are a number from England, and some from Ireland. Among the stock there will be choice specimens of short horns and Leicesters. The implements and machines will be very numerous, the entries, many of them by the most eminent makers in England and Scotland, being very considerable. These two departments, from their great extent and general interest, will be very attractive features in the show-yard. There is to be a trial of new and improved implements and machines. Among the competitors in the stock classes, landlords and tenants come forward, as heretofore, willing to meet each other. The Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Argyll, the Duke of Montrose, the Duke of Sutherland, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and other great names and extensive landed proprietors, are among the exhibitors.

COACH ACCIDENT.—Last week a serious accident occurred by the upsetting of the coach running in connection with the steamers to Edinburgh. It appears that the coach was returning to Stirling by the Carre road, with the passengers who left Glasgow Pier by the evening boat, and while at a sharp and precipitous turn of the road, that part termed the "free road," broke away, and the coach (which was quite full), after running for a short distance, upset. The consequence, we regret to state, was, that one gentleman, Mr. Jaffrey, farmer, Skerich, was killed on the spot; and several individuals more or less severely injured. Another coach was instantly despatched, by which the sufferers, to whom every kindness and attention were paid, were conveyed to Stirling.

IRELAND.

ARRIVAL OF LORD HASTINGS.—The new Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Hastings, arrived in Dublin on Friday last. When the Merlin steamer, which conveyed Lord Hastings, arrived at Kingston, the Right Hon. the Earl of Donoughmore and the Right Hon. Frederick Shaw, the two Privy Counsellors appointed to receive his lordship, immediately proceeded on board. They were accompanied by the Solicitor-General, the Dean of Ossory, Colonel Bowles, and several of the aides-de-camp and officers of the household, and having congratulated Lord Hastings on his safe arrival, signified to his lordship that the Lord Justices were ready to receive him at the Castle. His lordship then landed, attended by the above-mentioned personages; and, amid the continued cheering of the vast crowd which had assembled, proceeded to the railway station, where a special train was in waiting to convey him, and the carriage by which he was accompanied, to Dublin. His lordship appeared to be in the enjoyment of most excellent health, and acknowledged, in the most courteous and affable manner, the cordial greetings with which he was saluted. Upon his arrival at Dublin Castle, Lord Hastings was conducted to the Presence Chamber, where Lord Exchequer the Lord Justices received his lordship, sitting covered under the canopy, as Chief Governors. After the usual ceremonies, his lordship was sworn in an office, the oath having been previously administered by the Archbishop of Dublin and Chief Justice Doherty. His Excellency then held an audience.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association was held in Dublin on Monday. The chairman was the Rev. Mr. Tierney, one of the speakers, who was supported by the Crown to escape subsequently to the motion for a new trial. The text was about fifteen. There was very little to distinguish the proceedings from those of former meetings. An address in answer to Lord Wexford's recent letter to the Association was adopted; its object being to show the reasons which induced the Association to acquiesce in the presence of Repeal members at its meetings.

SUCKING CASE OF HYDROPHOBIA.—The Cork Examiner contains the following:—"Parish is our duty to announce the death of Mrs. Delacour, the second victim to this fearful malady in one family, within the short space of five months. The sad death of the young and graceful girl, the first victim, excited general horror and consternation; but who can describe the feeling with which the announcement of the second death will be received by the public? It appears that the little dog which caused Mrs. Delacour's death, about five months since, killed Mrs. Delacour's face at that time; and she since had a horror of the fatal disease."

HONOR DURING THE HYDROPHOBIA.—A woman, named Catherine Mesny, has been committed to Kilkenny gaol on a charge of having poisoned her husband, to whom she had only been married three weeks. Suspicion attaches to one Thomas Lannon, that he assisted the woman in this unnatural murder, and he also is included in the accusation. The deceased made a dying declaration that the poison was given him by his wife, and that he suspected Lannon to be her accomplice.

ATTEMPTED MURDER.—About eight o'clock, p.m., on the 27th ult., a party of five persons, unknown, with their faces disguised, four of whom were armed with guns, the fifth with a bayonet fixed on a pole, visited a dairy-house, situated at Ballinacree, in the parish of Kilkenny, belonging to Mr. Leonard Keating, assaulted two of the householders, whom they met in the yard, and ordered them to retire into the dwelling, where they were followed by four of the party. The inmates—Andrew Hickey, the steward, four men, and five women servants—were at supper at the time. One of the offenders inquired of the steward, upon which Hickey rushed into an adjoining room, where he was followed by three of the party, who brutally assaulted him, knocked him down, inflicted four bayonet wounds on his body, one of which appears most dangerous, and ordered him to quit his employment in four days. An old woman, named Catherine Herbert, who endeavored to save Hickey, was also seriously assaulted, and two others of the inmates received some slight injuries on the occasion.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE LATE ACCIDENT AT BLACKFRIARS-BRIDGE.—A large concourse of people was attracted to the burial ground of St. Faith, in St. Paul's Churchyard, on Sunday, to witness the interment of the three children of Mr. Hendrick, of Newgate-market, so unfortunately drowned by the accident at Blackfriars-bridge. The three coffins entered the ground in melancholy procession about half-past two, and were all consigned to the same grave. The father was sufficiently recovered to attend as chief mourner.

THE PRISONER IN KENT.—Richard Dodd, the supposed murderer of his father in Colman Park, about a year ago, was examined before the magistrates at Rochester, on Monday last, Sir James Graham having claimed him from the French authorities. The prisoner was confined in a lunatic asylum at Clermont. He wore a light-colored head, and hair over his upper lip. On his entering the office he with a firm step entered the dock. Mr. Hayward, the clerk, having prepared an information against the prisoner, exhibited by Thos. Cooper Bines, a constable of Clermont, charging the prisoner with the murder of Robert Dodd, the prisoner's father, in Colman Park, the seat of the Earl of Darley, on the evening of the 23d of August, 1843. Bines, the officer, prayed for a remand, to enable him to procure the several witnesses to establish the case of the murder against the prisoner. The information was read over to the prisoner, who, with an expression of wildness, said, "You say I am the murderer, you villain." He declined to offer any defence. The magistrates then remanded the prisoner for one week, and to be brought up again next Monday. On the 1st inst. the officer, he returned to the Court, and said, "It is true; and I have got the money."

ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SCISSORS.—On Monday evening great excitement prevailed in the parishes of Wandsworth and Battersea, in consequence of a woman having attempted the murder of her two children, and her own destruction. On the evening in question, about five o'clock, a woman about twenty-six years of age, named Amelia Alfred, left her home at the water-side, Wandsworth, with her two children, a girl and a boy, aged respectively six and five years, and proceeded on to Wandsworth-common, to a large and deep pond called the "Black Sea." Whilst standing on the margin of the pond she told the two children to her waist, and then precipitated herself into the water. The bank was shivering, and the water was rather shallow at that point, but as she descended was the wretched woman, making away with herself and her two children, she afterwards threw herself on her back, so that the water covered both the children and herself. At this critical period an alarm was given, and they were happily rescued from a watery grave.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—Between eleven and twelve o'clock on Sunday night, James South, the driver, was killed at Iwer Bridge, near West Brayton, where the body now lies. It is supposed that the unfortunate man was going along the baggage to speak to the guard. His head presented a most appalling spectacle.

ACCIDENT ON THE MANCHESTER RAILWAY.—On Monday a fatal accident occurred to a guard of the train which left Bolton for Manchester about three o'clock. The unfortunate man, whose name is James Cooke, was seated in one of the second class carriages, and was putting on the brake as the train was entering the tunnel; but leaning too far over the side of the carriage, his head came in contact with one of the iron pillars of the tunnel, and with such force, owing to the speed of the train at the time, that the skull was dreadfully crushed and fractured. On reaching Prescot the train stopped, and Mr. Dutton, surgeon, of Manchester, who was travelling by it, put into the carriage where the poor man was lying; but the injuries inflicted on the brain were beyond surgical aid, and Cooke expired in about ten minutes after the blow had been received. There appears to be no blame attributable to any one else, but the unfortunate man having imprudently stretched his head but too far over the side of the carriage.

ACCIDENTS ON THE RIVER.—On Wednesday night a collision took place off Woolwich, between the City of Canterbury (steamer) on her passage to London, and the Halifax steamer from Blackwall, on her way to Gravesend. Neither vessel being provided with lights, they came in direct contact, which caused a severe crash, producing a perfect confusion among the passengers of both boats. Both the tugboats were broken off, but no other material damage was done. The Halifax steamer left her moorings at London Bridge on Wednesday afternoon for Scotland, but only proceeded as far as Woolwich when she ran aground, and the passengers were compelled to wait all night. The steward of the Halifax steamer, on Wednesday afternoon, jumped from the vessel into the river, immediately sank, and was drowned.

THE BURNS' FESTIVAL.—This truly national life is in honor of the genius of the poet Burns, and to welcome his sons, will take place on the Banks of Doon, on Tuesday next. The entertainment will be held near the poet's monument, and will consist of a grand procession and banquet; after the latter, the Earl of Eglinton will preside, both Professor Wilson, of Verotham, and the various arrangements of Building, Collection, Music, Poets, Police, Procession, Programmes, and Tracts, are very extensive; a pavilion for some persons, has been erected; festival arches will be raised on the occasion, and a tent will be put up, where entertainment may be had by the humblest pilgrims to the Banks of Doon. An intensely national feeling on the subject pervades Scotland; the gathering of visitors has already commenced; and the Life promises to be a most brilliant recognition of the principle that men, however humble, ought to have his reward. In the two succeeding numbers of our journal, we shall graphically illustrate the festival; what incidents will be recorded by one of the most popular writers in Scotland.

COLONEL STODDART AND CAPTAIN CONNOLLY.—The latest mail has arrived, and we are very sorry to say, confirms the worst news so long apprehended respecting Colonel Stoddart and Captain Connolly. It seems now ascertained beyond a doubt that the gallant officers were executed at Bokoira in the month of June, 1842. The object of Dr. Wolf being thus unduly ended, the reverend gentleman was in lower Bokoira towards the end of May, on his way to Knappe. He has written an official letter, by order of the King of Bokoira, in which the following are stated to be the reasons for the execution of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Connolly. The former had been put to death, first, on account of his having treated royalty with the utmost disrespect on different occasions; secondly, that he had named Musulman, and then returned to the Christian's faith; thirdly, that he had permitted to get letters from England in four months, by which he would be acknowledged and exonerated from Eagle's, and fourteen months had elapsed without receiving any answer, though the King had erected paper khans (post-offices) on his account. And, with regard to Connolly, that he had been put to death for having induced the Kabans of Kaitani Bokoira to wage war against the King of Bokoira, &c.

POSTSCRIPT.

Sir R. Peel is to dine with the Worshipful Company of Clothworkers on Thursday next; and all the rest of Mr. May's Ministers will meet the right honorable baronet at dinner in Clothworkers' Hall.

It was sorry to announce the death of Mr. Ralph Lambton, who had been, since February, 1842, confined to his couch from the effects of a fall while hunting. Mr. Lambton was son of General and Lady Susan Lambton, daughter of the Earl of Northampton, and wife of the late Earl of Durham.

Mr. Stephen, the son of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was yesterday married to Miss Louisa, the daughter of the late Col. Cockburn.

DETENTION OF DR. WOLFF.—The Standard has brought a letter from Constantinople, which mentions the detention of Dr. Wolff by the Amir of Bokoira, under the following circumstances:—The Amir of Bokoira, who, it was said, was to have accompanied Dr. Wolff to England, had been directed on his road from Beirut, by the Amir of that place, to pass a fortnight at the Amir's safe delivery from the hands of the Amir of Bokoira; and the letter, on hearing of this act, had declared that the Englishman should not depart until the Bokoira Amir had been set at liberty.

BOURNE'S COAT AND RING.—The annual rowing match for a coat and badge, left by Deppert, the comedian, took place on Thursday. The distance, as usual, was from the Swan, at Lemon-brook, to the Swan, at Chelsea, five miles, against tide. The prize was won by Frederick Lutz, of Lambeth. The other competitors came in thus:—William Wingeat, Battersea; 2 John Thomas Silver, Chertsey; 3 William Tunson, Islington; 4 Thomas Savage, Alderman Street, 5.

COURT MARTIAL AT THE INSIGATION OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.—A court martial was held at Brest on Wednesday, on board the ship St. Vincent, for the trial of Louis E. K. Gray, late commander of her Majesty's frigate Bonetta, on several charges, framed in consequence of the complaint of the French Government. The chief charge was for disobedience of orders on the coast of Africa, on the 4th of July, 1842, in causing the French vessel Leux d'Albuquerque to be detained and searched, she having at the time displayed the proper colors indicating the nation to which she belonged, and no redress being stated for suspecting such colors to be false; and he, the said Louis, Edward Evans Gray, had possessed the necessary French papers to authorize his detention and detaining French vessels. Next was heard in support of the accusation; and the prisoner having requested time for his defence, the trial was adjourned.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.—On Thursday morning a fire broke out in a long range of building belonging to Messrs. Norton and Son, who deal in oils and waggons-builders, George-road, Brompton. The fire originated in the paint warehouse, through the spontaneous ignition of a quantity of lamp-black. Notwithstanding that there was a good supply of water, the firemen could not prevent the almost total destruction of that portion of the premises where the flames commenced. About two hours previously a fire broke out upon the like cause, in a large stack of tan standing on the premises of Mr. Bottom, land-droper, situated in the Willow-walk, Brompton.

JOSEPH ADY AGAIN.—Joseph Ady, who, some years since, made himself so well known by his attempts to obtain money upon pretence of communicating something of advantage to his employers, has again made his appearance before Sir Peter Laurie, at the Mansion House. He was charged with sending a circular to a magistrate of Scotland, Mr. Holman, with the old story, and with pretending to have the authority of Sir Peter for his offer. Sir Peter, the worthy alderman, cautioned Ady not to make use of his name again, and showed him to depart, which he did amidst general laughter.

THE LATE ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN HYDROPHOBIA.—Mr. Smith is progressing most satisfactorily, and all dangerous symptoms have disappeared, although the bullet has not yet been extracted.

FOREIGN.

The latest accounts from Paris state, that the accident in the Champs Elysees, while the fireworks were being discharged, was more serious than was at first supposed. The number of persons wounded and bruised amounted to fourteen. Of these, nine were able to return home after being bled and otherwise attended to. Several females were carried away fainting, and there is reason to believe that seven or eight, at least, are dead. A little girl, 12 years of age, was taken dead into the guard-house; and of five persons, a man and four women, who were conveyed to the hospital, one (the man) is since dead, and a woman was considered in imminent danger.

Accounts had been received in Paris of a railway accident. The 5 o'clock train from Montpellier to Arles, on arriving on Monday, near the Villeneuve station, ran into some waggons that had stopped there. The wheels broke the chains which held the waggons, and they ran off the rails and were overturned. Three persons were killed, and four others slightly injured.

THE ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—The arrested men the latest particulars which have been received relative to the attempt to murder His Prussian Majesty. The balls discharged from the gun of the assassin, Trenchard, have been found in the panels of the carriage. The assassin, who was not violent, having been delivered up to justice, the King and Queen, accompanied by their family, but it was such great difficulty that the police officers were kept in an incessant summary punishment on the traitor. The allusion to an assassination amongst all classes of Prussian subjects, and a great excitement, is it is stated, up in all the churches of Berlin for the happy deliverance of such a great and diabolical attempt on his life.

GOODWOOD RACES.—1844.

GOODWOOD HOUSE—SCENE IN THE PARK.

A PANORAMA OF GOODWOOD RACES.

"Richmond! right well hast thou acquitted thee."—SHAKESPEARE.

Since the days of Meleager, Pelops, and Iphitus, there never was such an exhibition of gorgeous games and proud pageantry as the present week witnessed in the domain of the Leazes. Elys and Olympia were places of account, no doubt, and famous for their chariots and their horses, but all Asia Minor could not have furnished a single turn-out like those which crowded in battalions to Goodwood: neither could the round world—Araby the blest to boot—have supplied a courier to compete with the meanness that trode its sod. This first of English meetings had its origin in 1802—a course for the purpose of horse-racing having been formed in 1811 on the heights of the park known as the "Harroway." There the sports of the turf flourished more or less till the season of 1830, when the magni-

Grand Stand was opened, and their golden age commenced. As a guide to the progress of their prosperity, it may be stated that the amount of money run for in 1802 was £1001; in 1814, it was £667; in 1814, it was £739; in 1824, it was £6495; and in 1844, there is good reason for believing it will be near eight-and-twenty thousand! We write previous to the conclusion of the four days' running. But to our purpose.

It is Tuesday the 30th of July, and after some mile or so beyond the entrance and the park has been accomplished, the noble home of the Leazes is before us—

The stately homes of England
How beautiful they stand!
Among their tall ancestral trees
O'er all the pleasant land.

Pity the weather is not equally agreeable: the tall trees are bent to the earth by the force of the tempest, and sad havoc is made among cardinals, passeresses, and silk anties by the merciless pelting of the rain. No show is satisfactory to be mixed up with things ad fresco when it showers cats and dogs—but last of all at Goodwood. Our night, therefore, be forgiven for envying the tenants of the fair saloons by which the route lay that conducted into the clouds which enshrouded the race-ground. However, they are left behind at last, and after winning a heavy way to the summit we are on the course. Here all is perfection, whether as regards the site, the view—the unequalled view from it, or the business arrangements, their style and their facilities. The agent of this excellence is Lord George Bentinck, by whom they were suggested, planned, and under whose supervision they have been carried out. Among the most extensive masters of race-horses ever known in this country, his lordship takes first place; and he is second to none in enterprise or general knowledge of the arts and mysteries of the turf. In the manner of his dealing with the infamously famous Running Rein case he conferred a boon on all the friends of our first national sport, which they are commemorating with a fitting spirit. The testimonial it is proposed to present him with, in memory of his efforts on that occasion, will be worthy of those who give and him that receives: we hope to give an engraving of it in these pages.

But more on the arena of sport: the course is unaltered; the system of turning has been adopted, and the effects of the long drought thus neutralized—this is the only novelty: all was perfect before. At half-past twelve the opening race was started for—the Craven Stakes—and at seven, the Innkeepers' Plate, the best, was decided—with half hour intervals between each, kept with chronological precision. This is the best indication of the amount of racing, its quality will come out in the sequel. We only advert to the principal events—to touch upon them all would be to transform the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS into the Racing Calendar. The rich 300 sovs. stakes, 10 subscribers, witnessed the lamentable defeat of the once invincible Cuthbertson. His star has set for ever; Aristides has conquered him—a horse before whom it may seem no disgrace to fall; but Aristides is in a questionable position. What's a lord or a horse without a gentler? The Ham Stakes—which might be called those of the golden fleece—the Duke of Richmond's Oaks Billy Refraction was—a bad race. The Gravel, a forecaster of the Leger, brought out eight, whereas five ran the wrong course, and of the three left in libel won slowly, and so as not to increase his Doncaster pretension. As John Day forms one of the Two-year-old Stakes but annually, he carried off the Levant with his Maid of Orleans—in the Oaks and a pretty mare. Such were the issues of account decided on Tuesday; the running was enormous. Wednesday, with one of the great betting races of the summer, the Goodwood Stakes, set in brilliantly; but soon there was storm and rain alternate, but not serious. The match between

THE ROAD.—WAGGONS, ETC.

Lords George Bentinck and Maitland being off, the first affair to strike astonishment was the field and its efforts for the Stewards' Cup. Never was its like seen since the institution of the turf. Some three-and-twenty went, the distance being the 1/2 m., and they entered the rails all abreast, like the course of a storm, and came the serious business of the day. For the Goodwood Handicap at least twenty horses have been backed since it came into the market, at all sorts of prices—good for those who had fortune, but ruinous for those who were in too great a hurry. At one time the winner, Franchise, was the favourite; but the sporting papers declared she could not win, being no racer, and so they picked out The Era, because he had just won two crack events. A field of nineteen was admirably started for it by Lord George Bentinck, and, after an indifferent race—for, notwithstanding the great distance, none were tired off—Franchise did win in a canter—to the dismay of more than one of Tattersall's betters. And with this we take leave of the racing, turning to look at the fun, while the performers are discharging the important duty of "weighing in."

Thursday, the day of gala and festival, opened with sunshine and brightness, but soon came clouds, storm, and then a deluge of rain, and thus it lasted till late in the afternoon, to the damage and discomfort of holiday suits and holiday people. The grandees in the stand of course escaped—they were born with silver spoons in their mouths. The racing was good of its kind, and very full of interest for those concerned, till four o'clock brought on the Cup, in which everybody was concerned. A fair average field came to the post for it, against which they backed Alice Hawthorn at 2 to 1 on her! Franchise in petticoats! The start was a good one—Anlier only running out for the judge's chair, but soon settling to his work. No description can be done up for the race—the mare took the lead soon after making the first turn—led from end to end at her own pace—and won in a canter, hand in hand, by three lengths; Phylaxia second, for the £100; and Era third, for the £50; places that might have been reversed had the latter finished a little more earnestly. We must not forget to notice the match between Lord G. Bentinck and Maitland, which preceded the Cup—won by the latter after a race most creditable to gentlemen, or rather noblemen jockeys. The Racing Stakes, Needful win, being Mr. Gratwicke's first winning since he carried off the Derby with Frederick in 1829! The 200 Sovs. Sweepstakes, all forfeit. Mr. Worsfold won with Brother to Witniss, and this was the chief event of the day disposed of, when at five p. m. we left the course—in the hope of re-riding it many—many years to come.

On Friday the races commenced with the Bathurst Stakes which were run a dead heat by Lord Maitland's Mechanic and Lord George Bentinck's Naworth. The Nassau Stakes were won by Lord George Bentinck's All-round-my-Rat. The Chesterfield Cup followed, which was closely won by a head by Lord Chesterfield's Knight of the Whistle; Lord Eglington's Pompey being second.

On each of the days, the Stand, more particularly that portion of it appropriated to the reception of the Duke and Duchess of Richmond and their distinguished visitors, presented a fair display of rank, elegance, and fashion, and those present were—the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, Marquis of Exeter, Marquis of Normanby, Earl of Sandwich, Earl and Countess of Eglington, Baron Bunsow, Earl of Verulam, Earl of Glasgow, Lord G. Bentinck, Lord Maitland, Lord Duncannon, Lord Macdonald, Lord Paoli, and the ladies Eleanor and Constance Paget, Lord Stanley, Sir R. Peel, Sir W. W. Wynn, Sir J. Shelley, Hon. Colonel and Mrs. Anson, &c. &c.

THE PRIZE PLATE.

The "Goodwood Cup," as the great prize, run for on Thursday, is called by prescription, rather than in accordance with the proper use of terms, is a group in silver, from a design by Mr. F. Howard, the horse being modelled by Mr. Macarty, and the whole executed under the superintendence of Mr. Baily, R.A. The composition represents a well-known passage, in the escape of Charles II., from the Cromwellites, after the defeat of the Royalists, at the battle of Worcester. The passage in the perilsous adventures of the "unkingship," is that in which Charles, disguised as a servant, when riding from the house of Col. Lane to the sea-coast, accompanied by Miss Jane Lane, was almost discovered by a farmer, who, in showing the horse upon which the King and the lady were riding, found out, from his knowledge in his profession or craft, that the animal had been shod in the north, and not in the west of England; the King having said, in reply to his question whence he came, that he was from the west. The entire group is characterised by fidelity and spirit; the horse is well modelled; the figure and position of Charles are excellent; the form and attitude of Miss Lane are very graceful, and the position of the farmer partakes of the general accuracy and life of the composition. The group has been manufactured at the establishment of Messrs. Hunt and Co. (late Messrs. Storey and Mortimer), in Old Bond-street; where, on its return from Windsor Castle, whether it had been sent for the inspection of the Queen and Prince Albert, on Saturday last, it was exhibited to many of the nobility and gentry, both of sporting reputation and lovers of the fine arts. It will be found engraved upon the preceding page.

Two other "Cups," or groups, run for at Goodwood, were manufactured by Messrs. Garrard, of the Haymarket, after designs and models by Mr. Cockerell. One of these is from "Waverley," and represents the Baron of Bradwardine, on horseback, and Gellatly, "the Inverness," lying on the ground, and playing with the baron's hounds. This is a very commendable composition; the horse and hounds are life-like; the costume of the baron is excellent, and his position on the steed very good; the figure of Gellatly is, however, somewhat too subordinate.

The other group represents the touching legend of Llewellyn, who, having met his bride Gwylt covered with blood, concludes that he has destroyed his child, and plunges his sword in his heart; the fact subsequently proving that the horse had saved the life of the child, by destroying a wolf, with whose blood he is covered; which wolf, but for the courage and fidelity of the dog, would have killed the infant. The group includes a horse, Llewellyn embracing his child, a dying dog, and the dead wolf. The treatment of the subject is not quite so successful as in the preceding group; but the design is, altogether, extremely interesting.

CRICKET.

THE GENTLEMEN OF ENGLAND V. THE PLAYERS OF ENGLAND.—This match, throughout which there has been an exhibition of the finest play that has been seen for some years, was brought to a conclusion on Wednesday afternoon, after a contest of three days. The ground, as upon the preceding days, was well attended by the nobles and gentry of the land. At the close of the game on Tuesday evening the players had lost seven of their wickets in the second innings for 131 runs, and on Wednesday morning they added but five more, that number making therefore 136. The gentlemen were accordingly put in for 144 to win, and as they commenced the innings they led far to get them, for when they had lost two of not their best wickets they had scored 21. Mr. A. Hynn, however, lost his wicket without a run, and Mr. Taylor for three, whilst Mr. W. Myss, whose left hand is still very bad, was removed for eight only. There were thus five wickets down for 27 runs, forming a vast contrast with the score of last year in the same match. Mr. Kyraston succeeded Mr. Taylor, and, with Mr. Anson, overruled the house which had thus far set in. The former scored 36, thus contributing 64 to the general total, and the latter 16. Mr. Fredericks was bowled for two, but Mr. Parkington carried out his bat with 30; whilst Captain Inceur made two, and Mr. Spencer, with fine hitting, seven. The total was 103, the gentlemen thus losing by 35 runs.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Accounts have been received of the murder of the crews of two English vessels by the natives of Marjoe, one of the South Sea Islands, early in this year. The first case was that of the Janet of Dunbarton, Capt. Gorman. The brig unfortunately touched at Marjoe, where they were immediately attacked, the boat destroyed, and 27 of their crew seriously wounded. The other was the Two Sisters, a South Sea whaler, commanded by Captain Bond, and every soul of the crew was barbarously murdered. Shortly after her arrival off the coast a large number of the natives of both crews went on board. The crew were at their duties, but unfortunately one of them happened to take a slight liberty with one of the women, and a dreadful slaughter ensued. The natives then plundered the vessel, and in order to carry out their diabolical revenge, fired her, and she was entirely consumed. Five fine ships during the last two years have been captured and destroyed, and their crews murdered, by the savage barbarians of the South Sea Islands.

The Gazette des Tribunaux states, on the authority of a letter from Berlin, that the Prussian Government has come to a resolution to abolish imprisonment for debt in all cases.

The Rio de Janeiro papers give an account of the explosion of a steam-boat which plied between that city and Niterrogi, a village on the opposite shore. The accident occurred on the day before Whit Sunday. About two hundred persons were on board, upwards of thirty of whom were severely injured, and the deaths exceeded seventy. Soon after the explosion the chimney and mainmast fell on the awning, and buried beneath it a number of the passengers, who were thus placed in the greatest jeopardy, as the boiling liquid was fast approaching them; but they were rescued by the great exertions made. The cause of the explosion had not been exactly ascertained, but great neglect must have occurred with respect to the safety valve, the wire of which was so corroded that the pressure must have been 100 lbs. to the square inch when the explosion took place—it ought not to have exceeded 5 lbs!

In consequence of the death of the Duke d'Angoulême, the Duc de Bordeaux has sent the following communication to some of the Courts of Europe:—"Having become, by the death of the Count de Maine (the Duke d'Angoulême, head of the House of Bourbon), I consider it as a duty to protest against the change which has been introduced in France in the legitimate order of succession to the Crown, and to declare that I never will renounce the rights which, according to the ancient laws of France, I hold from my birth. These rights are connected with serious duties which, with the Grace of God, I shall fulfil. I will not, however, exercise those rights until Providence shall in its conviction call me to be truly useful to France. Until that period my intention is, during the exile in which I am forced to live, to assume only the title of the Count de Chambord. It was that which I adopted in leaving France. I desire to retain it in my relations with the Court."

The writer of a letter from Hobart Town, dated March 8, gives the following respecting the individuals connected with the high treason:—"I often see Frost, Williams, and Jones; the former lives a few doors from me, at a grocer's; he is in the counting-house; Williams is a constable; and Jones is a quard to the wall." The above may be relied on as correct.

The coronation of King Oscar of Sweden is to take place on the 21st of August.

The first portion of the Xanthian marbles were selected by Mr. Fellows and his party in their survey of the extensive ruins on the banks of the Xanthus in Asia Minor, have arrived at the British Museum. There were altogether twenty large cases of marbles and casts. The most important of these remains, the Horse and the Chimera Tomy, were left on the ground, in consequence of their great weight; but it is supposed that they, with some other monuments of ancient art, are now on their way to England.

A fitte, on an extensive scale, is about to take place at Dieppe, on the occasion of the erection of a statue to the memory of Admiral Bugeaux. The King of the French has accepted an invitation from the Dieppe authorities to be present at the ceremony, which is to take place at the latter end of next month. There will be three days' rejoicing. All the spare troops from the north of France are to be present, and several ships of war are expected in the roads to salute his Majesty on his arrival.

On Thursday last the Act of Parliament for abolishing the collection of tolls at the different gates in Newcastle, Camberwell, Kennington, and Lambeth, came into operation, and the above gates will soon be open to the road.

A letter from Prestonsburg states that some watermen, while fishing off there a few days ago, caught a skate of the enormous weight of 1291 lbs., and measuring in length six feet three inches; in breadth, five feet nine inches.

One of her Majesty's steam-ships on the Mediterranean station is to proceed immediately to Alexandria, to embark Lord Eldonborough and convey his lordship thence to Malta and Marsaille.

The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the state of Westminster Bridge, has reported that on a review of the whole of the evidence, no case has been made out to justify the committee in recommending to the House the pulling down the present bridge and the constructing a new one. That it is desirable that the inclination of the roadway over the bridge be improved by lowering its summit and raising its extremities. That the parapets of the bridge be lowered as much as practicable and consistent with safety.

It is intended that the terminus of the new tunnel which the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company propose to form under the town of Liverpool shall be at the north end of the town. The company will thus be able to receive and discharge goods and merchandise with ease at both ends of the docks, and merchants and shippers will be able to effect great savings in cartage.

Captain Fisher, R.N., Principal Harbour Master, has succeeded in raising the Atlas, which, it may be remembered, was sunk about five years since, by being run foul of by a steamer, near Brighton Creek, a few miles below Gravesend.

A letter received at Lloyd's, from their agent at Gibraltar, states that the Prince de Joinville appeared off Tannier with his squadron, on the 15th ult., but returned immediately to Cadix, on finding that the English ships Galedonia and Albion had withdrawn from the port of Tannier.

A meteor, proceeding from north-west to south-west, was observed at Nuremberg on the 28th. It appeared like a globe about two inches in diameter, and passed slowly, sending out sparks of great brightness, and a greenish light. It was in a light about half a minute, and in four minutes after it had disappeared a loud explosion and shock took place, which lasted a minute. The same meteor was seen at the same hour at Bamberg, and a number of persons at first thought, on hearing the explosion, that the powder-magazine had blown up.

On Monday the foundation-stone of the new public baths for the working classes, at Edinburg, was laid with much ceremony, and a public procession of the trades of the city. The site is the Low Calton, immediately behind the range of buildings forming the south frontage of Waterloo-place.

Admiral Hamelin, who is to succeed M. Dupetit Thouars in the command of the French station in the Pacific, has sailed from Brestfort in the frigate Virginie.

A letter from Chambéry states that M. Bravais, Professor of Astronomy at Lyons, and M. Martins, Professor of Natural History at Paris, intended ascending Mont Blanc, and remaining there a few days, if possible, for the purpose of resolving several scientific questions. Observations are to be taken during their stay at Chambéry, Geneva, the Grand St. Bernard, and other places, in order to be compared with those taken above. They purposed arriving at the summit of Mont Blanc on the 27th ult., or if the weather was unfavourable, some days later.

We learn from St. Petersburg, July 15, that the health of the Grand Duchess Alexandra continued to inspire great uneasiness in the Imperial family. Dr. Ronge, of Copenhagen, who was sent for by the Emperor, had returned, after having had several consultations with the physicians in regular attendance upon the Grand Duchess.

The attempts to discover the grave of Mozart have not succeeded, but the searches made for it have disclosed that of Glück, which has been found in the cemetery of Walsiedorf, at Vienna. It is covered by a slab, now broken in the middle, and covered with moss, behind a splendid monument, erected to the memory of a rich banker. It bears the following modest inscription:—"Here lies as honest German, a good Christian, and a faithful husband, Christophe Chevalier de Glück, Master of the Art of Music. He died on the 15th November, 1787."

CIRENCESTER ELECTION.—Lord Villiers has commenced his canvass, and there was a report of a League candidate. This, however, is very improbable. The nomination was to take place yesterday.

ART-UNION OF LONDON.—The Society of British Artists held a meeting at their rooms on Tuesday evening last, when it was determined to invite the general body of exhibitors at the Royal Academy and British Institution to meet at the gallery, in Suffolk-street, on Thursday, the 8th of August, for the purpose of settling preliminaries for the re-exhibition of their works in such a way as to afford facilities for the selection of pictures by the prime-holders in the Art-Union of London, the funds of which association will be distributed as soon as the bill now before Parliament for the legislation of art-unions shall have passed into a law. We believe that the members of the Society of British Artists have in a very liberal manner determined, as far as practicable, to afford the use of their gallery in Suffolk-street to such of their brethren in art as may be disposed to avail themselves of it.

GRAND CENTENARY CELEBRATION OF SWISS FREEDOM.—We last week gave a short account of a grand meeting at Basle, to celebrate the fourth centenary of Swiss freedom and the battle of St. Jacques, fought near that town, in 1344. A gentleman, who has just arrived from thence, has furnished us with three additional particulars.—On this occasion two hundred prizes were awarded to the best workmen with the carbine; a tower of temporary buildings was erected in the form of a square, in the centre of which was a Gothic tower, surmounted by the statue of a Swiss warrior, and the flags and arms of the twenty-two cantons, the lower part being reserved for the display of the different prizes. The square was entered by a triumphal arch; one side of this immense building was reserved for the marksmen to exhibit their skill; on the opposite side five thousand persons were seated at dinner, and there was a restaurant from which particular speeches were delivered and toasts proposed. Some idea may be formed of the festivity of the scene, when it is known that twenty-one thousand bottles of wine were drunk on the first day! There were two hundred prizes, for which five thousand carabines contended. Lord V*** (the English nobleman we alluded to in our last) was naturalised, to enable him to contend for the prizes; and, as we before stated, he carried off the third prize.

THE WAYS OF JERUSALEM.

(Written by JOHN CLARK, in March last, in the Northampton Asylum.)
Maid of Jerusalem! by the Dead Sea
I wandered all around, thinking of thee;
I saw thee in ruins, thy kindred Angled,
All fallen and lost by the Ottoman's sword!
I saw thee all there in disconsolate sighs,
Where the fall of thy towers a ruined sleep Lies; (for here showed me the place where Thy father showed me the place where
In thy childhood, where flourished the glory of Thee.)
The place where they fell, and the scenes
Where they lie, (the tomb in her eye)

LETTERS FOR NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS.

1. Never write on both sides of a sheet sent to a newspaper. Your copy must often be cut into many pieces, and a sheet written on both sides is a plague and a sorrow, often delaying the article or the paper. 2. Always keep a copy of your article, unless it be very long. It will be apt to get lost or mislaid among the hazy of an editor's manuscripts if not used immediately, and it is better to have a copy for you to keep a copy than to rely on the editor to return the original. 3. Never send an article to an editor unfinished. When he hears or reads that you have scrawled it off hastily, left it full of imperfections, &c., he mentally resolves to put it quietly in the fire the moment you are out of "the way." 4. Never carry in an article, other than an advertisement, and demand that the editor read it at once, and say whether he will publish it or not. He cannot always spare time at that moment, and he does not, at any rate, want to tell you that you are incapable of handling your subject, should such be the fact, but send in your manuscript, and give him a reasonable time to consider it. 5. Never fall into the serious mistake of imagining that, because a man writes a story hand himself, he is partial to that sort of biography. Remember that he is always writing, and generally at hand to correct any errors in his proofs, while you will not be. Write plainly, if possible; write despatchably, any how, or don't write at all.—Beveridge's Chronicle.

INVENTION OF SUSPENSION BRIDGES BY THE CHINESE SIXTEEN HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

The most remarkable evidence of the mechanical science and skill of the Chinese at this early period, is to be found in their suspended bridges, the invention of which is ascribed to the Han dynasty. According to the concurrent testimony of all their historical and geographical writers, Sheng-leang, the commander-in-chief of the army under Kiao-tson, the first of the Hans, undertook and completed the formation of roads through the mountainous province of Shen-se, to the west of the capital. Hitherto, its lofty hills and deep valleys had rendered communication difficult and circuitous. With a body of 100,000 labourers, he cut passages over the mountains, throwing the removed soil into the valleys, and where this was not sufficient to raise the road to the required height, he constructed bridges, which rested on pillars or abutments. In other places, he conceived and accomplished the daring project of suspending a bridge from one mountain to another across a deep chasm. These bridges, which are called by the Chinese writers very appropriately "flying bridges," and represented to be numerous at the present day, are sometimes so high that they cannot be traversed without alarm. One still existing in Shen-se street has 400 feet from mountain to mountain, over a chasm of 200 feet. Most of these flying bridges are so wide, that four horsemen can ride on them abreast, and balustrades are placed on each side to protect travellers. It is by no means improbable (as M. Pauthier suggests) that as the missionaries in China made known the fact more than a century and a half ago, that the Chinese had suspension bridges, and that many of them were of iron, the last may have been taken from thence for similar constructions by European engineers.—Thurston's History of China.

EXPLOSIVE PROPERTIES OF GUNPOWDER.

M. Pichet has ascertained that gunpowder will not explode unless the grains be compact, and that if the interspaces between them be filled up with finely-powdered charcoal, the gunpowder, if set fire to, will not explode, and will rise slowly. When the powder is removed from the magazine for use, all that is necessary to restore the explosive property is to rub it. M. Pichet made a communication on this subject to the Government, but it does not appear that his plan was put to the test. In Russia, however, it has been tried, and there has been received from M. Faleoff an account of the numerous essays made by the members of a commission, appointed to report on the discovery. M. Faleoff states that the trials were successful.—Moscow Journal.

CAPTAIN WARNER AND THE DISCOVERY OF EXPLOSIVE AGENTS.

Public attention is being still naturally directed to the recent experiment of Captain Warner. We seldom come across particulars connected with it. The Illustrated London News last week published a statement which was calculated to excite some suspicion upon the genuine character of the experiment. The account was, however, of rather an ambiguous character, and was to the effect that some Shrotonian pilots who had been to see the John o' Gaunt previous to the explosion had remarked, as a very unusual circumstance, some ratlin lines between the fore and main mast, down the ship's starboard side (her head then lying to the westward) and passing through an eye-bolt, which was about three inches in circumference. One of the pilots also remarked on board the ship a quantity of new warp (a rope about three inches round, lying on the deck, and wondering what the rope could be for. On the starboard side he had an opportunity of seeing also a ratlin down the ship's side. The day that the vessel was destroyed, the pilots went off towards the ship again, and one of them states that he then saw three ropes of the size of the warp passing from one point under the bulkhead down the ship's side, but separated, as they descended, by two of them passing through the eye-bolts, leaving the centre one in a perpendicular line, taken them.—In answer to this account of the pilots, Captain Warner says, "The mysterious rope was simply a coil, consisting of two new tow ropes, for the purpose of towing the ship. Other ropes, which seem to have perplexed these Shrotonian visitors, were mostly gay ropes, for conducting the large or tow ropes on board the steamer; others were man ropes, hanging over the sides for the most convenient escape of the crew; and I dare say there were ropes towing overboard both ahead and astern, as will happen in stormy ships; and the John o' Gaunt was shewn enough, I dare say; though I pledge you my honour I was never on board her from the time she left Gravesend, ten days before." Capt. Warner, by way of clincher to sceptical gentlemen, solemnly advises the many correspondents of the papers who have raised doubts about his late feat, to "go and do likewise." A series of lectures has been commenced by Dr. Ryan, at the Polytechnic Institution, on the subject of explosive compounds. The subject of the first lecture tended to show the power the lecturer believed Capt. Warner had used in blowing up the John o' Gaunt. He believed Capt. Warner had used chloride of nitrogen, a most dangerous compound; but, as a great many people believed, he did not suppose that Capt. Warner used a lock or a trigger for the purpose of causing the explosion, for there were innumerable other means at the disposal of the chemist much easier of application, and several of which were more to be depended on.—Capt. Warner's apparently remarkable and extraordinary powerful explosive and destructive agent, whatever it may be, calls to mind a saying of George the Third, in relation to inventions for destroying life in war. Ralph Watson was at a levee, after his successful experiments on his improved gunpowder had been made, when the then Duke of Richmond, Master-General of the Ordnance, informed his Majesty that they were indebted to the Baron for that great improvement in his fabrication. On the latter saying he ought to be rewarded, inasmuch as it was a scandal in a Christian Bishop to instruct men in the mode of destroying mankind, the King answered, "Let not that afflict your conscience, for the quicker the conflict the less the slaughter."—It has been remarked in connection with the discovery of destructive modes of warfare, that the birth of gunpowder was the eternity of civilization. The barbarian was from that moment impotent, and never again could he destroy the works which science had raised and refinement conserved. The confinement of the secret of the Greek fire so long to the Western Empire indicates a most ignorant and uninquiring age; and yet gunpowder, like steam, was a play-thing with boys in the streets two thousand years before its man-deceiving qualities were known. Usually the discovery is ascribed to Roger Bacon; and, like true-born Romans, we contend against the claims set up by the Germans to the Ludwig of the fourteenth century—the scientific monk, Bartholomew Schwartz. But the truth is, neither is entitled to any praise. Roger Bacon, in 1276, mentions it, not as a discovery of his, but as a thing so well known that boys used it in the streets in making aquila and rockets! Long before him, Magnus Graeco described the mode of making it; and, what is not a little singular, recommends what is now used in preference—charcoal of willow wood. In a treatise on pyrotechnics, he describes the manner of using it as at the Zoological Gardens of this day.

THE WAY TO EXCITE A ROAR AT THE DINNER-TABLE.

In some societies, jocular stories tell well. The best way of introducing them is to mention poor James Smith and the never-to-be-forgotten Theodore. Then you may rattle off a volley of their best sayings.—"Walking one day with Hook, in winter, we passed a shop with the name of Hawes: 'Oh,' said Theodore, 'fine weather for the surgeons—a nice practice, I've no doubt, during the frost—'

PERPETUAL FREEZING AND PERPETUAL THAW.

Though bad for ships, are very good for Hans. Before I had finished laughing, the name of Thurell, the murderer of Weese, was named. "Ay," asked Hook, "of course you knew why he carried an axe?" "No," I replied. "Because he wished to kill Weese without noise." Or, he continued, "like an old cat?" Because he was the worse for wine." (Weese) Our conversation then turned upon the burning of the Exeter Theatre. "Ay," said Hook, "that's quite theatrical—enter a fire, and a theatre." (Exeter Theatre).—disworth's Augustus.

THE WEALTH OF CHINA.

It is calculated that the Chinese empire contains at least half as much wealth and industry as the remainder of the globe. The great body of the people are much wealthier, and more advanced in knowledge than the inhabitants of any other Asiatic country, and the advantages which their soil and climate give them in the production of valuable articles of export, and the effective demand which their wealth and taste for luxury create for the products of other countries, are such as to render them capable of becoming better customers than the same number of people in the far larger half of Europe and America.—Capt. Pauthier's Chinese.

DAY MARKET.

MUSIC.

PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM.

Two of poor Tom's songs were sung by Fitzwilliam and Edney; but they rather threw a gloom over the scene, by awakening us to the sense of "why we met." Nothing could have been better conducted; the whole arrangements were under the direction of Messrs. Spurlie, Bonser, &c. We must add, by way of postscript, that Mr. John Parry gave, between the second and third parts, his "Explanation of the Polka," which, being encoored, was in the Irish way responded to by "Fayre Rosamond." He certainly is a humorist, ad graviora, and a deserving favourite with all who are acquainted with him in public or private life. Altogether the concert was a rich treat to those who merely went for music's sake, and those also who had its ultimate object in view—to assist the surviving relatives of a Man of Genius!

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT

MENDELSSOHN.—This great composer's music to a version of Sophocles' tragedy of "Antigone" has been performed at the Opéra-Touare, Paris, upwards of thirty times within the last two months. It is truly a most classic production, one which, from its solidity and grandeur, we had not expected to be popular with our Gallic neighbours. We rejoice to see they are becoming more German to the matter of sound music.

FRIGHTFUL MURDER OF A WIFE AND THREE CHILDREN.—At the Nottingham assize, before Lord Beauman, William Saville, aged 39, a frame-work knitter, of New Bedford, was charged with the murder of his wife. There were three other indictments against the prisoner, charging him respectively with having murdered Harriett Saville, Mary Saville, and Thomas Saville, his children. The indictments were sustained by a long chain of circumstances, for which purpose witnesses to the number of 40 were examined. If his evidence had proved that on the month of May last, the prisoner was holding at his house a man named Sutton, known as "Raggy," on the Monday following he had been in the workhouse, but had come out on the Monday following the Tuesday, the crimes in question were alleged to have been committed. It appeared Saville had been paying some attention to a young woman named Kate, and the only motive that suggested itself to the mind for the commission of these awful murders was, that he wished to get his wife out of the way, and rid himself of the embarrassment of his children. It appeared that when the poor woman left the workhouse with her children, she and she would go in search of her husband, and on the following morning, the husband, wife, and children, were seen in Nottingham together. In the afternoon of the same day he was seen alone, and was heard to say he had lost sight of his wife near Manners-street. In the course of the Tuesday evening, Saville was heard to say he supposed his wife had

FORGERY OF COIN ON THE GOVERNMENT OF THE NETHERLANDS.—

FATAL INJURY INFLICTED BY A HUSBAND ON HIS WIFE.—At Clerkenwell police-court, on Tuesday, a man named George Lawson, residing in Charles-street, Haggerston-road, was charged with wounding Frances Lawson, his wife, whereby her life was seriously endangered.—It appeared from the evidence that the prisoner, who is a man of drunken habits, was proceeding at some tavern having been over to his professional object, in the Fox and Frothingham beer-shop, in Clerkenwell-green, on Sunday night last. Having drunk a good deal, he fell asleep in the tap-room, with his head reclining on the table. His wife, who was likewise under the influence of liquor, came in and asked him for money; he did not hear her, upon which she seized him by the arm, and shook him. He immediately jumped up, with a long pipe in his hand. Angry words ensued, and the prisoner thrust the stalk of the pipe into her right eye. The thrust was made with such violence, that the stalk penetrated into her head an inch and a half, and was broken across in the eye, about the eighth of an inch protruding. The woman fell, and bled so profusely that there was a pool of blood on the floor of the tap-room. Police-constable 248 G was called in, but he was so shocked at the woman's appearance, that he fainted, and was carried out of it to a house in a state of insensibility. The prisoner, taking advantage of the condition of the officer, and without attempting to administer the slightest assistance to his wife, ran away, and was not arrested until Monday night, when Doyle, 197 G, arrested him in Haggerston, Islington. The prosecutor was conveyed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, bleeding all the way thither. The house-surgeon considered her life in imminent danger, and she still lies there.—The prisoner, who evinced the utmost indifference at his wife's condition, was remanded for a week, but subsequently admitted to bail.

RIOT AND ASSAULT AT THE ESSEX-ST. FIRE—On Tuesday, at Bow-st.,

was more interested in the work than to act in such a manner, and he ultimately struck him in the breast, after driving him from the gate, saying he would attend to his own interest before that of old Francis. He was next assailed by William Revere, who struck him three times, mostly because he was protecting his master's property, while George Everett held him by the throat to enable James Everett, assisted by Irish, to tell him to the ground, where he received severe lacerations from George Everett, and when he called him to protect him threatened to "do for him" if he attempted to approach. They at length succeeded in tearing up the platform and destroying it. The defendant George Everett held a crowbar, with which he aimed a blow at witness which struck him in the mouth, and had the blow not been ward off by a young man he would have received a very serious injury. After he was repeatedly assaulted a man named Fitzgerald and Revere told him they were paid for what they had done, and if he would pay them they would build up the works again. Richard Everett repeatedly said he belonged to the Western Company, the boats of which stop at the next pier.—Charles Hill, after confirming the statement of the last witness respecting the assault and riot, said that on Monday week it was agreed, in the presence of Inspector Lewis, of the Thames police, that his master should in future make use of half the way without interruption.—In answer to Mr. Child, the witness said it was not the first time an attempt had been made on the works belonging to Mr. Francis, and his bridge was at present in the mill, but persons could get to the pier, unless they were prevented by the tugs, who refused them to go on the other. Other corroborative evidence was given.—Mr. John Tysa stated that shortly before three o'clock on the morning in question he was returning along the Strand to his residence, 10, Rotten-street, when he heard the noise, and, on entering the street, he saw his wife looking out of the window, beseeching him not to proceed further, as he might receive some injury from the mob that had collected. There were several other persons at their window, in great alarm, and, on advancing to the steps of the pier, he found a riot of a most serious nature going on, of which he gave information to the police. On returning, again, he saw the platform struck, and the witness Maynard very seriously injured, and bleeding profusely from his wounds. He drew the attention of the constables to this, as he thought they would be justified in taking some of the assaults into custody, but they refused, and his impression was that they were afraid of being overpowered by numbers.—Mr. Tassell ultimately ordered the defendants to get in bail, themselves in £20 each, and two sureties in £10 each to answer the charge at the assizes.

A letter from Gibraltar states, that while the Prince de Joinville was there, he was present at a ball, given on board her Majesty's ship Vanguard by Capt. Wallis, in honour of his Royal Highness Prince Henry of the Netherlands. The Royal Highness Prince Henry was received on the quarter-deck by Capt. Wallis and his officers, together with the Governor, Sir Robert Wilson. The ball commenced shortly afterwards, and was opened by Prince Henry and Miss Wilson, daughter of the Governor. About an hour afterwards the Prince de Joinville arrived, and danced also with Miss Wilson. His Royal Highness danced in earnest, and retired at an early hour; but Prince Henry remained at the evening, and the greater part of the ladies were honoured by dancing with him in quadrilles, waltzes, the polka, &c.

SOUTHAMPTON MEETING OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.

In our journal of last week we reported the proceedings of this highly important meeting, to "the Dinner in the Pavilion," on Thursday. In the evening there was a grand ball at the Victoria Assembly-rooms, at which between 400 and 500 persons were present.

The meeting may be said virtually to have closed on Thursday but, owing to the sale of cattle and implements announced for Friday, a very large proportion of the distinguished visitors, and a great number of the farmers, remained. At twelve o'clock a general meeting of the Society was held at the Victoria Archery-rooms for the transaction of certain routine business, with which the gathering terminated.

These meetings have been successively held at Oxford, Cambridge, Liverpool, Bristol, and Derby; so that the gathering just ended at Southampton was the sixth of its kind. The result has fully realised the most sanguine anticipations of the Council; and much of this success is attributable to the excellent arrangements of the indefatigable secretary (Mr. Hudson), and Mr. Brandreth Gibbs. The following details will be read with interest. The next meeting is appointed to be held at Shrewsbury.

On Tuesday 1280 persons were admitted to the Implement Show-yard, paying half a crown each, realising £160; on Wednesday 3600 persons were admitted at the same rate, realising £450; on Thursday, 10,300 paid 2s. 6d., previous to twelve o'clock, to view the cattle and implements, and from that hour to six, 13,300 went in at 1s. each, producing £1941. The total receipts for admissions were upwards of £2550. The rush at the doors at twelve o'clock to obtain entrance at the 1s. fee, was far greater than was ever seen at the doors of a theatre on the night of a royal visit. About 5000 persons were brought in from various places by the railway trains on this day, most of them having arrived in the morning; and at half-past two trains began to be dispatched with the persons leaving, who crowded to the terminus in great numbers. Trains continued to be sent off at short intervals up to half-past ten, and during this time 4000 persons were conveyed away, and £1100 was taken for fares. Not the slightest accident occurred to any one of the vast number of people who have travelled on the line during the week. On Tuesday, the arrivals were about 2000, and on Wednesday something more. The steam vessels from Portsmouth and the Island brought on Thursday nearly 1300 passengers. The vessels from the Channel Islands and Weymouth and other places, were also well filled during the Show; and extra coaches were put on all the roads.

The list of the prize stock was given entire in our journal of last week. We now annex a series of illustrations of the most admired specimens.

SHORT-HORNS.

CLASS 1.—To the owner of the best bull calved previously to the 1st of January, 1843, 30 sovs., awarded to Mr. John Cooper, of Bonkwood, Thurgarton, Southwell, Notts., for his short-horned bull, 3 years 1 month and 13 days old, bred by himself.

CLASS 2.—To the owner of the best bull calved since the 1st of January, 1842, and more than 1 year old, 20 sovs., awarded to Mr. W. Foulds, of Kib.

MR. T. M. GOODLAKE'S WADLEY BOAR.

ington, near Southwell, Notts., for his best long-eared boar, 2 years 3 months and 22 days old, bred by Mr. Milward, of Henslow-park, Southwell.

HEREFORD.

CLASS 1.—To the owner of the best bull calved previously to the 1st of

MR. J. LINTON'S LINCOLN AND LEICESTER EWE.

JANUARY, 1843, 39 sovs. awarded to Mr. W. Perry, of Monkland, Leominster, for his Hereford bull, 3 years 7 months and 28 days old, bred by himself.

DEVON.

CLASS 1.—To the owner of the best bull calved previously to the 1st of JANUARY, 1843, 39 sovs. awarded to Mr. G. Turner, of Barton, near Exeter, for his Devon bull, 2 years and 8 months old, bred by himself.

CATTLE OF ANY BREED, OR CROSS.

CLASS 1.—To the owner of the best bull calved previously to the 1st of

MR. E. HARDY'S IMPROVED COTSWOLD LAM.

JANUARY, 1843, 30 sovs., awarded to Mr. W. Brice, of Tolpuddle, near Dorchester, for his pure long-horned bull, 4 years and 5 months old, bred by the late Mr. Thomas Wyatt, of Hanwell-park, near Bantury.

FIGS.

CLASS 2.—To the owner of the second best do. do., 5 sovs., awarded to Mr. T. M. Goodlake, of Wadley-house, near Farnington, for his bear of the Wadley breed, 1 year and 2 months old, bred by himself.

FIVE TILE MACHINE.

CLASS 2.—To the owner of the best boar of a small breed, 10 sovs., awarded to Mr. W. F. Hobbs, of Marks-hall, Knebworth, Essex, for his improved Essex boar, 18 months old, bred by himself.

CLASS 3.—To the owner of the best pen of three breeding sow-pigs, of the same litter, above 4 and under 9 months old, 10 sovs., awarded to Mr. J. House, of Bretwell, near Warcham, Dorset, for his pen of three Dorsetshire sow-pigs, 34 weeks old, bred by himself. The sire of these pigs was bred by Mr. Fisher Hobbs.

SHEEP.

CLASS 2.—To the owner of the second best ram, 15 sovs., awarded to Mr. E. Hardy, of Sevenhampton, Andoverford, Gloucestershire, for his improved Cotswold ram, 40 months old, bred by himself.

CLASS 3.—To the owner of the best ram of any other age, 20 sovs., awarded to Mr. Thomas Hutton, of Upton Gray, Odiham, Hants, for his Hampshire Down ram, 29 months old, bred by himself.

CLASS 4.—To the owner of the second-best ditto ditto, 5 sovs., awarded to Mr. James Linton, of Henningford Abbots, St. Ives, Hants, for his pen of five Lincoln and Leicester ewes, 16 months old, bred by himself.

PRIZE IMPLEMENTS.

Among the prize implements were Messrs. Ransome's light and heavy land ploughs, each £10 and silver medal; Mr. Garrett's drill, £20 and silver medal; Mr. J. Smyth's turnip drill, depositing manure with the seed, £10 and silver medal; the Earl of Ducie, the Uley cultivator, and a patent chaff-cutter, for each £10 and a silver medal; Messrs. Ransome's hand-draining tile and pipe machine, £20 and silver medal; Mr. D. Coombe's Oxfordshire waggon, £15 and silver medal; Mr. Hornsby's drill presser, £10 silver medal, &c.; Mr. D. Harker, an expanding horse-hoe, £5; Mr. J. Reid, a subsoil pulveriser, £10; Mr. Crosskill, a chaff-cruiser, £20; Mr. Garrett, a patent horse-hoe, a silver medal; Mr. Cambridge, a steam-engine, £25; Messrs. Ransome, a set of horse-worked with bean-splitters, line-splitters, chaff-cutter, &c., £30; Messrs. Tassier and Fowler, a set of iron machinery for drawing water, silver medal; Karl Durie, a set of screw spanners, silver medal; Mr. R. Stratton, a harvest-cart, silver medal; Karl Durie, a Richmond cart, silver medal; Mr. R. Stratton, an agricultural spring cart, silver medal.

The annexed machine excited considerable attention. It is a compact and simple invention for the manufacture of pipe or D tiles. It consists of a pair of cast-iron cylinders, revolving on a column, which supports the machinery, and is itself secured at top and bottom. A plunger is worked by a rack and pinion, in one (while the other is being filled), which presses out the clay through dies (of brass, and of which there are several sizes) at the bottom.

Price, with six sets of brass dies, for making 1½, 2, 2½, 3, and 4 inch pipe, and one for making common D tiles, £25.

FITZ-STEPHEN.

BY "THE OLD SAILOR."

LYNCH FITZ-STEPHEN was more than full of grief—he was half-crazed with horror; his incoherent expressions startled those who heard them; his feverish, unrelenting attention, at length succeeded in calming the fever of his soul; but he could not wholly subdue the terrible agitation which would at intervals burst out as the thoughts of his friend's untimely fate rushed upon his memory.

Don Sebastian's property and papers were collected together for better security, but not without a secret examination of the latter by Fitz-Stephen, who found amongst the rest of the packages a letter from the old merchant in Bilbao to Lynch's father, hinting at the indiscretions of the young man, and detailing all the particulars of a debt and creditor account between them. There was also another communication from the same source, which was to be delivered or not, according to the discretion of the bearer, as circumstances might require or direct. It was overflowing with expressions of kindness and good feeling, and not only candidly explained the real cause of Sebastian undertaking the voyage, but also gave perfect sanction to the young people, should no insurmountable obstacle present itself to prevent their coming together.

To describe the agony of Fitz-Stephen during the perusal of this latter document would be utterly impossible; but after a severe and almost life-destraining struggle, he repressed it; and when they sighted the isles of Azores, he had in a great measure recovered a serenity of demeanour that was foreign to the turmoil in his heart.

It was evening when the vessel came to her anchorage, and the young ship-master was received on shore with joyful greetings by his parents, relatives, and friends. But, when with bitter anguish he told his sorrowful tale of the loss of his fellow-voyager, lamentation and weeping succeeded mirth and pleasure, and the house of cordial welcome became the scene of general mourning. As to Mary, a vivid and glowing imagination had pictured the young Spaniard as comprising every good quality that maiden delicacy ought to esteem. She had prayed for him at the altar, and beheld him in her dreams till a lively and fervent association had mingled with her affections and cheered her days with hopes of soon meeting him. Now, however, the fiat had gone forth, the communion of spirit was dissolved, never to be resumed; the fancied bond which imagination had created was discovered, never to be again united. The blow did indeed fall heavy; the mind had been the depository of her romantic regards and it was the mind that suffered most acutely from the fatal catastrophe; poor Mary sank; her intellects gradually decayed, the long-cherished wishes and anticipations of her heart were destroyed. She sickened and withered under her calamity.

Allen welcomed Lynch with all the sweet refreshing energies of woman's generous love. It is true that she perceived the dark cloud that frequently gathered on his brow; but she attributed it to the melancholy accident that had occurred, and the responsibility which the young man might have attached to himself. She also found him changed in temper, once equally passionate and nervous; but this was ascribed to a similar cause, which she believed true and kindred as might get the better of; and she had acquiesced in the fulfilment of her promise to become his wife as soon as a proper period had elapsed in mourning but respectful remembrance of his friend. Lynch would have hastened their union, but the maiden was inflexible, and devoted the intermediate time to poor Mary, who was fast sinking.

The elder Fitz-Stephen had promptly dispatched advice to the old merchant in Bilbao, acquainting him with the untimely decease of his son; and in the meantime, as he had the office of chief magistrate of the town, he had examined and taken the depositions of the seamen relative to the distressing affair, and collected all the particulars that could be gleaned, which left no doubt in his mind, or in the minds of the community in general, that the young Spaniard had been accidentally drowned.

At length the day for the celebration of the nuptials of Allen and Fitz-Stephen drew near, and the latter was more cheerful and gay as it approached. The maiden had earnestly requested that the ceremony might be conducted privately between the families; but the fathers of both decided that it should be graced with all the splendour which their rank and station in society demanded. General invitations were given and accepted; Irish hospitality embraced all—rich and poor.

The morning was auspicious. The sun shone gloriously in the heavens; the face of the earth was tinged with a rich autumnal hue; the bright waters seemed to dance in gladness; and the flashing banners of the ships gleamed like streaming meteors in the solar beams. The entry, arrayed in their richest apparel, and the peasantry in the finest they could procure, were assembled.

Allen, in her bridal dress, looked more lovely than ever, as she clung to the arm of him to whom she was about to resign the guidance of her future destiny. Poor Mary had, at the entreaty of her friend, summoned sufficient resolution to act as bridesmaid, and smiles were on her pale countenance as she contemplated the expected happiness of her new sister.

And now, encompassed by their friends, whose merry faces and warm hearts afforded encouragement to the bride, the couple stood before the altar, and certainly a more handsome and apparently devoted pair could not have well been found. Lynch had put on a suit of rich purple velvet; gold chains, with heavy links, were hung around his neck; and his black and glossy hair, tastefully yet carefully arranged, spread round a face that nature seemed to have endowed with manly grace, as he gazed with fondness upon the lovely female about to become his wife.

The priest commenced the sacred service; every sound was hushed, every tongue was still, as he proceeded; and almost breathless silence prevailed, when suddenly a loud shouting was heard outside the sacred building, and there was the noise of strife and contention. The priest ceased as the uproar drew nearer, and now it had reached the outer circle of those who stood around the altar. The elder Fitz-Stephen commanded silence, but no one listened to, or at least complied with, the order; he then demanded the cause of such riot in a peremptory printed to the worship of the Deity. He was answered by an officer of justice forcing his way through the crowd, and requesting to see the Mayor. "Is your business, then, so urgent?" asked the elder Fitz-Stephen, as, stepping out prominently before the assembled throng, he addressed the man.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN.

MR. RICE'S ARABESQUE PAINTING IN FRESKO.

The annual distribution of prizes to the candidates whose works had been pronounced most meritorious, took place on Thursday week, as noticed in our last, in the large apartment at Somerset House, which was formerly occupied as the principal exhibition-room of the Royal Academy. The walls were decorated with drawings, casts, &c.; and upon the tables were specimens of designs and manufactures, many of them executed by the pupils, and some procured as patterns for imitation from the late "Exposition" of Manufactures in Paris, which, we understand, have been purchased at a great cost. The room was filled with pupils and with the company invited to witness the distribution of the prizes. Lord Colborne, as President of the Council, took the chair at four o'clock, and he was supported by Lord Westmoreland, Lord Dalhousie, the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, Colonel Wodehouse, R. M. Milnes, Esq., M.P.; H. Labouchere, Esq., M.P.; B. Hawes, Esq., M.P.; W. Gladstone, Esq., senior; H. G. Knight, Esq., M.P.; T. Wyse, Esq., M.P.; Sir R. Westmacott, P. Pusey, Esq., M.P.

Lord Colborne, in opening the business of the day, explained that Prince Albert would have been present, as previously arranged, could the distribution of premiums have taken place previously to his Royal Highness going to Windsor. His lordship then paid an elegant compliment to Mr. Wilson, the director of the Institution, which was received with great applause. Lord Colborne then quitted the chair, which was taken by Mr. Gladstone (the President of the Board of Trade); and Mr. Wilson briefly directed attention to the specimens of the decorative and industrial arts which had been purchased at Paris. These consisted of bronzes, porcelain vases, silks, carpets, and some exquisite pieces of iron-work. A magnificent specimen of carpet, made by a new process, was much admired; it has a pile, resembling our richest Wilton manufacture, and the pattern, a golden plant upon a rich brown ground, is truly superb.

Mr. Gladstone then addressed the company, assuring them that the Ministry felt a lively interest in the success of the Institution, and that no vote in Parliament was more cheerfully made than that for the advancement of the School of Design. The right hon. gentleman concluded by congratulating the meeting on the results of what had been attempted, and then delivered the prizes to the following pupils:—Mr. Silas West, and Mr. George Stewart, arabesque paintings in fresco, five guineas each; Mr. Adam E. Finden, arabesque painting in oil colours, five guineas; Mr. R. Russell, arabesque painting in oil, three guineas; Mr. Walker, design for paper-hanging, two guineas; Mr. John Brown, composition of ornament from flowers, three guineas; Mr. J. Hardwick, design for glass chandelier, five guineas; Mr. George Wallace, and Mr. W. C. Will, designs for a dinner service, in porcelain, each five guineas; Mr. J. Phillip, designs for a sideboard, two guineas; Mr. J. R. Harvey, design for a carpet, three guineas; Mr. J. Strudwick, design for a candlestick, five guineas; Mr. John Brown, design for silk hangings, three guineas; Mr. W. C. Will and Mr. J. R. Harvey, coloured design for a pressed druggist, each three guineas; Mr. H. Armstrong, ornamental modelling, &c. Prizes for drawings, varying from £2 10s. to £4, were awarded to Messrs. W. Scott, J. George, Joseph Phillips, J. Phipps, Short, W. Glendall, L. C. Wynn, E. Arnold, L. Walker, and F. Smallfield. The total amount of prizes awarded in the male school was £88 17s. In the female school, a prize of three guineas was awarded to Miss Dixon, for design of a pattern for lace; for the best shaded drawing from a cast, a prize of £2 to Miss Hunter; a second prize of £1 10s. for the same to Miss M. E. Fildes; a prize of one guinea, for the best coloured design for a dress, to Miss Smith; and prizes, varying from two guineas to one guinea, for drawings, were awarded to Misses R. Dunsdale, E. Clannon, Augusta Colchester, Bragg, Clark, and Bridges. The total sum awarded was thirteen guineas.

The business of the day having thus terminated, the thanks of the meeting were moved by one of the Council to the right hon. chairman, who returned his acknowledgments; after which the meeting broke up.

We have engraved five of the prizes:

1. Mr. Rice's Arabesque Fresco.
2. Mr. Russell's Arabesque in Oil.

These are beautiful works, both as regards the classic character of the designs, and their delicacy of colour.

3. Mr. Strudwick's Design for a Glass Chandelier; the copyright of which has been secured by Mr. Agnew & Sons, of the Falcon glass works: it is a beautiful production in a branch of decorative art wherein comparatively little taste has yet been manifested.

4-5. Two designs for a Porcelain Dinner Service, by Mr. Wallace; both presenting highly commendable specimens of the best forms of a quality.

We were much gratified with the entire scene, and the proceedings were of extreme interest in connection with the solution of the problem, "Whether or not," as Mr. Gladstone lucidly remarked, "a true estimate of the beautiful in art might be united to the commercial industry and enterprise of trade, and might not exist in its full development in England."

Of the School-room, an engraving, accompanied by a brief account of the origin of the Institution, will be found in No. 55 of our Journal.

THE AULD BRIG OF DOON.

The "Auld Brig of Doon" which figures so conspicuously in Burns's "Tam o' Shanter" has been till very lately the chief communication between the Kyle and Carrick shores of the Doon, being on the highway leading from Ayr to Maybole, and nearly two miles from the former town. Its age is not known, but it is supposed to be very old, from the appearance of the masonry, and the high sweep taken by the arch. Having been found very inconvenient and difficult of passage from its narrowness and height, a new bridge, larger and perfectly level with the road, has lately been erected, leaving the "Auld Brig" in disuse; which, if it had been a common piece of stone and lime, would probably have been demolished through age and the efforts of unfeeling boys, who amused themselves by throwing the stones of it into the river; but some gentlemen, trustees of the road, instigated by Mr. David Auld, of Ayr, subscribed a sufficient sum to repair it as far as possible; and since then it has been visited by thousands, with "that peculiar interest which genius calls forth in favour of insensible matter."

This memorial will, also, be visited by the majority of those who will flock to this locality during the ensuing week, to participate in the Great Festival in honour of Robert Burns; of which we shall next week commence a series of picturesque illustrations.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—The committee appointed to inspect the works of decorative art exhibited in King-street, St. James's, in April and May last, have made a report, in which they state they have examined the specimens of carved wood, and the designs relating to such specimens, which have been sent in by artists desirous of being employed in the decoration of the houses of Parliament. The committee proceed to say that, not being at present in possession of sufficient information as to the extent to which wood-carving may be considered desirable in the Palace at Westminster, or as to the precise character of the works which may be required, they have thought it expedient in general to enumerate the names only, without further distinction of the artists whose works have received the commendation of the committee. In the department of wood-carving the artists so noticed in the detailed report of the committee are Mr. Cummings, Mr. O'Leary, Mr. Ringham, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Brown, and Mr. John Thomas. Among the artists in wood, the committee mention Mr. Rogers, whom they consider as the person best qualified to be instructed with those parts of the wood-work of the House of Lords in which great richness of effect and delicacy of execution are required. The name of Mr. Rogers, however, was not mentioned in the above list, as he had not complied with the terms of the notice.

ROMAN REMAINS IN THE CITY.—In the course of the present week, during the excavations which are being made in Peter's-hill, Bead-street-hill, Huggins-lane, and Great Fish-street, several Roman relics have been found. On Monday a large Roman earthen urn, about two feet in diameter, in which were some smaller urns such as were used to contain the ashes of the dead, was found at the top of Bead-street-hill. On Wednesday, at a short distance from Huggins-lane, a small Roman lamp was found. They were at a distance of about six feet from the surface. At a few feet from the latter spot were several fragments of walls, with fresco painting of a rich red colour on them. In Peter's-hill, was discovered the Roman barrier wall to prevent the overflow of the Thames. The barrier consisted of massive stones, of 8 or 9 feet each, supported by piles of wood deeply imbedded in the soil. The men have now been employed several weeks in this neighbourhood, and every day they have discovered remains showing that at a very early period a large area was here occupied by Roman buildings of massive construction, as in all directions are foundation walls of from three to six feet in width. A great many silver and copper coins have been dug up, many pieces of fresco-painted walls, and a large quantity of broken pottery.

THE "ALL-HAIL HEREAFTER."

LOSE on the death of THOMAS CAMPBELL has followed the festival in commemoration of ROBERT BURNS. The dust of Campbell was attended to the grave by the highest and greatest men of the day, by statesmen, artists, and writers. The tomb closed over him with all the honour the living can pay to the dead; but still more satisfactory is it to know that during his life he was exempt from the ills of penury—the lot of so many of the children of song. All the rank and wealth and power that stood around his coffin might not, perchance, have saved him from want had his youth been less fortunate, or his age less prudent, and had his life outlasted the means of supporting it unassisted. Such things have been; and we have starved those in life to whom, after death, our shame and pride have built splendid monuments—to those who asked for bread, literally giving a stone. Dryden died after a long struggle with toil, old age, and poverty; and the nobility of the land gathered round his hearse, compensating their carelessness of the living by the splendour they cast around the ashes of the dead; the aristocracy of England supported the pall of Sheridan, and walked in his funeral train, though it suffered him to die destitute, and with the shadow of the prison wall almost falling on the bed of death. We must not rate these posthumous honours at more than they are worth, when those who pay them might have done more; nor have waited till they were startled, by the extinguishing of the lamp of genius, into the recollection that it might have been as well had they fed it for the sake of its light.

But there are other honours which the living may pay to the dead, with which such recollections cannot mingle. It is when the gulf between the present and the past has become widened, when generations have passed away, and posterity pays homage to the genius for what it has given to the world, feeling more admiration for the man than his contemporaries, without the possibility of participating in the guilt of their neglect. Such are the occasions when men meet together to honour the memories of those who have thrown a spell over the minds of all generations. We are a cold and phlegmatic people, and it is said, not without some truth, that we are hardened by our too great avidity in the pursuit of wealth, our too unremitting worship of Mammon. Our homage to genius is seldom manifested outwardly; we are not possessed of that enthusiasm which impels men to celebrate in public the memory of the great poet or artist. Italy seems the land of such displays of fervour, which grows chill and faint beneath our northern skies. But the present week has furnished a striking exception to our general indifference, in the festival held in commemoration of ROBERT BURNS.

Of this fiête we have elsewhere given ample details; we recur to it here only to remark on the general spirit that has, in all ages, prompted such celebrations. Whenever they occur, they constitute that "all-hail hereafter," which is the "Life to come of every poet's creed," that all anticipate, and that some attain. And, wherever they occur, they have some features in common. In the first place it is very, very rarely that these honours are paid by the generation among whom the object of them moves and lives. The contemporaries of a man allow his superiority with something of a grudging spirit. His frailties, too, are linked with his fame, and the mean and the vicious dwell with malicious satisfaction on those defects which are all that genius has in common with them, delighting to blacken the brilliant, and prostrate the beautiful to the dust. And in addition, no one ever achieved greatness without creating enemies:—

"He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below."

All these causes combine to hide a man's true greatness from his fellow-men, his competitors in the race. But time and death sweep into oblivion all minor failings and petty passions; the lapse of years acts on the memory of the departed, like soft moonlight on a magnificent ruin.

Leaving that beautiful which still is so,
And making that which is not; till the place
Becomes religion and the heart runs o'er
With silent worship of the great of old,
The dead but sceptred sovereigns who still rule
Our spirits from their urns.

Thus a public and universal homage has never, we may almost say, been rendered to the intellectually great during their life. It has been always thus; it was not till after the death of Homer that seven cities contended for the honour of having given him birth; Dante was not only unhonoured during his life, but was persecuted, banished, and sentenced to be burned alive; he was a soldier, a political partizan, and a man of action as well as a poet. Tasso, indeed, by the favour of a Roman Pontiff, would have been publicly crowned with the laurel; but the solemnity was deferred from the winter to the spring, and the poet was struck in the interval with the disease, of which he died on the very day appointed for the ceremony. Shakspeare was comparatively unknown to his contemporaries except as the successful manager of a popular theatre. As a poet he was almost unknown to himself, for he flung his immortal works from him with unconsciousness of their value—except as things to be acted; and many generations passed before the admiration of posterity prompted the jubilee at Stratford. And now, nearly half a century after the death of Burns, thousands have gathered on the banks of the Doon, round the place of his birth, and the spot over which he has thrown the lustre of his genius; we need not here describe the scene but must not the thoughts of many there have turned from the present to the past, from the generous and enthusiastic homage paid to the dead, to the cold heart and the grudging hand with which the world meted out its favours to the living.

In July, 1796, died the poet Burns, his last moments embittered by unspeakable anxieties and cares, from which the most trifling exertion from a very few might have saved him. In

THE BRIDGE OF AYS.

August, 1844, men of all ranks are vying with each other in the celebration of his memory. So it seems ever to have been—

"Tis the doom
Of spirits of his order to be rack'd
In life,—to wear their hearts out, and consume
Their days in endless strife, and die alone;
Then future thousands crowd around their tomb,
And pilgrims come from climes where they have known
The name of him—who now is but a name,—
And wasting homage o'er the sullen stone,
Spread his—by him unheard, unheeded—fame!

But darker still would be the fate of genius if the present did not thus atone for the past; and we at least may join in that homage without self-reproach; the neglect of the poet was the fault of our fathers, but the admiration of his genius and the pride in his memory, we can claim as merits of our own.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Our arrivals from France this week cannot fail to excite the attention of our readers, as they bring important information upon the subject of the dispute between France and Morocco. Even the Journal des Débats admits that the French have determined to prosecute the war. It appears that the Emperor had offered to comply immediately with the ultimatum of the French Government, with the exception of the demand for the expulsion of Abdel-Kader. On this point the Emperor equivocated; and the consequence is, that the Prince de Joinville has received orders to commence operations against some of the ports on the coast of Morocco. The ports to be attacked are Mogadore, Mazagan, Salé, and Larache. Tangier, as being the centre of European commerce, is to be spared.

Nothing had occurred at Tangier up to the 20th ult. Another version says—"Some of the Emperor's troops had entered the town, but had subsequently retired from it. The Prince de Joinville had given the Emperor until the 2d instant to accede to the demands of the French Government, and in the event of his refusal would bombard Tangier."

It was known in Paris that Marshal Bugeaud had advanced beyond Ouchda, in the territory of Morocco, and one of the Paris papers even states that Tangier had been bombarded, but of this report there is no confirmation.

Although, as will be seen, the intelligence regarding the real position of affairs between France and Spain is somewhat contradictory, it is evident that there is ample ground for considering that it has assumed a very grave character. This opinion is fully borne out by the following official despatches. The first was addressed to the French Government, and the latter has been received at Lloyd's:—

(OFFICIAL.)

GIBRALTAR, JULY 28.—The Chancellor of the Consulate and all our countrymen have retired from Tangier, with the consent of the local authorities. The Albion was sent on the 27th to Tangier, with an officer to take charge of the squadron in the roads under the title of "Commodore."

All the Consuls have quitted Tangier. The English Vice-Consul has returned here. The arrival of Mr. Drummond Hay is hourly expected. Copy of a letter received at Lloyd's from their agent at Gibraltar, dated August 1, 1844.

Sir,—The only novelty which has transpired is the receipt of the expected despatches from our own Charge d'Affaires, Mr. Drummond Hay, dated Morocco, 28th ult., when he was actively negotiating with the Emperor, through his Imperial Majesty's minister Ben Res, which news our Government considers to auger favourably for the realization of his hopes that all differences will be amicably settled; but I apprehend that the public are of opinion that the existing condition of affairs is such as not to exclude all apprehensions; and if the negotiations, however successful, be tardy, it is thought that the French Admirals may not be inclined to continue to delay hostilities; indeed, a general rumour prevails here—but on what grounds I am unable to find out—that in a day or two some measures will be adopted by the Royal Highness Prince de Joinville, who is already at Tangier, with a part of his forces. Everything remained quiet yesterday in that town, Consular offices, and European population retired; but numerous armed tribes had congregated under the walls and in the neighbourhood.

Nothing can be more critical than the actual position of affairs. The British Admiral, in the Formidable, remains in our bay, with the Calcedonia, three-decker; whilst at Tangier are the Warrior and Albion, under Commodore Leake. On the part of the Spaniards their brigade is ready at Tetue and Algiers, and 1000 cavalry are daily expected in our immediate neighbourhood, from Madrid, to join the African expedition. Their movements will, however, wholly depend on the French, without whom, it is expected, they will not act. (Signed) J. L. CORWILL.

To Wm. Dobson, Esq., Secretary.

It was stated in the Paris papers, that in addition to the Chancellor of the French Consulate at Tangier, several French subjects had likewise been created; whereupon the Prince de Joinville notified to the Moroccan authorities, that if within a period of three days his countrymen were not liberated, he would himself open the doors of their prisons.

A letter from Cadix, of the 25th ult., gives the following particulars:—"On the 24th the Pluton again entered the roadstead of Cadix, bringing back the Prince de Joinville, and having on board the General-Commodore of France at Tangier, and certain European residents. The property of the Consul was left behind, as well as the archives and official papers of the consulate. The Coccyte steamer, sent from Oran with despatches from Marshal Bugeaud, anchored in the roads the same evening, and the Chimère, which was to have returned to Oran, was despatched the next morning to Toulon. Soon after the arrival of the Coccyte, the Amédée steam-frigate was sent to Tangier, as well as the small steamer the Rubis. A report was current here that the Coccyte had brought a treaty concluded between Marshal Bugeaud and the Emperor of Morocco. Nevertheless, at the moment when the Chimère left Cadix roads, the French squadron was under sail for Tangier. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed on board the French vessels. The persons who have come on board the Pluton state that the fortifications of Tangier have been put into a state of defence, and that a battery has been erected to defend the entrance of the port, which will take vessels entering between wind and water, and which may, perhaps, do some mischief."

In addition to these exciting accounts about Morocco, the Parisians had been supplied with more food for agitation in the shape of further advices from Tahiti, brought to Bordeaux by the Reunion, a whaler, and contained in a Toulouse journal, L'Amorceur. We have copied the most interesting portion of these accounts in our narrative of the events at Tahiti.

The session of the French Chamber closed on Monday; but before the Deputies left the hall, M. de Larochefoucauld said, that the Chamber could not separate without some words being returned to those which had been uttered beyond the Straits. He had read with wounded pride what an English Minister had said. A resolution had been demanded of France, accompanied with gross insults. Those offensive words and that resolution would no doubt produce in France an effect that had not been anticipated. They would unite all parties. The French nation could be relied on, but could its Ministers be trusted? He hoped that no further concessions would be made to England. The disavowal of Admiral Duperre's Thonars had already been far too great a one. M. Guizot replied that he should not depart from the language he had held in the other Chamber. A question pending between the French and English Governments had been adverted to. In that complicated question were involved rights and facts, and they must be cleared up between the two Governments. He would bestow on the affair all his attention, and make the honour, rights, and interests of France prevail, as well as the rights and honour of her naval officers.

SPAIN.

Our accounts from Madrid mention the continuance of tranquillity; but great apprehension of an outbreak existed. Every precaution had been taken, and further examinations were going on of the parties arrested for the late plot. Rumours were current of another attempt at insurrection at Barcelona, where the conspirators had attempted to get possession of Montjuich, but were defeated by the vigilance of the governor.

Letters from Gibraltar of the 28th ult. mention that her Majesty's ship Albion was sent on the 27th to Tangier, with an officer to take charge of the squadron in the roads under the title of commodore.

A private letter from Barcelona states that the health of the young Queen of Spain gives some uneasiness. She can scarcely take exercise even in her own apartments, as she is quite lame. It is said she sprained her foot dancing with her sister in her apartment; but it is believed that her difficulty of moving is owing to her legs being swollen in an extraordinary manner. Her appearance is that of one in a confirmed dreyer. Some weeks after her arrival she had improved considerably; but she has again retrograded. Her sister is also ill, and confined to her apartment.

PORTUGAL.

The letters from Lisbon, of the 28th ult., do not possess the least interest in a political point of view. The Court still continued at Cintra, and the Government had not succeeded in making any progress towards the mitigation of the financial difficulties of the country.

SWEDEN.

King Oscar opened the Swedish Diet on the 29th ult., with a speech indicative of a desire for social and domestic improvements, and for the development of knowledge and the maintenance of truth and justice. His Majesty told the States General that he intended during the present session to present several propositions for measures of high interest; and in the first place the plan of a new criminal code, conformable with the ideas of the age, as well as with the efforts made for reconciling the severity necessary in the application of punishment with the respect due to the dignity of man.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Medway has arrived with the usual West Indian mails. Her dates of departure were—from Tampico, June 21; Vera Cruz, July 1; Havannah, 11th; Nassau, 13th; and Bermuda, 22d.

The advices by this arrival were unimportant. The weather had been more favourable in Jamaica, Barbadoes, &c. At Dominica tranquillity was perfectly restored, and the trials were about to commence. There had been a movement in Trinidad for a reduction of wages.

The Jamaica Journal states that Sir C. Metcalfe was quite recovered from his recent indisposition. The Chief Justice of Antigua, Justice Nanton, was dead and had been succeeded by the Hon. J. Shelli.

UNITED STATES.

The Great Western has arrived at Liverpool from New York, after a passage of a little less than 15 days, having sailed on the 29th ult., about midday. By her we are supplied with intelligence five days later than that received by the royal mail steamer Britannia. The news does not, however, possess any feature of striking importance. The royal mail steamer Hibernia, which sailed from Liverpool the 4th of July with the American mails, arrived out at Boston in the remarkably short period of twelve and a half days.

Great excitement continued to prevail in Philadelphia and New York, in reference to the recent outrage in the former place between the Irish Catholics and the native Americans. Nothing further had, however, transpired; but the authorities were busily engaged in investigating the cause of the outbreak, and continued to arrest and examine every person against whom there was any evidence of having in any way participated in the disgraceful conduct.

The Canadian papers give the particulars of several collisions in the neighbourhood of Montreal and Toronto, arising out of some processions of Orangemen on the 15th of July, but it does not appear that any material damage to life or property was done.

The public mind at New York was still much excited upon the subject of Texas. Various official documents having been published connected with the annexation, although an attempt had been made to suppress them. The commercial advices are unimportant. Money was abundant. Foreign exchange dull at 109 to 109½. Freights had improved.

IMPORTANT CONSEQUENCES OF THE FRENCH AGGRESSION AT TAHITI.

The Favourite, South Sea whaler, has arrived from Tahiti, with news of a foot-note subsequent to the outrage upon Mr. Pritchard. The account brought by this vessel is that a skirmish had taken place between the French and the natives. By means of a telegraphic communication which the French have already established in the island, orders were conveyed a day or two before the Favourite left to one of the French steam-frigates then lying in the Bay of Papeete, to embark troops and proceed to Taiarapu, forty miles distant, and situated at the other side of the island of Tahiti. At the time of starting she had 150 soldiers on board. This order is supposed to have been caused by an outbreak, the particulars of which, as far as could be gained, are as follow:—

"A number of the natives, who now live in encampments up the mountains since they have been expelled the towns, were seated taking a quiet meal, when some Frenchmen came upon one party, consisting of two chiefs and their wives, and seized hold of the women, whom they attempted to drag on board their boat, then lying moored on the beach a short distance off. The chiefs resisted this aggression, and were immediately shot. A third chief then rose up and exclaimed, 'What! are we dogs, that we are treated thus? We are a quiet people, and wish for peace, but you will not let us have it.' Whereupon the French fired at him, but, missing their mark, he gave the signal to the natives for an attack. At the first charge 15 Frenchmen were either killed or wounded, and a second attack almost immediately taking place, between 30 and 40 more of their number were killed or disabled by the Tahitians."

Soon after this transaction had taken place, it was reported that many of the French had deserted, saying they had only been brought out to be shot at. The men generally do not seem at all contented, for they appear half-starved and are badly clothed. The regulation that no one is to be allowed out after eight o'clock at night is strictly enforced against the natives and foreigners, but the French themselves seem to pay little or no attention to this order.

Just as the Favourite was getting under weigh the crew saw the French steam-frigate return from Taiarapu, but the wind being favourable for their passage, and they having been delayed a long time, they did not put back to learn whether any more fighting had taken place.

When the Favourite left, a French whaler, commanded by an American, had been detained twelve days at Tahiti, and was still there waiting for despatches for the French Government. The Favourite brought despatches to the Government at home. She had a very quick passage.

COMMENCEMENT OF HOSTILITIES.—The following letter, dated Papeete, March 26, gives some important particulars, from which it will be seen that in spite of the attempts to gloss over the state of affairs, they have assumed a very serious aspect. The account, it may be added, is confirmed in its main incidents by the Amorceur, a Toulouse paper:—"Hostilities have commenced. The intrenched camp of the bay of Taiarapu was attacked on the 21st inst. That day, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, two musket-shots were fired in the direction of the hill where the first advanced sentinel was placed. M. Mariani, a captain of the staff commanding the bay, sent two patrols, one of Voltigeurs, and another of seamen, to reconnoitre the ravine extending to the bay. The marines, guided by an Indian, fell into an ambush and received a volley of musquetry, to which they made but an indifferent return, because the weather was wet and their guns had been loaded for some days. The marines then retreated quickly under the fire of the enemy, who killed one man and wounded another. When M. Mariani heard the firing, he commanded an officer and 30 men to protect the retreat of the marines. At 2 o'clock, the same hill was again attacked by 30 men. A line of fire soon demonstrated the number of the insurgents. Their fire was returned, and of Voltigeurs, acting as sharpshooters, and supported by the guns of the fort, maintained a good position. A howitzer well served sent volleys of grape-shot against the different points where the firing was best supported. Moreover, the corvette Embascade, anchored at a quarter of a league from the field of battle, directed some shot with so much effect that the enemy's fire was silenced. As it was 7 o'clock at night, it was impossible to pursue them through the ravines in which they had sought shelter. On being informed of these events, the Governor embarked on board the Phaeton steamboat, and proceeded to the place of action. Our loss has not been considerable—two killed, one carried off by the enemy, and seven wounded. The loss of the insurgents has not been ascertained, but there were found on the field five bodies. It is supposed they had 10 killed or wounded. This result, however, is far from being complete, and can have but a trifling effect upon the enemy. As the Phaeton passed along the coast on her return, throwing shells on all the houses within her reach, there were perceived with astonishment two intrenchments sufficiently capacious to shelter 300 combatants, whose heads appeared above the parapet. The more this fortification was examined, the more regular it appeared. In the midst was seen the pavilion of Queen Pomare. Some Europeans who appeared to command them came to the shore to challenge a landing. Prudence commanded that nothing should be done. We were satisfied with sending them some broadsides, which appeared not to frighten them, as they did not stir. The number of English and American adventurers amongst the insurgents is estimated at 500. They themselves are 1,500, and are well armed. They have ammunition in abundance, and four pieces of cannon. The Queen remains on board the British ship the Basileid. She has no longer any idea of submitting, since she finds that 1,500 combatants march under her flag. The British squadron which is to exterminate us is anxiously and confidently expected by the natives. Papeete is in a state of siege, but has not been attacked. The following is an account of our force:—At Taiarapu, a company of light infantry, a company of seamen, and a detachment of artillery, supported by the corvette Embascade, armed with 30 howitzers. At Papeete, two companies of marine infantry, a company of seamen, and 75 artillerymen. In the roads, the frigates Uranie and La Charle, and the corvette La Meuthé."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

The house met at noon. The business was unimportant. The Marriages (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed. The house then went into committee on the Insolvent Debtors Bill. The compensation clauses were brought up, and the house resumed.—Report on Monday.

The Debtors and Creditors Bill was read a third time and passed. The Arms (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed. Lord Villiers appeared at the table of the house to take his seat as a member for Cirencester, but as the Clerk of the Crown had neglected to forward the certificate of return to the house, the noble lord was obliged to withdraw, and consequently cannot be sworn till Monday. The house adjourned at 20 minutes past 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Books and Engravings Bill, the Militia Pay Bill and the Criminal Justice (Middlesex) Bill were read a third time and passed. The Duke of Wellington having stated in answer to the Earl of Radnor that the Government did not intend to bring in any measure founded on the report of the Post-office Secret Committee, the latter noble earl moved the first reading of a bill to amend a portion of the existing act relative to the detention of letters. The bill was accordingly read a first time.

Some further discussion took place on the Railways Bill. Lord Wharfedale declared that the proposed amendment of the Bishop of London respecting Sunday travelling, was impracticable, and suggested, by way of compromise, a clause requiring that when first and second class trains are run on Sundays, they shall be accompanied by third-class carriages at least once each way. Ultimately this clause was carried, and, thus qualified, the Bishop of London's amendment was adopted. The bill was then passed, subject to the adoption of the amendments by the Commons.

THE STATE OF THE NAVY.—EARL MINTO called the attention of the house to the present state of the navy, contending that the force at the disposal of the Government was inadequate in the present position of affairs to maintain our honour and security. The noble earl deprecated any attempt to disturb peace, and said no man attached more importance to the preservation of the best understanding with France; but all the good understanding which we could cultivate must be on terms of perfect equality, and not be based upon anything like submission, or sacrifice of the interest or the honour of this country. In calling the attention of their lordships to the state of the navy, he wished to say that he, for one, was no advocate for very large naval establishments during the time of peace; but without maintaining any extravagantly large naval establishments, he was sure their lordships would go with him in thinking that there was a limit to the extent of economy which might be injurious, and to the confidence with which we might calculate upon peace, or upon the forbearance of foreign countries. After suggesting that it was impossible to look at the state of affairs on the coast of Africa without apprehension, Earl Minto then supported his views as to the inadequate state of our navy:—He said, our whole navy, at the present moment, in line-of-battle ships, consisted of nine ships of the line. Of these nine ships of the line, two were on a very distant station—the East Indies; one was also on a very distant station—the West Indies; one, as he understood, was under orders to sail for a distant station—the Pacific. He had heard a short time ago that there were at home three ships of the line, one at each of the home ports, and that one, also a flag-ship, was the ship of the rear-admiral commanding at Cork; and the ninth ship was the Mediterranean fleet, consisting of one sail of the line. He asked their lordships whether, under any circumstances, that was a fit state of things? Could they conceive any state of things such as to make it tolerable that the Mediterranean fleet should be reduced to one ship of the line, and the power of reinforcing it also to one ship, unless we called upon the guard-ships, and left ourselves destitute of defence for the coasts of the country? To this condition he thought the navy of England ought never to be reduced. Earl Minto, after arguing that while he was at the head of the Admiralty, there was a much greater number of ships in commission, touched upon the events at Tahiti; and concluded by moving for a return of her Majesty's ships of war (other than those reserved for harbour duty) in commission, on the 31st of July, 1844; and also a return of her Majesty's ships of war present at Tahiti, from the 1st of September, 1842, to the latest period to which advices have been received, specifying the date of the arrival there and departure from thence of each ship.—The Earl of HADDINGTON renewed the Earl of Minto with making an inconvenient speech, without having a parliamentary case to justify it. This country had overwhelming means of defence available, should war arise; though our present number of ships of the line in commission was small, they were well manned; and our dockyards were busily occupied in the building of additional vessels, and in adding to the strength of our steam marine.—The Duke of WELLSINGTON defended the course he had formerly taken on the Whig Government for making war with a peace establishment, and made the following declaration in regard to the present efficiency of our navy, and the outrage at Tahiti. The noble duke said—"I understand that ample means exist everywhere of performing the services which ought to be performed by her Majesty's navy; that is, giving protection to her Majesty's subjects wherever their commerce or other concerns may carry them. When I say given everywhere, I do not mean to advert to that recent transaction in the Pacific, carried on under circumstances protested against by this country, and disavowed by the Government of France. My lords, those who have been guilty of these eccentricities will be responsible for them to somebody, and I conclude that that responsibility will be carried into execution, and that they will be required to account for their conduct in those eccentricities. I will venture to say, and I have no doubt it will be found so when the matter comes to be examined into, that our fleet in the Pacific was, at the period at which these events occurred, sufficient to give full protection to her Majesty's subjects. My noble friend has stated what is true—that a great outrage was committed. I entertain no doubt that satisfaction will be given for that outrage, and I am sure that it is better that there should have been no naval contest there, than that there should have been any attempt made by the naval officer on the spot by a contest to prevent what has happened."—Lord Minto's motion was agreed to.

After a long and desultory discussion, the house went into committee on the Poor-law Amendment Bill pro forma, and the committee was ordered to sit again next day. The house sat till past one o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

There was again a morning sitting to-day. Lord Villiers entered the house soon after 12 o'clock, and having subscribed to the oaths, took his seat for Cirencester.

The Leeds Vicarage Bill was read a third time and passed. Sir R. PAUL moved the second reading of the Roman Catholic Penal Acts Repeal Bill. Some discussion arose, but as we have already explained the object of the bill, it is quite unnecessary to recur to the subject. The bill was read a second time.

The Insolvent Debtors' Bill went through committee, and some other routine business was transacted.

Mr. HUME gave notice that, early next session, if he was well, and all went right (a laugh), he would move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire whether the Royal Academy had been favourable or injurious to the progress of the fine arts in this country.

Mr. GLANVILLE obtained leave to bring in three bills for the consolidation of the various acts relating to public companies and the construction of railways. These are to be printed, in order to be circulated during the recess. He also, in a committee of the whole house, obtained leave for a like purpose, to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to the support and relief, in certain cases, of merchant seamen, their widows, and children.

Lord SANBORN brought up the report of the Secret Committee on the Post-office.

The house adjourned at an early hour in the evening.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The royal assent was given, by commission, to a number of bills. ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION TO HER MAJESTY.—The Duke of WELLINGTON, after recurring to the happy event which had that day occurred, moved, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, to congratulate her Majesty on the birth of another Prince, and to assure her Majesty that every increase of her illustrious family, and every addition to her Majesty's domestic happiness, affords the most unfeigned joy and satisfaction to the House of Lords." The address was unanimously agreed to.

The Spirits (Ireland) Bill, the Woods and Forests Accounts Bill, and the Grand Canal (Ireland) Bill, were read a third time and passed.

Lord BRACMONT having put some questions with respect to the alleged interference of Russia with the affairs of Serbia, the Earl of ARDENEN said he had not received any information to justify a belief in such interference, and expressed his doubts that any had taken place.

THE RESULTS OF THE SESSION.—The Marquis of NORMANBY then complained of the hurried manner in which several bills had recently been disposed of, and accused the Government of negligence in their legislative duties. He complained that the promises held out in the Queen's speech had not been fulfilled, and suggested that important business ought to be brought on early in the session. He moved for a return of the days and hours during which the house had been occupied in legislative business.—The Duke of WELLINGTON denied that the members of the Government had neglected their duties, and said that steps had always been taken to afford any explanation of bills which were before the house.—Lord WHARFEDALE combated the idea that nothing essential had been obtained during the session. He instanced the conversion of the Three-and-a-half per Cent., which he characterised as one of the most important measures ever sanctioned by Parliament. The noble lord referred to other bills which the Government had passed, and gave his opinion that this had been a very "fruitful session."—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE concurred in the complaint of Lord Normanby, and particularly dwelt upon the advantage of discussing important bills as early in the session as possible. The motion was agreed to.

THE POOR-LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—On the question for going into committee on the Poor-law Amendment Bill, the Bishop of EXETER urged that there was no time for the consideration of so important a bill, and thought it better to drop the measure, and take it up early in the next session of Parliament. He entered at great length on the general question of the Poor-law, pleading the rights of the poor, scripturally and constitutionally, and condemning the present system. The right reverend prelate concluded by moving the commitment of the bill that day six months.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said the principle of the bill had been discussed for several sessions, and the object of going into committee was to insure that mitigation of the law for which the Bishop of Exeter contended.—On a division only one vote was recorded for the amendment of the Bishop of Exeter, while 17 peers voted for going into committee. The bill was then considered in committee, the discussion on which occupied the house till nearly midnight.

In answer to a question from EARL MINTO, the Earl of ARDENEN denied that the late Court-martial on Lieut. Gray had been ordered at the instigation of the French Government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The house had again a morning sitting to dispose of the business, but it was of a formal description.

The Penal Acts Repeal Bill passed through committee, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER gave notice that the Government would, next session, introduce a bill to include all Irish Roman Catholic Penal Acts in the present measure.

The Lords' Amendments to the Railways Bill were agreed to, and one proviso was added, to the effect that the prices charged for conveyance on Sundays should not exceed those charged on week days.

On the motion of Sir R. PAUL, an address of congratulation to her Majesty was agreed to, similar to that adopted in the House of Lords.

Several conferences with the House of Lords were held, respecting bills upon which amendments have been made. Captain BERNAL then introduced a motion for copies of any instructions given to Lord Heytesbury relative to the future disposal of church patronage in Ireland with reference to the Education Board. After a desultory debate, however, the motion was withdrawn.—The house adjourned at half-past eight.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house met to-day for a short time, but merely to advance a few bills formally.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house, as usual, met at twelve o'clock, but the first part of the sitting was uninteresting.

Lord PALMERSTON took an opportunity of reviewing the whole system of foreign policy of the present Government, which he described as a system of resistance at home and concession abroad. He alluded to our cession of territory in North America—to Spain and Portugal—and proceeded to comment upon the recent events at Tahiti. The noble lord contended that Mr. Pritchard, at the period of his imprisonment, although ceasing to exercise his functions, was invested with the character of his commission as Consul, and that his position was then similar to that of an ambassador who has given up communication upon a disagreement with the Government to which he was accredited. The noble lord, although generally condemning the system of foreign policy which the present Ministry had followed, did not submit any motion.—Sir R. PAUL expressed his surprise at the wide range which Lord Palmerston had taken, and denied that the Government had made any concession to foreign powers which would be injurious to this country. The right hon. baronet adverted to all the points touched upon by Lord Palmerston, except Tahiti, on which he said he had before given an opinion, and a discussion upon which, in the present posture of affairs, was not desirable.

The report on the Catholic Penal Act Bill was agreed to. The Insolvent Debtors Bill was read a third time, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of Mr. Spooner to defer the operation of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth clauses till March next.

Sir J. GRAMAM also introduced his bill for the better regulation of the medical profession, the object being to have it printed, with a view to circulation during the recess.

The house adjourned at a quarter to 8.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Marquis of NORMANBY presented a petition from Leeds, drawing the attention of the house to the efforts of the Protestant Missionary Society for the last 50 years in the island of Tahiti, and complaining of the violation of the law of nations by the French naval commander at the island. The petitioners had no wish for war between England and France, but they hoped the influence of the Government would be exercised to restore the independence of Tahiti. The noble marquis, in presenting the petition, took an opportunity of referring to the recent proceedings at Tahiti, and said he could not consent that peace should be preserved at the expense of national honour.—The Earl of ARBUTHNOT said he had very recently received assurances from the missionaries in Otaheite that they had nothing to complain of as against the French authorities. The noble earl, in reference to the case of Mr. Pritchard, denied that the Government had sacrificed the interests of the country by truckling to France. There was, he said, a party in France; but he still believed that moderation and justice on the part of both Governments would disappoint that party in France, and the enemies of peace at home.

The Poor Law Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed, two clauses moved by Lord FRYULING being negatived without a division.

The house sat for some time in order to receive the consent of the Commons to several alterations made by their lordships in various bills; after which their lordships adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The house met at three o'clock.

After some discussion, the Lords' amendments to the Seamen's Hospital Bill were agreed to.

In answer to a question from Mr. WYER, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that in future he should not consent to the return of the number of stamps issued to each newspaper, but the total number of stamps would of course be returned as usual.

Some further questions were put by Captain FENNER upon the subject of Captain Warner's recent experiments. He said he had received a model of a vessel from Shoreham, the port from which the ship destroyed by Capt. Warner had sailed; and from that it appeared the ship had been tried on board her, fastened from stem to stern, and that after the process it appeared that from 150 to 200 fathoms of line had been thrown overboard from the steam-vessel, showing that a direct communication had been established between the steam-vessel and the ship.—Sir R. PEEL gave no information upon this point, but said he would not give £400,000, or even £100,000, for the blowing up of a vessel, without having that vessel pretty closely examined beforehand.—(Laughter.)—but he again repeated, that he did not mean to intimate that there had been any unfair proceeding on the part of Captain Warner.

The Roman Catholic Penal Acts Relief Bill was read a third time and passed. Leave was given to Sir JAMES GRAHAM to bring in a bill for the alteration of the Law of Settlement, the provisions of which he explained at considerable length. The main principle of the measure is that of making birth—and birth only—the foundation of the claim of settlement, thus doing away with the intricate legislation on this subject, which has caused so much litigation.

The remainder of the evening was occupied with routine business, and the house rose at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The royal assent was given by commission to various bills, among which was the Insolvent Debtors' Bill, which abolishes imprisonment for debt for sums under £20.

The Common Law Courts (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed, after a long discussion.

An address to her Majesty was adopted, praying that the New Houses of Parliament may be proceeded with as soon as possible.

Some further discussion took place upon unimportant topics, and the house adjourned at eight o'clock, until Monday, the 2nd of September.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The house met at four o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.—Sir R. PEEL moved the adjournment of the house till Thursday, the 15th of September. This motion afforded the opportunity of raising a desultory discussion upon the events of the week. In the course of it Lord J. RUSSELL called upon the Government to put down agitation in Ireland, by releasing O'Connell, and referred, at some length, to the state of Ireland.—Sir R. PEEL replied, and adverted to the various measures which the Government had passed. Ultimately, the motion of adjournment till the 15th of September was carried, and after some formal business was transacted, the house broke up.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE FLEETS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

A letter from Gibraltar, dated the 27th ult., gives the following interesting information respecting the movements of the Prince de Joinville's squadron, and the state of affairs at Tangier. The Prince de Joinville having received what he considered an evasive answer from the Emperor of Morocco, entered the bay of Tangier on the 13th, in the Phare steamer, and having got off his Consul, with a secretary and a few others, on the pier, it is said, of there being a fiat on board, on occasion of the christening of the secretary's child, informed the other Consuls and the Moroccan Governor that at the end of twenty-four hours he would proceed to take the place. It appears that he was induced, by the representations of the different Consuls, as it is stated, to postpone operations; but vessels of all kinds have been since bringing over Christian and Jewish families, who embarked in the utmost consternation, many leaving behind property of considerable value. Our Consul-General in Morocco, Mr. Hay, has not yet arrived, and it is pretty certain that unless his efforts with the Emperor are successful in inducing the latter to agree to the proposals of the French Government, steps will be taken which must be very embarrassing to our Government.

The Hecla, British war steamer, arrived in the course of last night, bringing for the second time a batch of unfortunate fugitives. This vessel is going back again, taking Mr. Murray, British Vice-Consul at Tangier, who came over to communicate with the admiral, explain matters, and forward despatches to Lord Aberdeen.

Considering the unenviable masses at Tangier and at its walls, there can be no doubt of the propriety of all the Consuls having left Tangier, and getting on board the ships in the bay. Mrs. Hay, the Consul's lady, went on board the Hecla, but was received on board a Danish man of war, on the departure of that steamer for Gibraltar, but as the wind became favourable for the Warlike, that frigate, which had been prevented for the last three days by contrary winds from getting to Tangier, no doubt got there early yesterday, and Mrs. Hay would, no doubt, be received on board.

At 11 o'clock to-day the Albion got under sail for Tangier, and will be anchored there.

Though things wear so formidable an aspect, the British Vice-Consul at Tangier, says that he has still some very good grounds for expecting that matters will be settled. At any of the Moorish towns on the coast it will, with the Prince Joinville, be a simple matter of rend, rida, vici, the means of defence are so wretched. This morning the only French force in the bay of Tangier was a war steamer or two. One more remaining here this evening was the Caledonia and the Formidable flag-ship.

A letter (of the 19th ult.) says the Hecla has returned from Tangier. All was then quiet, the different consuls or vice-consuls being embarked. Our Consul-General (Mr. Hay) had not arrived from Morocco; some reports stated that he had been left very ill on the road by which he followed the Emperor on his way to Rabat, where it is now confidently stated the latter has arrived.

The Warlike saluted on her arrival at Tangier three days ago; the salute was returned, and there was a good feeling towards the English at that place.

There are no particular accounts from the Prince de Joinville. We are assured that the despatches to him from General Bugeaud are calculated to contribute greatly to keep down his Royal Highness's rage for war.

This morning there was only one French brig in Tangier bay. The Spaniards have a 32-gun frigate there, two brigs, and a steamer.

Rear Admiral William Bowles, C.B., has left the Admiralty for a short time, on a visit to Perthshire.

We have to announce the resignation of Col. Hon. H. Dundas to active service, in his appointment to the lieutenant-colony of the 6th Foot, vice Lord Col. Trevelyan, who has exchanged. It will be recollected that the Hon. H. Dundas was removed from the command of the 83rd, in consequence of some indiscreet observations at the dinner table, of which an ungenerous advantage was taken. The 6th embarks this morn'g for service in India.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE CASE OF MR. DYCE SOMBRE.—The Lord Chancellor gave judgment on Thursday morning, in the Court of Chancery, in this case. His lordship's report over the evidence very elaborately. He said, this was a petition to supersede the commission of lunacy issued against Mr. Dyce Sombre. It had been ably argued at very great length. There were two main questions to be decided, namely—First, whether Mr. Dyce Sombre was of unsound mind at the time the commission issued; and, secondly, if that gentleman was of unsound mind at that period, whether or not he was at the present moment in a sane state of mind, and able to manage himself and his affairs. The noble and learned lord then adverted to the birth, education, and history of Mr. Dyce Sombre, as detailed in evidence. His lordship concluded by stating that he felt it his duty not to grant the prayer of the petition. The commission for the present must continue. He saw no objection, however, for Mr. Dyce Sombre to go to Paris if he wished, provided he would consent to allow some competent person to attend him.

PURSUANCE OF A FRAUDULENT INVOLUNT.—At the Insolvent Debtors' Court, a long inquiry has taken place into the case of Blinn Davis, a Jew, who had been an extensive tailor and draper in Church-street, Whitechapel. The disclosures made were of a very painful and extraordinary character. The complaint was, that the insolvent had concealed or otherwise made away with property, consisting of stock in trade, which he had obtained from his creditors, to an extent of upwards of £2000. For years the insolvent had carried on business in Whitechapel, and in 1842 he commenced a career which resulted in his present imprisonment. His debts were now £4765 6s., all contracted in the short period of seven months, and his creditors owed him £201, which sum could not be recovered. In April of the year mentioned a fire occurred on the premises in Church-street, and from that period, when he obtained a sum from the Sun Fire

Office, to the end of September following, he had obtained the goods which formed the principal portion of his debts; having in September and October of that year obtained somewhere about £2000 worth of property from his creditors. Taking into consideration these facts, the judgment of the Court was, that the insolvent should be remanded from the vesting order (June last) for a period of two years, for a fraudulent disposition of property.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

APPALLING MURDER BY A RELIGIOUS ENTHUSIAST.—At the Norfolk assizes, held at Norwich, James Frost, a man of about 33 years of age, was charged with the wilful murder of Harriet Frost on the 8th of April. When called on to plead to the indictment, he said guilty enough in the eyes of the world, but not of God. The following is a summary of the painful facts disclosed by the evidence.—In early life the prisoner became attached to the Primitive Methodists, and before he had attained to manhood, and before he could read or write, was distinguished among that sect by the zeal and energy of his religious time and feeling. In the course of a short time he took a decided lead among the congregation, and was esteemed a "powerful preacher." He was esteemed by all who knew him and thought with him. Some of his fellow-workmen devised a scheme to shame him. On one unlucky evening they seduced him into a dance, and dragging his beer, succeeded in making him completely drunk. The scandal which this affair entailed on his religious pursuits resulted in his dismissal from the pulpit, and he was no longer allowed to preach. This circumstance weighed on his mind and spirits, and deeply oppressed him. He became morose, sullen, and reserved. Soon after this he married, but fell sick of typhus fever, and for seven weeks he was out of his mind. His love for his young wife changed to loathing. He subsequently, however, became more himself, and in this state of things the prisoner's family, consisting of three little girls, grew up around him; and about ten weeks before the 8th of April his wife bore him a fourth. Notwithstanding his "delusions" he was a fond and affectionate husband. On the day in question his wife found him sitting moodily by the fire. Not being able to ascertain from him what had become of the children, she thought suddenly struck her that some mischief had happened to one of them. She accordingly rushed up stairs, where a most dreadful spectacle awaited her. On the floor were the lifeless bodies of the two eldest girls, smeared with blood, which thickly sprinkled the boards. A wild shriek called to her assistance her neighbours, and the house was speedily filled with anxious friends. To none of these would the prisoner give a word by way of answer or explanation, but doggedly preserved a gloomy silence. The truth, however, was soon ascertained in all its horrid reality, for in the pantry was found the mangled corpse of the third child, while in a bag of water, into which it had been forcibly crammed head foremost, was the poor little infant, all four of the children having been thus cruelly murdered, in the course of ten short minutes by their father. A policeman coming in soon after, discovered the bloody hammer in the pantry, with which the desperate man had literally smashed the skulls of his three eldest children. When his master came in he said to him, when asked whether he had thus butchered his innocent children under an idea that he would get them to Heaven, that "he hoped so," and admitted that he had accomplished their death with the hammer. On this he was taken to a neighbouring public-house, whence, after the inquest, which terminated in verdicts of "Wilful murder," he was removed to Norwich Castle. When putting with his friends, who were all in tears, he assumed a look and attitude of joy, and sang, "Glory be to God. My sins are forgiven me, and I shall go to Heaven." On his way to the castle, he sang snatches of hymns and psalms, one of which the policeman described as being "most appropriate to his situation." He also seemed rather to glory in the deed, than to feel either regret or repugnance for his conduct, chiding his wife for "going on so," and endeavouring to reconcile her to the loss of her children by the reflection that "they were now happy, and in glory, where they would both be also."—The evidence of these facts left no doubt of the insanity of the prisoner, who was acquitted on that ground.

MURDER FROM JEALOUSY.—At the Bodmin assizes, Matthew Weeks was tried for the wilful murder of Charlotte Dymond, in the parish of Davidstow, Cornwall. The prisoner, who is only 22 years of age, looked very sullen and dogged. The evidence proved that the prisoner and the deceased were fellow-servants at a Mrs. Peters's, at Penhall Farm, in the parish of Davidstow. The deceased was about eighteen years of age, and was possessed of considerable personal attractions. She and the prisoner had kept company for some time, and there was reason to believe that he was jealous of her, particularly with regard to a young man named Thomas Pratt, who had called at Mrs. Peters's on the morning the deceased was killed, and had made an appointment to meet her that night at chapel. It did not appear conclusively whether the prisoner had overheard this conversation or not, but there was reason to believe that he had. In the afternoon the prisoner and the deceased came down stairs together, when the deceased, addressing Mrs. Peters, said that she should not be at home at milking time, but Matthew (the prisoner) would. They then went away together, with every appearance of the most friendly feeling. Mrs. Peters saw nothing more of either of them until half-past nine, when the prisoner returned alone, without the deceased. About a mile from Penhall Farm are the Davidstow Mees, a wild and desolate track, seldom crossed by persons on a Sunday. A farmer, named Cory, who knew the deceased and the prisoner perfectly well, and who had some fields out by this moor, happened to be there on the Sunday afternoon in question, for the purpose of looking after some wheat. He saw the prisoner and deceased proceed along the road to a place called the Higher Down Gate, which led to the moor, and they were subsequently seen together by another farmer. When the poor girl was missed the prisoner denied all knowledge of her, but on the following Wednesday her murdered body was found in the moor, and when the prisoner's clothes were examined, marks of blood were found upon them in several places. The jury returned a verdict of "guilty." The learned judge, much affected, sentenced the prisoner to death. Weeks subsequently admitted that he was guilty, but says it was not a premeditated act. On hearing his sentence he fainted away, and was so removed from the dock.

THE WEDNESDAY MURDER.—At the Stafford assizes, William Beard was indicted for the murder of Ann Griffiths. The evidence given on the trial was very lengthy, but it is only necessary to recapitulate the main incidents, as our readers will, no doubt, recollect the details which were published when the murder took place in March last. The deceased was housekeeper to Mr. J. Crowther, of Wednesbury, and had been left alone on the premises in the absence of her master, who was a single man. The object of the prisoner was plunder, and having formerly been in the service of Mr. Crowther, he was well acquainted with the premises and the habits of their occupants. On Mr. Crowther's return he went up to the room occupied by the deceased, to see if she was there, and was surprised to find the bed unmade, and her boxes about the room. He then went down again into the kitchen, and thence into the brew-house, where the first object that met his eyes was the murdered body of his housekeeper. The unfortunate woman lay on the floor, which was covered with blood, and which appeared to have been trampled all about the brew-house. Her hair was very much dishevelled, and had blood upon it, and a bloody knife lay at a very short distance from the body. At least ten wounds had been inflicted on her head with a hammer, which was usually kept in the brew-house, and there were other circumstances which led to the conclusion that she had offered some resistance to the savage, whoever it was, who perpetrated this dreadful deed. The evidence left no reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, and the jury having returned a verdict to that effect, the learned judge passed upon him the awful sentence of death. At the close of the sentence the prisoner, who had remained apparently quite unmoved during its delivery, exclaimed, in a very determined tone, "My Lord, I have been found guilty, but I am as innocent as a child." On leaving the bar, he struck his hand forcibly on the railing, and added, "I am as innocent as a child, if I was to die this moment." The prisoner was then removed by the officers of the jail. Beard has since confessed the crime. His execution will take place on Saturday next, the 17th instant.

A WIFE MURDERED BY HER HUSBAND.—At the assizes at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on Saturday last, Mark Scaevold, a grey-haired man above the middle age, and whose face bore traces of habitual intemperance in agitated lines, was found guilty of the wilful murder of his wife, Ann Scaevold, on the 14th of March last, by cutting her throat. It was proved that the crime was committed while the prisoner was in a state of intoxication, and that during a quarrel the deceased had provoked him as much as possible. Sentence of death was passed on the prisoner in the usual form.

FORFEITURE OF A FRAUDULENT BANKRUPT.—At the Norfolk assizes, on Monday, William Joseph Crockett was found guilty on the charge that he, being a trader, became bankrupt on the 31st of November last, and that within three months preceding his bankruptcy he did, under colour and pretence of carrying on business in the ordinary course of trade, obtain on credit divers goods and chattels from various persons (whose names were set forth in the indictment) with intent to defraud them of the same. It appeared that the prisoner sold the whole or the greater part of the property (cattle) within a day or two of the respective purchases at prices far below those which he had agreed to pay for them, in some instances at 20 per cent. below those prices. He was sentenced to six months imprisonment.

THE LATE ASCOT RACES.—The Court of Recordstons.—A feigned issue has been tried at Guildford, Herbert v. Day, to ascertain whether the plaintiff, the owner of the only colt called Bloodstone, or the defendant, the owner of a horse named Old England, was entitled to certain stakes run for at the last Ascot Races. The trial lasted two days, but as the evidence turned chiefly upon the exact pedigree of the colt, and the time when it was foaled, and scarcely disclosed any other point of interest, we think it unnecessary to go into details, particularly after the time which the case took. Mr. Sergeant Cannell, who appeared for the plaintiff, stated that his client was an attorney, and the defendant a trainer of horses, and then mentioned the nature of the controversy which he should adduce to prove that the colt which ran the race was foaled in 1842, that it was a Suburban, and he then named a mare called Runaway. On the part of the defendant the case was, that the horse which won the race was the Belton colt, foaled in 1841, and not the Suburban. Previous to the commencement of the case, the jury went to look at both the horses. The following evidence on the part of the defendant settled the case.—Henry Bell: I rode Bloodstone at Ascot. Before the race I saw Mr. J. Thompson, and he told me to ride him a quarter of a mile and tell him up, for he would not have him win on no account. I told this before the race to Captain Ross and Colonel Wyndham's training groom, and consulted them what to do, and they told me to win. (A laugh.) I did win. (Renewed laughter.) I had no difficulty to win. I was in a canter. (Laughter.)—Cross-examined: I believe the horse had fallen lame on the day before. I was riding him a gallop at the time. A mare named Casanova ran with me, but I don't know whether she beat herself.—Mr. Platt: Did she gallop with you the day before?—Witness: Yes.—Mr. Platt: Did she beat you in your gallop the day before?—Witness: Yes, by a surance. (Laughter.)—Lord Sturbridge: I am one of the stewards of Ascot Races, and was present when Bloodstone beat Old England. A complaint was made that Bloodstone was more than two years old, and the stewards sent for Mr. Field, the veterinary surgeon, from London, and another gentleman named Perry, from Reading. When Mr. Field examined the horse he immediately pronounced him to be three years old, and gave a certificate to that effect. Mr. Perry gave a similar certificate.—Mr. Field corroborated this statement, and the jury said they were satisfied.—The foreman of the jury said they were of opinion that Mr. Herbert might have been deceived.—Mr. Platt (who was for the defendant): We believe that to be the case.—Harcourt Parkes expressed his opinion that the jury could come to no other conclusion. The history of the case probably was, that it was the small miserable colt which died, and the other was put in its place.—The jury then returned a verdict for defendant.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.—At the same assizes, an action was tried, Roberts v. Denham, for a breach of promise of marriage. The plaintiff, Miss Melville Roberts, a very respectable young lady, had been a governess in the family of a gentleman named Evans, and went with them to Malta. It was on the passage that an acquaintance was formed with the defendant, an officer in the East India Company. The promise of marriage was proved, but subsequently, he sent a letter in which he stated that he had lost much money at horse-racing and the gaming-table, and must go to China to economize. Within a month afterwards, however, he was married to another lady. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages of £400.

BILL TRANSACTIONS.—At these assizes the case of Parry v. Lord C. Fitzroy, which was an action to recover a sum of £1000 on a bill of exchange, was tried. The circumstances were detailed very recently in the police reports. The jury, under Mr. Harcourt Parkes's direction, found a verdict for the plaintiff for £1018, the amount of the bill and interest.—Sergeant Gassie applied for immediate execution.—Harcourt Parkes: No, I think not. You have got 35 per cent. interest, and you can afford to wait a little while for your money.

INCENDIARISM IN NORFOLK.—The Norfolk assizes terminated on Monday. In the course of the day four prisoners, English, Fary, Paving, and Potter, were placed at the bar to receive sentence for the crime of arson, of which the three first had severally been found guilty, the last having pleaded guilty. Mrs. Justice Williams sentenced English to fifteen years' transportation, and the other prisoners to terms of imprisonment varying from three months to two years, according to the peculiar features of the case.

THE QUI TAM ACTION.—Messrs. V. Lord G. BENTINCK.—This action, which, of course, excited a good deal of interest from the recent parliamentary proceedings, was tried at Guildford on Thursday. It appeared from the pleadings that the plaintiff was Charles Henry Russell, and William George Fred. Scott Bentinck, Esq., commonly called Lord George Bentinck, was the defendant. The declaration stated that one John Day died, on the 31st of May, 1843, by unlawfully betting on a horse, loss the sum of £2000 to the defendant, and that he paid that sum over to him, and that he did not within the period of three months sue the said defendant for the recovery of the money which he had so lost, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to sue and recover from the defendant the said sum of £2000, and treble the amount, making altogether £12,000. The declaration also stated that one Henry Hill had lost the sum of £2000 to the defendant, and had paid him that amount. The plea put on the record by the defendant was the general issue. Mr. Harcourt Parkes gave his opinion that the act of Parliament was an answer to the case, and barred all proceedings, but as it was stated that the defendant had no desire to avail himself of the act, the learned judge said he would try the case, and reserve the question of law if necessary. Several witnesses were examined, including Mr. Day, Mr. Hill, and Mr. Gully, but the plaintiff could not prove his case, and the jury gave a verdict for the defendant.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE AT WANDSWORTH.—Monday was fixed for the examination, at the Wandsworth Police-office, of Amelia Albery, the young woman who, on Monday, the 29th ult., attempted the murder of her two children and self-destruction, on Wandsworth-common. The prisoner is about 27 years of age, she was deadly pale, very weak, and had a vacant look. The children, one a girl six years of age, and the other a noble-looking boy about four years old, were also brought into court. The charge, as entered on the sheet against the prisoner, was as follows:—"Amelia Albery, aged 27, single woman, charged with assaulting her children, Mary Ann, aged six years, and Henry, aged four years, with intent to murder them, by drowning, and also with attempting to commit suicide at the same time, to wit, on the 29th of July last."—William Albery, a lad about 14 years of age, was sworn, and stated, "I live near the White Horse, Wandsworth, and am brother to the prisoner. On Monday evening, the 29th of July, between five and six o'clock, I was crossing Wandsworth-common, when I saw my sister sitting on the island near Mr. Wilson's; she had her two children with her; their names are Henry and Mary Ann French. I wished her to go home; she said, 'You can go home—I'm coming presently.' I went home alone, but came back shortly afterwards to play at cricket. My sister was still sitting on the island, and the children were playing near her; she called them to her and said, 'We'll go home.' She then drew them to her, left the bench on which she had been sitting, walked to the water's edge and jumped in with them. The part into which the prisoner jumped is called the 'Black Sea.' I went in after the children and held their heads up to prevent them from drowning. I hallooed for help, and kept the little children up until Mr. Steers came, and he walked into the pond and took the children out. Mr. Steers afterwards got my sister out with a great deal of trouble, and laid her upon the grass. Prisoner had said nothing to me before she went into the water about drowning her children or herself. I do not know whether she went into the pond by accident. It was in her way home."—Mr. Barrill asked the prisoner if she had anything to say?—The prisoner, in a faint voice, said "No more than that it was trouble that caused me to do so."—The prisoner was remanded till the next day.—On Tuesday the prisoner was again brought up. After several witnesses had been examined, Mr. Clive asked her if she had anything to say? The prisoner, in a low voice, uttered the words, "No farther than it is trouble." The various witnesses were then bound over to prosecute. Mr. Clive then informed the prisoner it was his duty to commit her for trial, but she would be allowed to see her children.

THE LATE POISONING CASE AT STURGEY.—COMMITTAL OF MR. BELANDY.—At the Thames Police-court on Wednesday, after the unusually long remand of six weeks, Mr. James Cockburn Belandy, surgeon, was brought up for final examination, charged with the wilful murder of Richard Belandy, his wife, by administering to her a quantity of prussic acid, at Sturgey, on the 28th of June last. The prisoner was attired in deep mourning, and appeared haggard, and much thinner than he was on the last occasion, the effects, probably, of his long confinement. He bowed respectfully to the bench on being placed in the felon's dock. The court was extremely crowded, and a number of ladies were present. Mr. Reynolds, who appeared on the part of the Crown, said he did not intend to offer any further evidence against the prisoner, as he considered that which had already been given was quite sufficient to justify the magistrate in sending the prisoner before another tribunal. The coroner's jury had already returned a verdict of wilful murder against the prisoner, and the warrant for his committal was made out. He now prayed that the prisoner be forthwith committed for trial. Mr. Clarkson, who defended the prisoner, applied to Mr. Broderip, the magistrate, for a remand to Clerkenwell prison, on the ground that the prisoner would there have better facilities for seeing his friends and legal advisers. After a long discussion, however, Mr. Broderip declined the request, and committed the prisoner to Newgate for trial. Mr. Clarkson submitted that the papers in the possession of Sergeant McCardell, who had apprehended the prisoner, ought to be restored. Mr. Cardell said he had taken one letter and a bottle of poison (acetate of morphine) from the prisoner, and he had sent them to the solicitor of the Treasury. Mr. Reynolds asked Mr. Humphreys, the letter, which was of no importance, should be delivered to him.

IRELAND.

DIABOLICAL ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—On Thursday week a most diabolical attempt was made on the life of Edward Parker, Esq., of Llanrhaeadr. Mr. Parker had been at the fair of Nenagh, and left for home about three o'clock. When he reached within about a mile of his own house, he was waylaid by an armed ruffian, who fired at him with deliberate aim, lodging twenty slugs in his back, and also wounding the boy who drove the jaunting-car. The assassin paused a moment, as if to gloat over his diabolical deed before he fled. Mr. Parker, though thus wounded, seized his pistols, and aimed twice at the sanguinary miscreant, but unfortunately both pistols missed fire. Though very seriously wounded, Mr. Parker is not in imminent danger. The boy's wound, it is feared, will prove mortal. The amiable lady and daughter of Neil Quinn, Esq., M.D., of Nenagh, were in the jaunting-car at the time of the attack, and had a narrow escape. A short time since Mr. Parker was served with a threatening notice, and his steward was nearly killed by a savage attack on him by a gang of miscreants.

A FATHER TRIED FOR THE MURDER OF HIS TWO CHILDREN.—At the Galway assizes, Peter Larkin, an old man of 66, was tried for the wilful murder of his two children, Bernard and Martin Larkin, at Shanagilly, in that county, in the month of June last. A daughter of the prisoner proved that Bernard Larkin had been killed by him with a razor. The boy was about 15. The father questioned him with a razor. The witness proceeded to depose as follows:—"Martin was asleep at the time Bernard was cut across his throat. I saw the razor with which it was done in my father's hand. I saw my father do this dreadful act. When my brother received the cut he awoke. I do not know how long he lived afterwards. I am sure he did not live long. I called my mother, and she came and ran down stairs, where she remained. Bernard got out of the bed and went into another room, in which he died. Bernard was my elder brother. I had another brother in the house at the time; he killed him also, and in the same way, and at the same time as my brother Bernard. He showed the same affection towards him as to Bernard, and only he was out of his mind he would not do it. They were the only children besides myself he had living.—Several other witnesses were examined, including James Grogan, who described the horrible appearance of the children when he entered the house. The witness added, "I asked the prisoner why he had killed his children, and he said that he thought he was doing the finest work in the world. That he knew he himself would not be long in this life, and that he was sure he was sending the children to heaven. Both the boys were dead at the time I went in."—The jury found a verdict of "Not Guilty," on the ground of insanity.

THE LATE EVENTS AT TAHITI.

In another part of our journal will be found narrated the principal intelligence of these outrageous proceedings, received during the past week.

We are now enabled to illustrate, in detail, the principal stages of the affair, as related in our journal of last week.

The first engraving shows her Majesty's ketch, 200 tons, commanded by Lieutenant Hunt, on board which vessel Queen Pomare took refuge, on her being apprised that it was intended to seize her and place her eldest son (a boy about seven years old) on a nominal throne, governed by a French Regency. Pomare has resided for several weeks on board this little vessel, not being permitted to land. To this "donkey frigate or ketch," the Earl of Minto stated, in the House of Lords, on Monday evening, has been confided our honour and interests at Tahiti, after the withdrawal of the Vindictive and the Dublin, and at the precise moment when the French played off their recent "eccentricities," as the Duke of Wellington designated them on Monday night.

The French version of this portion of the affair is, that the police having arrested the bearer of a letter which compromised Queen Pomare and Mr. Pritchard, "The moment the Queen heard that her intrigues had been detected, she ran terrified to her neighbour, the British Consul, and after a short conversation with him, it was resolved that she should repair on board the Basilisk, English war schooner, which had occupied the station since the recall of the Dublin, on the 17th of January, placing herself under the protection of the British flag, which was immediately done—that is on the 31st of January. Her whole family followed her. On the 1st of February, the Governor sent M. Malmanche, the chief of his staff, to inform the English commander that the French Government would regard as an act of hostility the re-landing of the ex-Queen Pomare on any point of the Society Islands."

Again, date March 26: "The Queen remains on board the British ship, the Basilisk. She has no longer any idea of submitting, since she finds that 1500 combatants march under her flag." It should, however, be added that the Earl of Aberdeen stated in the House of Lords, on Friday, the 2nd instant, his belief that "about the present time, and not before, Queen Pomare would be restored. It was in March last, that the French Government repudiated the acts of their officers at Tahiti, and as he had just received accounts from Tahiti, dated in March, it was probable that about this time, and not before, the instructions of the French Government would reach its officers in the Southern Seas. Queen Pomare would then be immediately restored, not to all her rights, but to the same position in which she was placed under the former Protectorate."

The second engraving shows the blockade of Tahiti by the French, and Paofai, in the harbour of Papeete, with six French boats in pursuit of a canoe, which had ventured to quit the island without leave. The chase was hot and strong, and the refractory Tahitian was not caught until he had made great portion of the circuit of the island! The affair reminds one of Cowper's stinging lines:—

To waft a feather, or to drown a

In the view are seen the prison in which Mr. Pritchard was confined, the residence of the British Consul, and the position of L'Uranie. Here, likewise, are shown the two forts constructed by the French, the circumstances of which are thus explained by the French themselves.—The chiefs of Tairabou, a peninsula on the south-eastern shore of the island, then declared that they acknowledged no authority but that of their Queen. The French account asserts that they "menaced the envoys of the Governor, and declared that they no longer obeyed his authority, and only recognised that of their Queen Pomare. This declaration was made in the presence of the British missionary, and the respect shown to him by the chiefs 'proved that he had been the promoter of it.' The French were forbidden to reappear in the bay. The Governor replied to that manifestation by ordering the construction of two blockhouses on two hills commanding Papeete. Those blockhouses were established in three days, 600 men having been employed in their construction night and day."

In the third illustration is portrayed Mr. Pritchard, in his official costume, receiving the petition of a native chief. We gather from the statement of Mr. Josiah Conder, at a meeting held at Finsbury Chapel, Moorfields, on Tuesday evening, that principally to the generosity of Mr. Pritchard is Queen Pomare indebted for aiding her to pay the fine inflicted upon her by the French. It appears that Mr. Pritchard left Tahiti early in 1841, and did not return till 1843; and it was during his absence that those events took place which ended in the dethronement of Queen Pomare.

H.M. TAHITIAN CONSUL, MR. PRITCHARD, IN HIS OFFICIAL DRESS, RECEIVING THE PETITION OF A NATIVE CHIEF.

Russell's work on Polynesia, published about two years since:—

"There has been a gratifying advance, both in religious knowledge and in the several arts which minister to the social improvement of mankind. The residence of an English Consul in Otaheite is itself a proof that the natives are no longer what they were in the days of Cook, or even of Captain Bligh. Industry is now supplied with a stimulus; the wants of the simple inhabitants are increased; their ambition is elevated; and they have learned to aspire to an imitation of the dress, luxuries, and manners of the most enlightened people in the world."

THE OUTRAGE AT TAHITI.—A public meeting was held in Finsbury Chapel on Tuesday evening, Alexander Fletcher, the minister of the chapel, in the chair, upon the subject of the late outrage at Tahiti. Mr. Conder entered into a statement of the circumstances, and insisted upon the danger with which Protestantism was threatened in the Pacific, after which Mr. Wise read a resolution expressive of indignation at the unprovoked outrage upon the British Consul. The resolution was agreed to unanimously, as was a resolution—"That the meeting felt that the good fame and honour of Great Britain were compromised by the denial to Queen Pomare of the repeatedly solicited pledge of protection given by Mr. Cannan in 1837, and by the withdrawal of the English naval force from Tahiti."

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—On Monday a communication was opened for foot passengers from Oxford-street to Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury, on the south side of the new thoroughfare that is to connect Oxford-street with Holborn, by which the circuitous route in front of St. Giles's church may be avoided. The passage is across the cellars which have been built for the new houses on that side of the street. On the north side of the way the whole of the ground is nearly excavated for the vaults, which will be completed in a very short time. In digging the ground about the spot where stood the hospital, some deep wells were found, in which were pumps that had evidently been there several hundred years, as they were formed of hollow trees sunk in the walls.

BURNING OF THE WASHINGTON HOTEL, NEW YORK.

BURNING OF THE WASHINGTON HOTEL, NEW YORK.

We have just received from our clever artist, resident in New York, the original of the annexed engraving of this lamentable catastrophe, by which the splendid Washington Hotel has been so far destroyed, that nothing but the bare walls are left standing.

The site of the hotel is at the angle of Broadway and Reade-streets. The fire was first discovered at about half-past ten, A. M., on the 4th ult.: it was then perceived bursting out from the eaves of the building along the roof, and is supposed to have originated from sparks lodged on the roof, by the firing of rockets, at the Independence Commemoration. The fire continued to rage slowly but surely, as from its height and the headway it had got under before it was discovered, it was found utterly impossible to suppress it. The firemen with their engines and apparatus were on hand at an early hour, but without being able to do anything except to save the adjoining buildings.

The building was owned by John G. Costar, Esq., of this city, and originally cost 140,000 dollars. It was erected during the years 1809-10, and '11, by the Washington Union Benevolent Society. The stock was divided into shares, and it became a losing concern to the stockholders, causing them to dispose of it, when it was altered and constructed into an hotel. Mr. Van Buren formerly made it his headquarters when in the city.

As a singular coincidence, we may mention the circumstance that the corner-stone of the edifice was laid on the 4th day of July, 1809—just 35 years ago, about the same time that the fire broke out. The corner-stone was laid on the north-east corner of the building, on Reade-street.

The building presents a melancholy appearance, nothing being left but the four walls blackened and burnt, and a spectacle of splendid ruins!

CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE AT NEW YORK.

"The Glorious Fourth" of July, as most of our readers may be aware, is the day set aside by Brother Jonathan as the great anniversary of independence throughout the United States. The New Yorks celebrate the affair in right metropolitan splendour; and our artist has chosen one of its most stirring scenes on the 4th of last month. The carnival of liberty cannot perhaps be better described than in the following extract from the Atlas New York Journal—

On the evening of the third, a number of juveniles, in accordance to custom, commenced firing off pistols. The native aldermen, in some of the wards, were determined, however, that these young go-a-headers should not take time by the forelock in handling a firelock. They accordingly stopped their sport. Now, this enabled a number of persons who care not a cent for the day to slumber to the music, probably, of their own proboscis, who might otherwise have been awaked out of a few hours repose. It is evident that, if a natives have made but little progress in great reforms, they have made great progress in little reforms: and we are rather inclined to think that the public fully understand the value of their great services, and will reward them accordingly.

The sun, on the day of days, rose beautifully, as though enamoured of it. He even tempered his fiery beams, suffering cool and pleasant airs to play before his face, for the especial benefit of those who celebrated the day. But he did not shine into the booths, which, all in the olden time, surrounded the park—for there were no booths to shine in. He did not, in consequence, see the tired travellers reposing there and taking a luncheon or dinner, as it might be, to refresh and invigorate themselves. "Oh, no," said he, "the native is a high character like myself. He is an aristocrat, too, and will not disturb the pleasure of the rich for the convenience (he had almost said necessity) of the poor. I must take example by him, and shine only upon the rich."

The sun then looked towards the fountain, and he saw quantities of ice dumped into the basin, disturbing the dirt at the bottom, which mixed with the Croton; and he saw hundreds and hundreds of persons drinking of the muddy mixture out of tin dippers; and he heard the Common Council rejoicing greatly over the Croton punch which they had provided for others, and which they did not drink themselves.

"These gentlemen are not so bad, after all," said he; "for if they do prevent the country people, in a great measure, from purchasing eatables, they provide them with gruel gratis—a gruel that would be of great value in a poor house, for even an Oliver Twist would not ask for more!"

Of the other matters and things, what shall we say? How shall we tell the oft-told tale? How that the boats were thronged throughout the day with thousands of human beings bent on pleasure excursions, until the bay itself looked alive, and one might have imagined that the city would be deserted—how that the military and civic procession was well got up, and greatly admired—how the veteran corps fired—how the bells rung—how the crackers exploded—how the orations were delivered—how the museums were filled, the theatres crowded, and how the exhibition of fireworks at night really did honour to his honour and the other honours who had the honour of securing them? These things can be better understood than expressed.

The officers on duty, and others, were accommodated by the mayor with crackers, cheese, and lemonade, after which they adjourned to the residence of General Sanford, to get some refreshment.

EXECUTION OF A MURDERER AT NOTTINGHAM.—DREADFUL OCCURRENCE.

On Wednesday morning, the awful sentence of death was carried into execution, in front of the County Gaol, at Nottingham, upon William Saville, aged 39, for the murder of his wife and three children, at Colwick; the full particulars of which have already appeared in our journal.

The department of the culprit since the passing of the sentence has evinced the utmost hardihood and indifference to his ignominious end. There was, however, on Saturday last, a slight relaxation of his firmness, and he sent for a magistrate, to whom he confessed that he murdered his wife, but denied killing the children. He said that his wife having cut all their throats, he resolved that he would "serve her the same." The circumstances elicited at the trial, however, disprove this tale.

On the night preceding the execution, Saville was in good spirits and slept well. He arose about five, and walked about in the felon's yard until six. He then spent an hour with the Rev. W. Butler, the chaplain of the gaol, in prayer and religious exercises. At seven he ate a hearty breakfast, and was brought up into the grand jury-room soon afterwards. Here he was pinioned, a pair of heavy irons put about his legs, and the fatal noose placed round his neck. The customary prayers were read by the rev. chaplain, after which a few minutes remained before it was eight o'clock, the appointed hour. He desired the clergyman to tell those assembled that he acknowledged the justice of his sentence, and requested their prayers. He then shook hands with the turnkeys and others, and asked the governor of the gaol, "Is it time?" Upon being told the hour was come, he arose with alacrity, and the mournful procession approached the scaffold, which the prisoner ascended with the greatest firmness. He was greeted with terrific yelling and shouting, but in less than a minute after his appearance before the crowd, the cap was pulled over his face, and the belt withdrawn. The murderer gave a few convulsive throes, and in a short time life was extinct. After hanging the usual time, the body was cut down and buried the same evening within the precincts of the gaol.

ACCIDENT AT NOTTINGHAM.

The crowd on the occasion was unprecedentedly large, and, in consequence, a most shocking accident occurred. The place where the execution took place is in a confined street called High Pavement, between 20 and 30 feet wide, and at the distance of about 100 yards is an avenue, called Garner's-bill, a very steep descent, with five or six steps at the top. As soon as the drop fell, the crowd rushed violently along High Pavement, and buried a number of persons down the steps. Eight were taken up dead from suffocation, four have died since. Another account states that in all 30 persons were seriously injured.

A letter which we have seen, contains the following details:—"A few minutes since, I saw one of Tunley and Hudson's men with a light waggon, and he told me he had removed seven dead bodies to the workhouse, and taken four nearly dead to the Infirmary. In all, at the lowest computation, there cannot be less than eleven or twelve killed outright, and many more are expected to die. And all this took place without any scaffolding breaking down, or accident of a like description, but was caused by pressure only. There were no barricades in the streets to break the force."

THE ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH AT SLOUGH, ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

By aid of the extraordinary power of this triumph of science, the auspicious event of her Majesty's accession on Tuesday morning, was communicated from Windsor Castle to the metropolis within eleven minutes! The details are as follows:—

"At two minutes past six o'clock, a messenger, mounted upon one of the fleetest horses in the royal stables, was despatched from the Castle to Mr. Howell, the superintendent at the Slough station, with instructions to communicate, by means of the electro-magnetic telegraphic, to the person in attendance at the Telegraph-office, at Paddington, to the effect that the letters, which had been waiting there for several days past, addressed to the Cabinet Ministers and the Great Officers of State, were to be delivered at the residences of the respective parties without a moment's delay. The messenger reached the Slough station within 8 minutes of his departure from the Castle, then 10 minutes past 6 o'clock; and although Mr. Russell, the gentleman who has the superintendence of the Telegraph-office, and Mr. Howell, had to be called from their beds, yet such was the admirable nature of the arrangements which had been made, and the extreme rapidity with which they were carried into effect, that within three minutes of the instructions reaching the Slough station, the telegraph was not only at work, but the communication was despatched to Paddington, and an acknowledgment of its receipt returned to Slough; and this was all effected within eleven minutes of the special messenger's departure from the Castle!

At Deptford and Woolwich dockyards the union-jack was hoisted at an early hour, and the numerous Government steamers and men-of-war lying off these docks were daily dressed out with their flags, and formed a sight of no ordinary occurrence on the Thames. At the latter place, the Royal Artillery fired a royal salute on the occasion.

Immediately on the news reaching Gravesend, it was promptly communicated to the commander of the Russian frigate, Aurora, lying off the Terrace Pier, and shortly afterwards a royal salute was fired from that splendid vessel, the Aurora being the ship playing at the same time the national anthem.

At Chatham the troops were instantly mustered, and a double salute was fired from the lines, and a similar honour was done by her Majesty's ship Ocean, the guard-ship at Sheerness, the numerous vessels moored in the river Medway displaying their colours.

A Pray Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, at the Council Chamber, Whitehall, when it was ordered that a form of thanksgiving for the Queen's safe delivery of a Prince be prepared by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be used in all churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, on Sunday (to-morrow), or the Sunday after the respective ministers shall receive the same. The prayer is as follows:

O Merciful Lord and heavenly Father, by whose goodness and bounty we meet to-day to give thanks for the birth of a Prince, the Queen, Thy servant, has been blessed with a son. Thy goodness has been made manifest to Thy people, in delivering Thy servant, the Queen, from the perils of child-birth, and giving her the blessing of a son. Comfort, we beseech thee, Thy faithful servants, and support and comfort her in the hours of weakness, and day by day renew her strength. Preserve the infant Prince from whatever is hurtful either to body or soul; and cause him, as he advances in years, with true wisdom and every Christian virtue. Regard with Thy special favour our Queen and her Royal Consort, that they may long live together in the enjoyment of all earthly happiness, and may finally be made partakers of everlasting glory. Implant in the hearts of Thy people a deep sense of Thy goodness, by Thy bounty, and give us grace to show forth our thankfulness by faithful affection to our Sovereign, by brotherly love to one another, and by constant obedience to Thy commandments; so that, passing through this life in Thy faith and fear, we may in the life to come be received into Thy heavenly kingdom, through the merits and mediation of Thy blessed Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Pray Council also ordered that every minister and preacher, as well as the Established Church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland as those of the Episcopal Communion, protected and allowed by an act passed in the tenth year of her Majesty Queen Anne, chapter 7, entitled "An act to prevent the disturbing those of the Episcopal Communion in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, in the exercise of their religious worship, and in the use of the Liturgy of the Church of England; and for repealing the act, passed in the Parliament of Scotland, entitled 'An act against irregular Baptisms and Marriages,'" should, at some time during the exercise of divine service in their respective churches, congregations, or assemblies, put up their prayers and thanksgiving to Almighty God for her Majesty's safe delivery of a Prince.

Some misapprehension seems to prevail as to the title of the young Prince. He has already been designated "Duke of York," probably from the circumstance that the second son of King George III. was invested with that title. A morning contemporary, however, says that the Prince may hereafter be created Duke of Kent—that having been the title of her Majesty's father, whose demise without heirs male left it unappropriated.

It is by no means an uninteresting incident, that the news of this important circumstance was published by the Times at half-past eight o'clock, just forty minutes after it took place at Windsor. Our contemporary states that it was indebted to the extraordinary power of the electro-magnetic telegraph for the rapid communication of this important announcement.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Saturday last her Majesty and Prince Albert promenaded for some time on the terrace of the Castle. The royal family were taken out for airings.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk this morning in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness took an airing in the afternoon in a pony phaeton. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay performed divine service in the private chapel of the Castle.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked this morning in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness also took an airing in a pony phaeton. The royal children were driven out in an open carriage in the morning. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Major-General Wemyss, rode out on horseback. The unfavourable state of the weather, during the whole of the afternoon, prevented her Majesty and Prince Albert taking their accustomed airing. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined with the Queen and Prince Albert at the Castle in the evening.

TUESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback in the afternoon; and their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were taken their usual walks and rides in the course of the day.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager sent from her residence, Busby Park, this morning, to make inquiry after the health of the Queen. There were also, numerous other inquiries. Prince Albert rode out in the afternoon, and the royal children were taken the usual drives and walks.

THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—We rejoice to state that her Majesty and the royal infant are proceeding most favourably. The Queen, last night, enjoyed several hours of refreshing sleep, and up to this hour (nine o'clock) continues remarkably well. Prince Albert took walking exercise this morning in the Home Park, visiting the royal aviary and spire, and returned to the Castle at luncheon. His Royal Highness rode out this afternoon on horseback, attended by Major-General Wemyss. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this afternoon. The Lady Charlotte Dundas was in attendance upon the royal ducal. The infant royal family were taken out for their usual airings this morning, in the Home Park; and this afternoon they were driven out for a carriage airing through the Long-walk towards Virginia Water, returning to the Castle at six o'clock. The Dowager Lady Lynton was in attendance upon the Princess Royal. A vast number of the nobility and gentry, not only in the neighbourhood, but several residing in London, left their names in the visitors' book at the Castle during the day.

THE KING OF SAXONY.—On Friday week the King of Saxony went to Edinburgh, where his Majesty was received with every possible respect. The Parliament-house at the bottom of the Castle-hill was visited, the Lord Provost of the city, the Lord Advocate, and other authorities being in waiting to offer their official attendance in conducting the illustrious stranger over the several departments of that public building. Proceeding by the North Bridge, and by Waterloo-place, his Majesty repaired to the Calton-hill, and, having ascended to the tower at the top, remained for a short period beholding the extensive view commanded from that eminence. The ancient Palace of Holyrood was the next object in the royal itinerary, his Majesty taking an entire inspection of the state apartments of that regal residence, in which are an indifferent collection of the Scottish sovereigns. The royal party having concluded their visit forthwith repaired to Arthur's Seat. His Majesty and attendants went by the pathway to the top of the mountain, and seemed particularly pleased in viewing the vast range of diversified scenery for miles around. His Majesty and party then left on their return to Dalmeah Castle, the distinguished circle having the pleasure of meeting the illustrious guest of the noble Earl of Morison at dinner.—On Sunday last his Majesty embarked at Granton Pier on board the Lightning steamer for Hamburg, on his return to his own dominions.

PARENTS TO THE QUEEN FROM LOUIS PHILIPPE.—The St. Yves, Gobelins, and Beauvais royal manufactures, and several private artists and manufacturers, have received large and splendid orders from the French civil list, destined, it is believed, for presents from the King of the French during his visit to England.

STATUS OF PRINCE ALBERT.—A marble statue of Prince Albert, executed by the celebrated sculptor Wolff, has arrived from Leghorn, and has been forwarded to Windsor Castle.

MORE ROYAL VISITS.—It is stated that the Prince and Princess Royal of Prussia are about to come to England, on an invitation from Queen Victoria.

ALLIANCE IN HIGH LIFE.—The marriage of Lord George Hamilton, M.P., brother of the Marquis of Abercorn, to Miss Pease, daughter of Rear-Admiral the Hon. George Pease, Esq., presumptive heir to Lord Carrington, took place, on Wednesday, at Lambeth. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury performed the ceremony. The attendance of family connections was numerous. Lady Harriet Hamilton, sister of Lord Hamilton, was one of the bridesmaids. After the ceremony the noble lord and his fair bride proceeded to Belgrave-square, where a splendid entertainment was given to a large and distinguished party. The bride and bridegroom afterwards left town for the Priory, Sandown, the seat of the Marquis of Abercorn, there to spend the honeymoon. The contemplated marriage between the Earl of Melfort, only son of the Marquis of Normandy, and Miss Russell, niece of the Dowager Duchess of Cleveland, is to take place on the 17th instant, at Mulgrave Castle, near Whitby. Mr. Charles W. Beaumont, eldest son of the Rev. Lord Frederick Beaumont, will be united, early in the ensuing week, to the accomplished daughter of a gentleman of large fortune in Sussex.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

SUSPENSION OF A CLERGYMAN.—A proceeding was recently instituted under the Church Discipline Act, against the Rev. James Frederick Todd, M.A., Vicar of Isleworth. Some time since, the brother of Mr. Benjamin Hart, an inhabitant of that parish, died, and the burial service was performed by the Rev. Defendant. One part of the service was omitted, namely, the words "as our hope is in our brother's death." The Bishop of Exeter in stating his judgment upon these proceedings, gave his opinion that the words were omitted because the minister did not choose to give expression to the pious and charitable hope of the Church, that the deceased Christian brother resteth in our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life, and in whom, unless he resteth so as to be raised in him at the last day, he hath perished everlastingly. The Right Rev. Prelate after some appropriate remarks upon the offence, pronounced his judgment that the Rev. James Frederick Todd be suspended for the space of fourteen days, to be computed from the time of publishing the suspension in the parish church of Isleworth, from all discharge of his clerical functions, and execution of the duties thereof.

CAMBRIDGE, Aug. 3.—King's College: James A. Yonge, Scholar, has just been elected a Fellow; Bernard Drake and Thomas Brocklebank have just been admitted Scholars of this society. Emmanuel College: The Rev. Joseph Brett Grant, B.A., has been appointed to the mastership of the Endowed Free Grammar School, at Haworth, Yorkshire. Pembroke College: The Rev. Thomas Mirt, M.A., has been presented to the head mastership of the Free Grammar School, Bakewell, Derbyshire. The Rev. Henry Ives Bailey, incumbent of Brighthelmton, near Leeds, has been instituted by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln to the vicarage of North Leverton, Nottinghamshire, on the presentation of the Lord Bishop of Ripon.

The Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. David have ordered the pews that are in the nave of the Cathedral to be removed, and the whole of it to be thrown open. Benches of oak will be substituted.

The Rev. William Hutton, vicar of Wharfedale, Lancashire, has been presented to the rectory of Beetham, vacant by the death of the Rev. Joseph Thaxton; and the Rev. James Pollitt, formerly missionary in India, has been instituted to the vicarage of Linlithgow, near Carlisle.

OXFORD, Aug. 6.—Yesterday the election of three scholars from the Free School at Abingdon, to Pembroke College, took place, when Mr. E. Hall, son of the late Master of Pembroke, and Messrs. Goodenough and Swaley, were elected.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE JUDGMENT IN THE CASE OF O'CONNELL AND OTHERS.—We have reason to believe that the Judges will meet, upon their return from the several circuits, on Monday, the 26th inst., to consider of their judgment on the writ of error in this important case. The judgment will probably be delivered in the House of Lords on the following Wednesday or Thursday.

CHURCH RATES.—The polling in the parish of St. Saviour's, Southwark, for a church-rate, closed on Tuesday, when the numbers were equal, there being for the 6d. rate, 132; and for the 3d. rate, 129—on which the wardens gave the casting vote for the 3d. rate.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The rate of mortality, notwithstanding the apparently favourable character of the weather, still continues considerably above the average. In the week ending on Saturday last, the number of deaths from all causes, within the Bills of Mortality, was no less than 1014, while the average of five summers gives only 900; and of five years, only 965, as the ordinary number of deaths per week.

DEATH FROM EXPOSURE TO THE WEATHER.—On Thursday Mr. Mills held an inquest at the Swan, Chalk-road, on the body of William Lyndford, aged 36. It appeared that the unfortunate deceased led a wild wandering life, and that having drunk too much he fell down on the carpet ground, behind All Saints' Church, Islington, on Tuesday night, and being unable to raise himself up, he was exposed to the torrents of rain that fell during the night. On the following morning he was found completely drowned, and dead on the spot where he first fell. Verdict, "Found dead."

FIRE IN THE BOROUGH.—On Monday a fire burst forth from the extensive premises tenanted by Messrs. Staff and Co., marquee, tent, and flag-manufacturers, situated at Lawton-street, Great Dover-road. Before any assistance could be obtained, the fire extended to some immense piles of marquee covers, one of which was sufficiently spacious to cover 4000 persons. It contained upwards of 12,000 yards of the best canvas. Besides these there were several thousand yards of manufactured tarpaulin, awning, rich cloth, and other stock in trade. The shed in which they were stored was 140 feet long by 18 feet broad, and the height was eight feet. Upwards of half this warehouse, with the valuable contents, is destroyed. There was also damage done to several of the adjoining houses. Messrs. Staff and Co.'s loss is very considerable. Unfortunately they are uninsured.

RECOVERY FROM APPARENT DEATH.—The following singular case of apparent death and extraordinary recovery occurred at Deacon's Hotel, Walbrook, on Monday evening. The waiter, whose name is Boston, while pursuing his usual duties, was observed to stagger, and utter an exclamation of pain, and would have fallen had not a gentleman sitting near caught him. He appeared perfectly insensible, and was no sooner conveyed to bed than to all appearance he immediately expired. The house was in consequence closed, and remained so till twelve o'clock on Tuesday. Mr. Deacon, the proprietor, who was out of town, had arrived about the above time, and went into the room where the body lay, when he perceived a slight movement of the head—on further examination, he perceived that the heart was beating, though very slightly. Dr. Lucking of Walbrook was instantly called in, and applied restorative, and in a short time the young man so far recovered as to be able to resume his usual avocations.

SUICIDE OF A LUNATIC.—On Tuesday Mr. Mills held an inquest at the King's Arms, Bethnal-green-road, on the body of John Holland, aged thirty-five, an engineer, living in the neighbourhood. A niece of deceased, a little girl, aged fourteen, proved finding him dead with his throat cut on Saturday evening, in his workshop. The landlord of deceased proved instances of insanity on his part about twelve months ago, and another witness said that, after an excess of intemperance, he was decidedly mad, and in that state, seven months ago, he jumped out of a boat into the Thames at Chelsea. Verdict, "Insanity."

COUNTRY NEWS.

FUNERAL OF DR. DALTON.—Dr. Dalton's funeral at Manchester is to take place on Monday next. The literary and scientific associations and societies of the town have already intimated the intention of their respective councils or directories to attend the funeral. The Manchester Medical Society has determined to attend in a body, and the professors, lecturers, and other officers of the Manchester Royal School of Medicine and Surgery, also propose to join the procession in a body. It is also probable that the mayor and corporation of Manchester will attend in a body.

EXTENSIVE FIRE NEAR GRAVESEND.—On Wednesday morning early a fire of a most alarming kind broke out at the village of Lower Shorne, near Chalk, a few miles from Gravesend, which terminated in the all but destruction of what formed that secluded village. It is situated in a vale, about a mile and a half from old Chalk church, and lies about mid-way between the Chatham road and the Thames. The fire originated in the house of a labouring family named White. This, with six others, formed a row on the left hand side of the lower road, and immediately behind them stood a farm, the whole being the property of Mr. Thomas Solomon, the tenants being employed on his estate, the largest in that part of Kent. A vast number of persons came to their assistance, and every effort was resorted to in order to prevent the flames extending. Three poor fellows were extinguished sadly burnt, and it was much feared that one or more fell a sacrifice. The flames reached another of Mr. Solomon's homesteads, called the Queen's Farm, the premises of which were of great extent. This and another farm, called the King's Farm, with much valuable property was destroyed. A later account states that one of the poor fellows who attempted to save part of the property has since died from the injuries he received. His name is James Miller.

EXECUTION AT LINCOLN.—On Friday week, at twelve o'clock, the unfortunate woman, Eliza Joyce, suffered the extreme penalty of the law, on the new drop, for the wilful murder of her two children, Eliza and Ann Joyce, at Boston, Lincolnshire, by administering to them laudanum. It being market-day, upwards of 3000 spectators were present. We recently gave the particulars of the trial among the assize intelligence.

THE BIRMINGHAM BANK ROBBERY.—Warner, the clerk in the establishment of the Birmingham Town and District Banking Company, charged with stealing £4210, has been again brought before the magistrates of that town, and fully committed to take his trial at the ensuing Warwick assizes.

COMMITTAL OF RICHARD DADD, THE PARACIDE.—On Monday morning this unhappy man was brought up on remand before a bench of magistrates at Rochester, charged with the wilful murder of his father on the 18th of August, 1843, in Colham-park. The evidence having been gone over, the particulars of which have been often published, the prisoner was asked if he had any questions to put, and, with a shake of the head, he said no. The magistrates retired for a short time, and on their return the reverend chairman inquired of the prisoner if he had anything to say why he should not be committed for the offence with which he stands charged? Prisoner: Oh no, of course not. The prisoner was then committed. Mr. Brown, a solicitor, who attended on behalf of the family of this unfortunate young man, made an application to the magistrates under the 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 24, "that if two justices of the peace, and two surgeons, make a report of the insanity of the prisoner to the Secretary of State, he can, upon the receipt of it, order the prisoner to be confined in some lunatic asylum." The magistrates intimated that such a course will be taken.

SERIOUS FIRE AT EXETER.—On Friday week a fire broke out at Exeter, which in a brief space of time consumed, besides partially destroying other buildings, nearly twenty houses. The premises consisted of buildings intended to have been fire-proof, and formed the stores and meeting rooms of Mr. N. Fulkett, situated in the centre of the densely-populated district known as St. Mary Archway-street. The loss is estimated at about £10,000, which will partially be made good by insurances.

DREADFUL CASE OF ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE.—The Scotch papers mention a distressing affair which took place on Sunday week in a family named Fide, belonging to Alton Colliery. Regarding some trifling circumstance, a dispute arose between the father and his son, a young lad of about twenty, till at length the former, enraged almost to fury, lifted a hoe, which unfortunately happened to be lying near, and struck his son a tremendous blow with it on the head, laying the skull almost open. It was not expected that the lad could survive, and accordingly information was speedily conveyed to the police, who proceeded to the house, and took the father into custody. He, however, requested to be allowed to go into another apartment for a moment, and had been absent but a very short time, when the officers found him wallowing in his blood, having in the interval cut his throat in a shocking manner. Medical aid was instantly procured for both; but, very little hopes were entertained of their recovery.

ATTEMPT BY A FATHER TO MURDER HIS DAUGHTER.—The Birmingham Gazette gives an account of an occurrence at Erdington, which appears to have created considerable excitement there. A man named John Weaver attempted last week to murder his daughter, Charlotte Weaver, aged 23, and then committed suicide. It appears that in the morning Weaver went to his daughter's lodging, and said he had procured her a situation in the family of the Rev. Mr. Roe, at Erdington. She prepared breakfast, of which they partook, and then having dressed herself, and tied up a few articles of wearing apparel, she left the house with her father, and proceeded along the lanes leading from Tipton to Erdington. After walking for some time, he asked her if she was in the habit of paying to God for food, and a good bed, and the means of living? She replied that she was; at which he seemed pleased, and commended her for doing so. Having arrived at a lonely spot, Weaver leaped behind his daughter, and suddenly rushing towards her, struck her a violent blow on the side of the head with a stick which he had in his hand. The poor girl staggered, but, although dreadfully cut and stunned by the blow, did not fall, on which he seized and dragged her across the lane, dashed her on the ground, threw himself upon her body, and cut her throat in two places, saying, as well as the girl can recollect, "I must do it, I must do it." Having, as he thought, accomplished his object, he left her, and she contrived with the greatest difficulty to reach an adjoining house, where she received immediate medical assistance. Weaver was found sitting quietly in a blade-lane. Throughout the day Weaver appeared quite composed, frequently repeating prayers, and assigning as his reason for attempting to murder his daughter that he should be hanged, and both then would be out of misery; this incoherent statement, however, was negatived by the fact of a bank-note for £200, another for £50, and several sovereigns being found concealed in various parts of his apparel. Nothing occurred during the evening to attract the attention of the person who had Weaver in charge; but on the following morning, on opening the room door, it was discovered that he had strangled himself by means of some piece of cord which he had on his person, and which he had tied tightly round his neck. The poor girl, Charlotte Weaver, is considered out of danger.

DESTRUCTION OF BLAMPHAYNE HOUSE BY FIRE.—Letters have been received announcing the outbreak of a destructive fire at Clayton, a few miles from Exeter, which totally burnt down one of the most antique structures in that part of the country, called Blampayne House, the seat of Sir Edward Marwood Elton, but which was tenanted at the time of its loss by a gentleman named Perry. Its ancient build and picturesque situation formed a very great attraction in the country, having been erected in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Thomas Marwood, Esq., one of Sir Edward's ancestors. The fire broke out on Wednesday week; and within an hour after its discovery, the building, with all its ancient relics, was reduced to ruins. The loss is very considerable, and it is understood that the house was not insured.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—There was a man killed near the Yate station on the Bristol and Gloucester Railway on Saturday. The accounts vary, but the most consistent story states, that on the above evening he was coming down by the Gloucester train, and either forgot or was too late to get out at Chalfeld; he called to the engine to stop, but his request being unheard he got out of the carriage, either to induce him to stop or to jump off, when his foot slipped and he fell on the rail, and the wheels severed his head from his body instantly.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—An inquest was held on Monday last, before Mr. Symonds, at the railway station, Rugby, on view of the body of Lucy Grant, Richard Stone, a porter in the employ of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, was attending the nine P.M. down train on Saturday evening; he saw a second-class carriage and proceeded on her road to the Midland Counties' line, by a train on which she was going to Ullesthorpe station; after walking a short distance she returned to the carriage she had left, placed one foot on the step and the other on the footboard, saying that she was looking for a bird and cage she had left behind. From further evidence it appeared that the train was put in motion, and before alarm could be given, four of the carriages passed over her, lacerating her limbs in a dreadful manner. She was perfectly sensible to the last; and a short time before her decease she exclaimed, "Oh! my poor bird; if it had not been for you this would not have happened." Deceased was twenty-four years of age, and had been employed as housemaid in the family of Mr. William Corbet Smith, of Bittenwell-hall, Leicestershire, about fourteen months, and was on her way from London to the residence of Mr. Smith when the accident occurred. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death, with a decedent of it, on the engine, and expressed their opinion that no blame whatever was attached to the engine-driver, or any of the servants belonging to the company."

TWELVE MEN DROWNED IN THE SEVERN.—Accounts have been received from Worcester of a melancholy accident, which took place on the Severn on Monday. Messrs. Grissell and Peto have lately employed a number of men in improving the navigation of the River Severn, at Digby, near Worcester. About six o'clock fifteen of the men, who were working on the side of the river opposite to the city, entered a small boat, for the purpose of rowing to the contrary side, and near to which a great portion of the works are going on. The boat was too heavily laden, the whole party were capsized, and three only were saved. The bodies were all recovered, and at an inquest held upon them, verdicts of "Accidental death" were returned with regard to all the deceased. The evidence proved that the real cause of the accident was a rope, by which a barge was moored to the bank. To cross the river the boat must necessarily pass under the rope, and on reaching it one of the men (Richard White) lifted up the rope. At the same moment the 12 men standing up in the boat stooped down to clear the rope, and this caused the boat immediately to capsize, precipitating the whole into the river.

POSTSCRIPT.

DINNER TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS BY THE CLOTHWORKERS' COMPANY.—On Thursday evening a very splendid entertainment was given to Sir Robert Peel, and others of her Majesty's Ministers, by the Clothworkers' Company, at their Hall, which was fitted up for the occasion with surprising magnificence. The plate exhibited was considered to be of the value of £20,000. Mr. Sheriff Mansgrove, the Master, was in the chair, and several Conservative members of Parliament were present. Her Majesty's health was given with even more than the accustomed enthusiasm; and the Master having subsequently proposed that of the Ministers, Sir Robert Peel returned thanks. The right honourable baron, in the course of his speech, said that Ministers had endeavoured to maintain peace without compromising the honour or sacrificing the interests of the country. (Cheers.) They had attempted to uphold the high character which the British army had achieved, and to repair the disasters in the Eastern Hemisphere. They had endeavoured to maintain tranquillity without having recourse to the harsh enforcement of existing laws, or requiring new enactments. (Loud applause.) The toast was received with tumults of applause. Lord Elliot, in acknowledging the toast of "Prosperity to Ireland," said he was sure the time was not far distant when the people of Ireland would learn to value the motives and intentions of his right honourable friend. (Cheers.)

A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office yesterday, at one o'clock, and was attended by all the Ministers.

The Courts of Aldermen and Common Council met yesterday, and adopted addresses of congratulation to her Majesty on the birth of the infant Prince.

Sir R. Peel leaves town in a few days for the seat of the Duke of Rutland, Belvoir Castle, to enjoy the sport of grouse shooting; and Sir James Graham leaves town to-day for his seat, Netherby-hall, Cumberland.

DUDLEY ELECTION.—RETURN OF THE CONSERVATIVE CANDIDATE.—The polling commenced on Thursday, and the result was the return of Mr. Benbow, the Conservative candidate, by a large majority. The numbers at the close of the poll were—

For Mr. Benbow .. .. . 388

Mr. Rawson .. .. . 175

Majority for Mr. Benbow .. .. . 213

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—Yesterday (Friday) the proprietors of the London and Birmingham Railway held their general meeting at the station in Euston-square. The meeting was most fully attended. George Cary Glynn, Esq., chairman of the company, took the chair. The report stated that the balance in hand, on the 31st December last, was £383,994 14s. 4d., and the cash received since that time, up to the 30th of June last, was £750,574 4s. 1d., making in the whole, £1,134,578 18s. 5d. The total expenditure for the six months last past was £739,332 14s., leaving a balance to be divided among the proprietors of £395,246 4s. 5d., on which a dividend of 5 per cent. was immediately declared, leaving £15,886 as a stock in hand. A valuable service of plate, and a purse of gold, realised by private subscription from the proprietors, was presented to Mr. Richard Creed, the secretary to the company.

We regret to announce that Ben Morgan, the celebrated Irish vocalist, expired on Sunday last at Kingston, Surrey, after a long and painful illness.

THE LAMENATED CATASTROPHES AT NOTTINGHAM.—The following particulars were received subsequently to the account given in another part of our paper. As soon as the deep fell, a party of ruffians just under the gallows immediately began to push down the street, hoping, in the confusion, to get excited, to secure some plunder. The crowd, already half-enraged, undesignedly lent their aid to the vagabonds, and by the time they had got halfway down High Pavement, the crash became terrific. Presently some unfortunate persons stumbled and fell, and were mercilessly trodden under foot, for none could help them. Opposite the Blue Coat School so many were down, that it afforded a sort of check to the rush, and Garner's-hill (a small avenue approached by a descent of seven steps) being opposite, the people were hurried headlong down the descent, and soon there was a heap of nearly a hundred persons lying one on another. This proved the most dreadful part of the affair, seven persons being taken up dead, and a number of others in a dying state. The number of persons killed was 12. Their names are as follow:—Eliza Smith, of Daybrook, aged 19; John Reddall, of Old Radford, aged 14; James Fisher, of Radwell, aged 23; Hannah Smalley, of Owlton, aged 14; Thomas Easthope, aged 9, and Mary Easthope, aged 14 (brother and sister), of New Lenton; James Marshall, of Isabella-street, aged 14; Eliza Hannah Shuttlesworth, of Albion-street, aged 13; Thomas Watson, of Kent-street, aged 14; Mary Stephenson, of Daybrook, aged 35 (widow, and mother of two children, and sister of Eliza Smith); Elizabeth Festival, of Convent-street, aged 13; Mary Russell, of Birchwood, aged 22. No less than 91 were seriously injured, and many others were more or less hurt. On Wednesday evening an inquest on the first eight of the sufferers was held at the police-station, before Mr. C. Swann, the county coroner. Evidence only was taken as to the identity of the bodies, and the inquiry was adjourned till Friday (yesterday). Another inquest on the other four was held at the infirmary, and adjourned to the same time and place.

THE CONVICT DALMAN.—The convict Dalman has been removed from the Millbank Penitentiary to the Insane Ward of Bethlem Hospital, there to be confined during her Majesty's pleasure as a lunatic. The reports of the medical gentlemen who have daily visited Dalman since his incarceration in the Penitentiary, leave but little or any doubt of his insanity.

FOREIGN.

THE WAR BETWEEN FRANCE AND MOROCCO.—Some further advices have been received from Paris, which give a much more favourable complexion to the dispute between France and Morocco. Some hope was beginning to prevail in Paris of a satisfactory termination of that affair. Marshal Bugeaud, it appears, was despatched by the advance of the son of the Emperor when he wrote to Prince de Joinville to attack Salas and Mogadore. His last despatches fully admit this error, and the marshal now sees the possibility of a speedy arrangement being come to.—[At the same time that we mention the feeling now said to be entertained in Paris, it is right to add, that no fact has transpired to ally the apprehensions naturally caused by preceding accounts.]

A letter from Hannover communicates the important fact of the secession of Brunswick from the Prussian Customs Union. It is stated that Brunswick has taken this step because convinced that the present state of things must lead to its ruin, so long as Hanover and other states decline joining the Union.

Thou Minstrel! whose entrancing touch
Upon thy favourite instrument—the heart,—
Hath oft delighted us so much,
Congenial Art
Here builds a monument to Thee!
Although in ev'ry page
Of thy bewitching poetry
A monument to latest age
Rais'd by thyself we see!
Here are no void, sepulchral urns—
Thy semblance lives—it breathes—it Burns!

"Burns is by far the greatest poet that ever sprung from the bosom of the people, and lived and died in an humble condition. Indeed, no country in the world but Scotland could have produced such a man; and he will be for ever regarded as the glorious representative of the genius of his country. He was born a poet, if ever man was; and to his native genius alone is owing the perpetuity of his fame; for he manifestly had never very deeply studied poetry as an art, nor reasoned much about its principles, nor looked abroad with the wild ken of intellect for objects and subjects on which to pour out his inspiration. Imbued with vivid perceptions, warm feelings, and strong passions, he sent his own existence into that of all things, animate and inanimate, around him; and not an occurrence in hamlet, village, or town, affecting in any way the happiness of mankind, but roused as keen a feeling in the heart of Burns, and as genial a sympathy, as if it had immediately concerned himself and his own individual welfare."—

Another Nation-Poet*—Burns!

* Byron has styled Moore "the Poet of all Nations."

"The national poetry of Scotland, like her thistle, is the offspring of the soil. From whatever source our poetry has sprung, it wears the character, and bears the image of the north. The learned and the ignorant have felt alike its tenderness and humour, dignity and ardour; and both have united in claiming, as its brightest ornament, the poetry of him, of whose life and works I am now about to write. The genius, the manners, and the fortunes of Burns have been discussed fully by critics of all classes. * * * Those who desire to feel him in his strength, must taste him in his Scottish spirit. In the language in which his mother sung and nursed him, he excelled; a dialect reckoned barbarous by scholars, grew classic and elevated by the tongue of Burns."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

THE BURNS FESTIVAL.

THE ROOM IN WHICH BURNS WAS BORN.

VIEW OF Ayr.—THE BIRTH-PLACE OF BURNS.

THE FESTIVAL IN HONOUR OF THE MEMORY OF ROBERT BURNS; ON THE 6th AUGUST, AT AYR.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The announcement that a festival was to be held in the pretty and picturesque town of Ayr, in honour of the memory of Robert Burns, and as a solemn and impressive record of "welcome" to his sons, on their return to their native soil, drew together a crowd of people, not only from all parts of Great Britain, but from several continental countries. Among the visitors to "the birth-place of Burns," were strangers from far distant lands, and it was easy to distinguish those who were emphatically "strangers" from those who participate in the glories of the immortal poet.

Early on Monday, the 5th, the streets of Ayr, and the roads leading from the town to the scene of the appointed festival, were literally lined by visitors. The day was fine; the steam-boat, from Liverpool, of the day before, had brought "a troop of voyagers," who took the earliest trains from Glasgow; the carriages from Edinburgh kept continually pouring in, their augmentations; and private and public

Will your poor, narrow foot-path of a street,
Where two wheel-barrowa tremble when they meet—
Your ruin'd, formless bulk o' stane and lime,
Compare wi' bonnie Brigs o' modern time?

PROFESSOR WILSON, VICE-CHAIRMAN.

On the "Auld Brig,"
Concocted gowk! pu'd up wi' windy pride!—
This morn'g year I've stood the flood and tide;
And tho' wi' crazy cild I'm sair forlorn,
I'll be a Brig, when ye're a shapeless cairn!

Passing through the town, of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter, another triumphal arch was reached. It was placed near the public-house in which the poet used often to meet his friends; and was appropriately topped by a painted representation of Tam O'Shanter and the Souter, O'er a' the ill o' life victorious.

Along a road which leads through scenery of graceful and richly-cultivated beauty, the visitor passed towards the point of greatest attraction—the Birthplace of the Poet!—every house, and path and field, having some association with his memory.

ARCH ON THE OLD BRIG OF DOON.

Our present business is more with the facts than the poetry of the land of Burns. It is impossible, however, to pass it with a mere word of reference to a place that has been one of pilgrimage for more than half a century, and will so continue for generations yet unborn. The "auld clay biggin," in which the poet first drew breath, is still a cottage, thatched and formed of clay; but its existing uses are those of a wayside public-house, kept by the daughter of "auld John Goudie," who, for upwards of forty years, refreshed the passing traveller, and acted as the loquacious cicerone to adjacent wonders, the names of which have become imperishable as illustrations of the poet's early life. The small and low-roofed chamber in which he was born has undergone comparatively little change; the recess in which he was introduced into the world still occupies a corner of it; and it vehicles of all descriptions were arriving, with contributions to the assemblage throughout the day.

Among the earliest of the arrivals, were those of the poet's three sons: the eldest, Mr. Robert Burns; the second, Colonel Burns; and the third, Major Burns—the two latter having recently retired from long service in India, having been absent from Scotland for nearly a quarter of a century.

The visitor, on entering the town, by railway from Glasgow, arrived opposite the New Bridge of Ayr, having the "Auld Brig" to the left, distant from its rival about 100 yards. He was at once reminded of one of the most striking of all the compositions of the poet, written on the occasion of the building of the new bridge. Both the bridges were crossed by triumphal arches—the one being nearly similar to the other, except that "the new" was topped by the arms of the town. Upon each was an inscription taken from the poem, where the rivals for fame and glory are described "in dialogue," as urging claims to pre-eminent distinction. The appended cut exhibits the triumphal arch over the new bridge, the inscriptions being as follow—On the "New Brig,"

ARCH ON THE NEW BRIG OF DOON.

THE MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

Imperial August is by no means the harvest month of the field of letters; but as regards its fruitfulness in literature, it is rather the seed-month of the year. "Contributors," at this season, betake themselves to "fresh fields and pastures new," and leave "the Magazine" to be gotten out as best it can be; so that Editors too often leave their arrangements to be perfected by occasional resources to "the rejected."

The Magazines for the present month partake of this seasonable unproductiveness. THE NEW MONTHLY opens with "Le Buisson Ardent," an historical sketch, by a Monsieur, in which are some very feeble attempts to make the genre Mais matter for ridicule; whereas, we expect the size of the animal will best indicate the infinitesimal preparation of humour displayed in this article. "The Tower of the Caliph" is a paper of considerable graphic ability, describing a London Tower, erected by the author of "Vathek," and, at this moment, we believe, a sealed museum to the public. "Nick Croxstead, the Law Evader," by Peter Prigging, is commenced, and promises an abundance of that dry quiet humour in which the author excels. "The Robertson on their Travels," by Mrs. Trollope, is a well-timed continuation, and has a good reputation in the Table d'Hôte. "La Maison Maternelle." The next paper does not reveal the variety of the number, which, by the way, contains some agreeable reviews of books, and a somewhat stilted notice of "The Art Exhibition in Westminster Hall."

BLACKWOOD opens with a spirited paper on the recent "horrible tragedy" in Afghanistan, in which the causes and consequences of the war are fearlessly investigated. "Riched Tachpale," by the Ricking Club, is a sparkling paper of criticism, with a charming pervasion on the art. "A Love-chaos—no prose" is a well-sustained tale. It is followed by a paper of great research, detailing, historically, the canal which connected the Nile and the Red Sea in ancient times; the restoration of which is now agitated in connection with the Indian trade. "The Dwarf's Well" is a tradition of Upper Louisiana. "The Stolen Child" is a well-written American story; and a Review of Mr. Twiss's "Life of Lord Eldon," which closes the number, presents that clever faisan of extracts and review, which, to our thinking, is the perfection of our contemporary criticism. BLACKWOOD must, however, be considered a good number.

HOOB'S MAGAZINE numbers in its contribution roll Mr. R. Browning and Mr. James. The editor's novel of "Our Family" proceeds. "Caribbean Jack," whose "intellect" are shock up into a tangle, and whose head is too full of the Castilian to hold anything else, is a very dull person; as is "My Father," who "had in his nature as much of the milk of human kindness, and in disposition such a sweet butlerish principle, that serving his master the wrong way seemed merely to do it." This is worth a large batch of w.-d.-w. The second paper is a very graphic account of the Grand Festival at Basle, on the 30th of June last, already noticed in our journal. "The Unknown Singer" is a nice piece of mystification to Rhineland. Mr. James's contribution is "The Snow Map," a pretty w.-d.-w. letter. "The Polka, considered as a Revolutionary Movement," is a lively piece of banter; but the author has forgotten to name the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS as the "ring-leader" in England.

FRASER opens with a paper of first-rate classic interest—"The Lectures of Professor Keble, considered with a particular reference to some of the Latin Poets;" this is a very charming dissertation on rural poetry, more especially the works of Lucretius and Virgil. "Both copious of nature, yet differing in the most essential features; both delineating the same countenance, yet representing it with varied expression—one in light, one in shadow." Again: "Men retire to contemplate Nature with two different motives—one of intellectualizing her secrets, one of enjoying her beauties. This variety Keble discovers between Lucretius and Virgil." The paper terms with elegant criticism and picturesque illustrations here is a specimen.—"Of the landscapes of Virgil we might find reflections in the transparent skies, and motionless leaves, and sunny turf, and glittering waters of Glend; but if we desired the sombre gloom, the remote perspective, the vacillating branches of Lucretius, we should seek them in the solemn pines of Parnassus. These dark trees, stretching away into a green immensity of shade, saw the spectator with a mysterious twilight in which it seems that some tremendous catastrophe may be working out. We would mention Abraham journeying to sacrifice his son (in the National Gallery) as embodying the true spirit of a Lucretian landscape, existing only in the sacred terror and wonderfulness of the associations which it awakens."

This paper is succeeded by a delightful article on Madame de Sevigné, and the edition of her celebrated "Lettres," by Madame de Tencin, published last year. It is strange that, although there are, at least, thirty portraits of Madame de Sevigné, they are all bad, or false, with one solitary exception—that reduced and engraved by Edelinck, after a painting in pastel. The next paper, on "The Transfiguration," and "The Raising of Lazarus," abounds with artistic criticism; the following anecdote of one of these celebrated pictures is interesting.

"How, under the influence of its own depression, 'The Raising of Lazarus,' was undervalued when brought over to this country in the Orleans collection, can now be in some degree estimated. It was then rejected by the noble collectors, the Duke of Devonshire, the Marquis of Stafford, and Lord Carlisle, into whose hands the collection fell, and was by them sent, with the other refuse, to public sale. Mr. Angerstein, his possessor, for the sum of £3,500. That antique something like £10,000 was offered for it by Napoleon in pretty certain, and was again records in his volumes, that, in the sequel, Mr. Berkford, the possessor of Fonthill Abbey, offered £20,000 sterling for it, probably the largest sum that was ever proffered for a picture. Mr. Angerstein, however, insisted that it should be guineas, or five per cent. more; upon which the negotiation failed. That it is now, after the results of its public exhibition in the National Gallery, by the general opinion of artists and lovers of art, adjudged the honour and foremost place amongst the first-class pictures of Europe, there can be no doubt."

We have only space for the subjects of the remaining papers—"A Scene from the Wars of Napoleon," "A Legend of Florence," "The Luck of Barry Lyndon," "Incendiarism," and "The Life of Lord Chancellor Eldon," which book, by the way, has been a god-send for the day-dancers. Altogether, Fraser is a lively, attractive number, in which there is not an unbecoming column.

BENTLEY is a number of average merit. "The Scattergood" paper is, however, particularly noticeable for its life-like picture of the duties of a governess in a "gentle family," whose position is thus cleverly illustrated by the author.

"Society has the same links in its scale as the animal creation; and a awareness in such a family as the comestible's was evidently considered the connecting link between the family and the domestic; but, like animals, classes generally, either in zoology, social life, or politics, looked at shyly by both the species, with which they held any attributes in common."

There is a very rare picture of the vivacious Joe Joliffe's "looks," on board a Gravesend steamer, followed by a droll picture of a house literally turned topsy-turvy. Among the other contributions are a piece of continental romance—"Martin Gierke," by Dudley Coltelling; "A Tale of the Wars of Marlborough," a bundle of horrors by the good chaplain; a few pages of "Notes in Greece, Turkey, and on the Danube; and a very amusing paper—"Steam-boat Society," by Catherine Sinclair, a capital infusion of fact and fun, such as one rarely meets with—in print. Mr. Murray's Physiology treats somewhat martyrly "the Upper House," and Cockney Sportsmen and Cricketers.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

On Monday evening a smart burlesque upon the very dramatic tale of "Aladdin; or, the Wonderful Lamp," was produced at this theatre with what may be justly termed triumphant success. It was the second Hutepur in the field, a travesty of the story having lately been brought out at the Princess Theatre; but this circumstance appears to have whetted the performers of the Lyceum comedians; for, in no instance have they copied their predecessors, although both parties had the same incidents to dish up.

At the Lyceum, Mrs. Keely enacts Aladdin in the life; to her clever spouse is entrusted Aladdin, who opens the piece in a magisterial study, fitted up à la Diabler; but he has few opportunities for the display of his skill in the grotesque until the second act; in the first, however, his solemnity was very ludicrous. Kasim, his "dumb nigger," by Mr. Collier, is a very droll adjunct; Tongloak, the Cham, is wonderfully enacted by Mr. F. Matthews, who is sure to give effect to burlesque; Kasim and Aladdin is confided to Mr. Wilson, who is a very amusing "Young China;" and the Princess is very successful in the hands of Miss Woolgar. The ladies are Campine (of the lamp), and Al Widdie-mbe (of the ring), the latter being cleverly introduced in the scene of the cavern, or the double arch of the Thames Tunnel. The piece is literally crammed with jokes and pleasantries on the follies of the day, and these without a spice of ill nature: they were uniformly relished by the audience, from the twopenny colony to the private box; and so densely crowded a "house" we rarely remember to have seen at the Lyceum. A very palpable hit was made on the second performance on Tuesday evening, when the Cham introduced—

Then let us herald to the people
These gladsome words—"We've a new Prince to-day."

(Tremendous cheering.)

"Well travel in a second and a half
By means of our Great Western Telegraph."

(Renewed cheer, &c., and "God save the Queen.")

The music throughout is very pleasing; the most popular airs are cleverly parodied, and there is a grotesque Pas de Pantomime (Pas de Fascination) which makes the house ring with applause.

The piece has been got up at unparagoned expense. The scenery, properties, and costumes are magnificent. The processions of female warriors in richly-gilt armour, and guards superbly habited, are very effective; and at the close of the first act the number in which the warriors group around the Princess, &c., is truly picturesque and novel. In another scene, Al Widdie-mbe appears, driving twenty-four ladies in-hand in a car, and takes up Aladdin and Kasim, all which is as classical as it is novel, and was deservedly applauded to the echo. Nor is Aladdin's hastily-concealed shade of mere paint and canvas, but, as the children say, "a real flying palace," which sounds and descends with a success that the inventor of the Aerial Machine might well envy.

This burlesque, with its beautiful scenery, popular music, clever acting, and sparkling dialogue, will, doubtless, have a long run, which it really merits for the pains bestowed by all parties on its production.

HAYMARKET.

On Wednesday evening, the season at this theatre terminated. The performance was for the benefit of Mr. Webster, the indefatigable leaver, who, at the close of the "Taming of the Shrew," delivered the following farewell address:—
Ladies and Gentlemen,—In times, when it is supposed the drama is in the last stage of decline, it is with more than ordinary feelings of pride that I have to thank you for the patronage which enables me to close a most profitable season, extending to upwards of 100 nights, or having had occasion during the period to make the perambulation of one night's salary, even for a rehearsal; and I should confidently proceed, without the slightest interval, but for the necessary repairs and cleansing consequent upon the length of the season, unimpeded in the annals of legitimate theatre. The offer of a price of £500, with large contingent advantages, for a comedy illustrative of modern English manners, was made from an ostentatious display, but from a sincere wish to raise up the dormant energies of writers—for I will not believe that dramatic talent is dead amongst us—and to endeavour to bring new blood into the vein of wit and humour, which was wont to make these walls to ring again with merriment and laughter. From the tried hands of dramatic authorship during the last three years, I could not obtain the shadow of a comedy either for love or money. The result has not been commensurate with my hopes; but still, while surrounded with such liberal and constant support, I do not despair of yet producing something worthy of your recognition and the high character of the British. The records of the works of past dramatists have not with distinguished approbation; and the highly successful production of Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," announced and created by some degree, gratifyingly prove the public mind is still warmly alive to the writing and a well-constructed play. With feelings of the deepest gratitude, and on the part of my brother and sister actors, and the body of Spectable best, I most respectfully, ladies and gentlemen, bid you farewell.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—If great popularity, talent of the supremest order, and the finest opera ever produced, be means to collect an overflowing audience, the announcement of Madame Persiani's benefit for Thursday will rank with any of the season. The opera selected is Mozart's "Don Giovanni," which concentrates all the opera celebrities, whilst the Zerlina, the sweetest of village maidens, which Persiani has made her own, is not the least brilliant gem, in the splendid variety of its beauties. There is to be a lyrical selection, in which Morsani will introduce several of his most finished acts. The ballet, with Carlo and Fanny Kessler, Perrot and St. Leon, will form a principal portion of the night's entertainment,—the last night but one of the season.

Mr. Ellis Roberts, the Welsh Harp, who lately gave a concert in the Music Hall, Store-street, was a pupil of Richard Roberts, who, although upwards of seventy years old, is still an excellent performer on the triple-strung harp.

GRAPHIC GATHERINGS IN PLEASANT PLACES.—BRIGHTON.

Here we float in a trim-built barque, taking our survey of this sea-green city of palaces of the modern era—our imagination teeming with a thousand fancies, as objects, landward and seaward, strike our senses. And are not these made more victoriously acute by that southern atmosphere, which is as elastic as the breeze that bears us so buoyantly and gaily? Now do we imagine ourselves a remnant of the fifth century, an embodiment of that Bishop Brightelm, from whom this, our town, suppositionally derives its name. Now do we conceive our primitive old eyes dotting upon the view before them: gazing over the magnificent sea-wall, perhaps the greatest ever built by man's hands; on the light fantastic pier of steam; in linked heavily long drawn out; a sort of Aladdin-lamp creation thrown among the waters; upon three miles of partly-coloured pavilions, which stretch from Here to Kemp-town; upon terraces resplendent of green paint and muck plant; upon human beings walking as if racing with the Grim Tyrant; and upon vessels that indeed walk the waters like things of life, fire-ships of the fleets of peace and commerce. Thus do you look upon the town from the glorious sea, that spreads in beauty and in sheen before it—or on the fair water which beyond your gaze washes the shores of its bellis Normandis.

Turning your footsteps inland, you are on the famous Steyne, whither a waste defiled with vulgar implements of vulgar tools, and inodorous with "ancient fish-like smells," but now crowned with the noble bronze statue of George IV., a prince well fitted for rescuing it from unsavoury scenes and plebeian purposes—the cynosure of elegant fancies, and the finished gentleman from top to toe. On the left is the palace of his erection—the half Chinese half Oriental Pavilion. But why should this building be called the folly of an English monarch? The King of Saxony has his Japanese palace—the Emperors of Russia and Austria their palaces of all styles and no styles of architecture—and surely the Sovereign of Britain may have a Chinese roof over his or her head as well as a Chinese colony as part of their dominions. We have been frequently over this magnificent structure, and saw no cause for fault with its design or decoration. It was truly said of it, that if you took a pikeaxe, and cut a slice out of the wall of any of its chambers, you would have a gem of art for your pains. Of it may be said, in the words of Virgil—

India nitidum, molles sua thura Sabae.

—ibi serviet ultima Thule

Teges tibi generum Tethys emat anubus undae.

This marine palace consists of two complete and separate lines of chambers, stretching from south to north, reaching to the extent of three hundred feet. The first of these, and certainly not the least in our good love, is the kitchen—a place that would bring Apicius to life again; could he catch a glimpse of its appliances for the palate: there come the Chinese gallery, the principal Entrance-hall for our advances, are made by the southern entrance from Castle-square, the breakfast-room, the banqueting-room, the green drawing-room, the saloon, the yellow drawing-room, the music-room; and, passing into the lawn, you come to the stables, undoubtedly the most magnificent building of the sort in Europe. If the finger were only lodged, on the average, one tenth as well as the royal horses are at Brighton, the world would again have reached a golden age. Issuing from the stable gates, you arrive at the northern gate-house, erected in 1832: it is of the same style of architecture as the palace, and forms a most characteristic approach to the royal abode. Such is the Pavilion and its appendances—the glory at once and the grief of Brighton. Her Majesty, it is known, is not partial to it; and after every effort to render it the retreat of a British sovereign, it is fast falling, there can be no doubt, from its high estate. In the reign of Elizabeth, Brighton stood where the extremity of the chain-pier now affords the visitor the means of being at sea with a delectable stomach. Shall it be the reign of another Queen that it will go down as effectually as its predecessor?

The occasion which led to these remarks was that which led us to the scene of them—the annual meeting on the broad fair downs which crown that special place of bricks and mortar—Kemp-town. On these heights the races are held—most goodly pleasure-trysts, where people meet to be happy; and it will be news to us when they meet for a more human or a more graceful purpose. When George the Fourth was Prince, the Brighton races were matters of account, and many of the best horses in England ran for their place and stakes. It was a treat to hear—as we did on Wednesday—one of his old jockeys talking of the Prince of Wales's appearance in front of the old stand (which still lingers in its fall)—in a phaeton and six, the driving seat whereof placed the chaperone on a level with its roof. Other causes besides the loss of the royal countenance, acted disadvantageously towards them. The Duke of Richmond took umbrage at something arising from their management, and until within the last few years they enjoyed but scanty patronage of moment. A little energy now might restore them to their ancient position. If the Bury Club held the exhibitions there, instead of Stockbridge, both Brighton and the Bury Olympians would be the better of the change. A few spirited produce stakes might with decent effort and consent of the gentry of the town and neighbourhood be got up, and would any leading personage put a shoulder to the wheel, a far better subscription would follow as a matter of course. With these hints, which we would fain see acted upon, proceed, we to speak of a few of the incidents connected with the meeting of 1844.

Instead of three meagre days, it ought to have been condensed in two, of right ray favour. Wednesday, the first day, gave us four events; two of them, however, spun out into heats—"a weak invention." For the first his Grace of Richmond walked over. The second—the Brighton Stakes—and the profitable of the three days, Balchin, the Croydon trainer, won with Montague, a three year old handicapped at St. Young Leobhar, belonging to Mr. Stelly, won the 3 sows. Sweepstakes, worth some £7 sows, and is claimed for £120. Now as he cost £200, or thereabouts, this seems a bad speculation. For the Town Plate we had Little Virgin at the post—a horse that has appeared under as many owners as Robert Macaire—as a wind up probably to the career of his profession—the penultimate of which was the Bloodstone cast, ensued the day before at the Guildford Auction. Thursday came in with Rude Boreas for its chamberlain: indeed, it blew a hurricane during the whole week. Still the sunshine was bright, and the forenoon fresh and breezy—and with the first train down came a colony of cockneys all bent upon a holiday. For ourselves, lighting a real Lycop at one P.M., we took our way for the hills, and found them already occupied by a dense multitude—a little Derby gathering in short. Lord Chatterfield's Fairy won the rich two-year-old Stakes, worth £450; the Cup, as they call the Queen's hand, brought five to the post, Alice Hawthorn being backed at any odds that could be had, from 8 to 1 upwards. So off they went, and after running a mile, or thereabouts, Alice ran out, because Templeman, who rode, did not know the course, or for some other reason. The folks who won said it was all right; those who lost, vowed—we had nearly said swore—it was a robbery; we have no opinion, save that it might be as well if a jockey were in mind, that when running to the left all peals are to be passed on their right hand, and vice versa. But, surely, all jockeys know this. The session of the sport was good fun, but not very important. It was the best meeting ever known at Brighton.

ROYAL TRAMWAY YACHT CLUB.—On Monday evening the sailing committee assembled at the club-house, Corkport-street, to hear evidence respecting the alleged fouling of Lord Alfred Paget's Mystery yacht by the crew of Mr. A. Willmison's Phantom, in the match for Captain Cockedge's 100 guineas cup, on the 10th of July, when the committee came to the unanimous opinion, "That the rules of the club had been violated by the crew of the Phantom, who had thereby forfeited all claim to the prize, and that the Mystery was entitled thereto, and ought to have been declared the winner thereof."

GOVEAS REGATTA.—On Tuesday last, the first sailing match of the B. Y. Squadron for the season, took place agreeably to announcement by three class entries of 75 tons and under 105 tons, round the Isle of Wight, for a £500 cup, no time being set for tonnage. The B. Y. S. cutter, Corsair, owner, John Congreve, Esq., of 84 tons, signal red flag, and the B. Y. S. cutter, Ariadne, Capt. W. B. Pomroy, also of 84 tons, signal blue, white, red, horizontal, were the only vessels which were entered for the match, and being of equal tonnage, caused a great deal of excitement. Much support was anticipated owing to the strong westerly breeze which prevailed throughout, and being for each of them in working down the back of the Wight what is termed a regular nose. At an early hour both vessels took up their stations at moorings abreast the Castle. Everything being in readiness, at 11 o'clock the signal was given, and off they started, and proceeded to the eastward with a rattling breeze and flood tide. The Corsair passed the west buoy of the Starbridge, off Ryde, two minutes ahead of her antagonist. It was evident throughout that the Corsair would, if no unforeseen accident took place, carry off the prize. After passing Dunnet they had to contend against the wind and tide until they reached the Needles, when the wind became favourable, but the ebb tide which was then running became contrary. Shortly after six one of the yachts was seen from the hills rounding Scopus point, and in about 25 minutes the other was discerned. All anxiety was now at its height; the red flag was seen afterwards made out, and the Corsair from Egypt was discovered to be hauled down, while her antagonist, was slowways astern, half main-sail down. Eventually they arrived at the goal as follows—Corsair, 7h. 45m. 10s.; Ariadne, 8h. 17m. 10s.; the former winning by 35 minutes. There was a great concourse of fashionable assembled both at the starting and coming in of the vessels.

The second day's regatta is fixed for Tuesday next, when a cup of £250 is to be sailed for by schooners of 140 tons and above. The same course as the present one. On the following day a piece of plate of the same value will be contended for by vessels belonging to the Tynes Yacht Club.

THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE TRAMWAY.—The trial race amongst gentlemen amateurs, challengers for the silver sculls, took place on Tuesday, and was, notwithstanding the heavy rain, accompanied by several of the leading clubs. At about half-past five o'clock the four gentlemen who had entered, moved towards Westminster-bridge, accompanied by the Lesander, the Neptune, the Gipsy, the St. George, the Queen, and other club boats, with an eight-oared boat manned by watermen, in which Mr. Lewis took his seat as umpire. The boats came in thus—Mr. Bumpstead (Lesander Club), 1; Mr. Noble (Cambridge Subscription-room), 2; Mr. Rosayne, 3; Mr. Kennedy (Amateur Scullers Club), 4.

DAYBOAT REGATTA.—This contest, on Monday, for a boat and other prizes, given by the inhabitants, was very numerously attended. R. Delamare was the successful competitor.

WESTMINSTER-BRIDGE REGATTA.—The seventeenth annual regatta, for a purse of sovereigns, given by the ladies and gentlemen of St. Margaret's and St. John's, Westminster, to be rowed for by men plying on the Middlesex side of the bridge, took place on Monday. The race was with six pairs of sculls, in three heats, the distance being to start from the Duke of Bedford's to Vauxhall-bridge; back round a boat moored off Montague House, and return to the bridge. G. Campbell was the winner, by four lengths.

WHITEHALL REGATTA.—The Whitehall regatta came off on Tuesday, between six scullers, in three heats, distance as in former years; won by H. Piner, three watermen of that name rowing for the second heat. In the deciding heat Piner came in the winner by about four lengths; E. Kearns second, and T. Jones third.

GREENWICH REGATTA.—The Greenwich regatta, under the patronage of the Princess Sophia Matilda, also came off on Tuesday. The first man received a boat value of £25, the second £20, the third £15, the fourth £10, and the other two minor sums. The contest was with six pairs of sculls, and extended the whole river frontage of the town. John Wagon was the winner.

THE MOORS.—Our accounts from the north speak highly of the sportsman's prospects for the 12th. An unusual number of gentlemen from the south have gone into Scotland, to be ready for opening the campaign.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Accounts from Florence state, that Joseph Napoleon, ex-King of Naples and of Spain, more recently known as Count de Saravilla, died in that city on the 28th ult., in the 76th year of his age. He was attended at his death-bed by his only surviving teachers, Louis, ex-King of Holland, and Jerome, ex-King of Westphalia. Prince Louis, whose son is a prisoner at Ham, is now the head of the Napoleon family.

Count Nesselrode, one of the few remaining diplomats connected with the important events of 1813, 1814, and 1815, has arrived in England, it is said for the purpose of sea bathing at Brighton. The Count is accompanied by his son, Count Dmitry Nesselrode, First Secretary of Legation at Berlin.

The steam-ship Acadia, which left Liverpool last week for Boston, had on board a magnificent white satin gown and train, three yards long, recently worn by her Majesty the Queen, which is intended to be introduced into some public exhibition in America.

The Attorney General, Sir W. Follett, and family left London on Saturday last for Rotterdam, where he landed next day.

During the recent visit of the Emperor of Russia to this country, several of the Polish refugees in London and Paris petitioned his Majesty for permission to return to their native country. They received no reply to their petitions until the 31st ult., when 18 or 20 of the number now residing in London, received a notice to call at the office of the Russian Consulate. They attended accordingly, and were handed sealed letters from the Russian Ambassador, the purport of which was that they might return to Poland, but under certain conditions. The conditions are that they are first to proceed through Holland, and from thence direct to Kovens in Russia, there to undergo an examination for alleged state crimes, and unless any charge other than a mere participation in the insurrection is proved against them, they will at once be set at liberty. Many of the Poles, however, have not accepted the terms.

Several German journals give an account of an extraordinary phenomenon which took place a short time since in the lake near the convent of Lach. While the weather was perfectly serene, the waters of the lake rose in a few minutes, and overflowed the banks on all sides. They, after a short space again subsided, and retired to a point far lower than their original level, exposing several extensive abysses which had been hitherto unknown. A loud subterranean noise was at the same time heard; the trees on the banks were torn up by the roots, and large crevices formed in the banks. A vapourous vapour arose, and a great number of fish were observed to float dead on the surface of the water. Many birds were also suffocated by the odour. The whole occurred in a very short space of time.

On Saturday last, her Majesty's Ministers had their annual White-bait dinner, at the Crown and Sceptre Tavern, Greenwich.

The Journal des Chevaux de Fer states, on the authority of a letter from Payette, that Captain Broust, finding it necessary to build building materials from the mountainous parts of the Island of Tahiti, has constructed a railroad for that purpose.

By the new convention between the British and Belgian Post-offices, the postage of letters between England and Belgium is reduced to 1s. for the whole distance, of which sum Belgium will take 5s. and England 7d. This is a reduction of more than half of the present rate. The pre-payment will be optional.

The next meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, is to be held at York on the 25th of September, which is six weeks later than the time appointed for last year's meeting at Cork. York was the first city in which the association assembled, and the event of revisiting the scene of initiation is expected to be commemorated by a full attendance of men of science from all parts of the kingdom.

Some curious zoological and botanical specimens have arrived from Sierra Leone for the Earl of Derby. Among the animals are eight antelopes, four of which (one male and three females) are denominated water antelopes, a very rare and beautiful species, requiring great care in transporting them to a cold climate, as in most, if not all, previous attempts they have died on their passage. The birds include a large marabout, with many other valuable specimens; a fine falcon, a splendid brown eagle, a very rare bird named the sacred Ibis, a pair of beautiful Guinea hens, and several cases of blue doves, brown doves, and different species of the weaver, a bird so called from the peculiar mode of weaving its nest. The collection includes eight cases of rare plants, and several packages of stuffed birds and animals.

The increasing prosperity of the port of Liverpool may be judged of from the fact, that on Thursday week no less a sum than £50,000 was paid for duties at the Custom-house.

According to a late paper, the gin drunk in England and Wales annually amounts to nearly £20,000,000 sterling, a sum which would pay all the poor-rates three times over.

Sir George Hamilton, acting as the English Chargé d'Affaires during the absence of the Earl of Westmoreland, is negotiating with Baron Hulow a treaty, whereby the mutual piracy of literary works published in each kingdom will be prevented.

Accounts have been received at Lloyd's of the loss of the schooner Helen of Glasgow, on the bar at Tampico, and the Laurel fishing smack on the Conchee Rocks, Jersey. The men of the Helen were saved, but only six out of twenty on board the Laurel escaped.

The Polish Colonel Radziewski, one of the leaders of the insurrection of 1831, died on the 31st ult. at Mentz.

A letter from Genoa states that the King of Sardinia has given his approbation to the company formed for executing the railroad between Milan and that port.

An English medical man named Edmonds, was on Thursday arraigned before the Correctional Tribunal at Paris for practising his profession in France without sufficient license or authority. Mr. Edmonds pleaded ignorance of the law of France, but the president replied that he must have been made aware of it by a former prosecution against him. His counsel, however, defended him so well, and produced so many favourable certificates, that the Avocat du Roi recommended him to the consideration of the tribunal. He was, in consequence, subjected to a fine of only 35s.

On Tuesday morning at half-past eight o'clock, the train which started from London-bridge for Brighton consisted of no less than 45 carriages, containing 1600 persons, and was propelled by four engines. The majority of them were parties going to Brighton Races with the cheap excursion tickets.

In the case of the Marquis of Hertford and Suisse, the French Court have decided against the latter, who will consequently have to refund 900,000fr.

The railway from Altona to Kiel, the length of which will be about 33 leagues (121 miles English), and which, in traversing the Duchy of Holstein throughout its whole extent, would unite the Elbe and the Baltic, is already more than half completed. The part of the line comprised between Altona and Fochberg (73 miles in length) is just finished.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON.—FROM A PRIVATE PLATE.

requires no great stretch of fancy to picture the humble garniture of the bed, and the ordinary furniture of the chamber, as the very same which it contained on the 25th January, 1759—the ever-memorable day of his birth:

All ask the cottage of his birth,
Gaze on the scenes he loved and sung,
And gather feelings not of earth,
His fields and streams among.

Beside this cottage was placed another arch, formed of bay, yew, and laurel, interspersed with various flowers, and containing in the spandrels the initials R. B., between which were the words—

THE BIRTH-PLACE OF
ROBERT BURNS.

A little further on, towards "the Monument," is a singular stone, lying in a field attached to a small homestead—the stone commemorated in the poem of "Tam o' Shanter," as—the nickle stane

Whar drunken Charlie brak's neck-bane.

Within sight is another object illustrative of the far-famed story—a solitary tree, surmounting

the cairn
Whar hunter's fand the murder'd hairn.

About a quarter of a mile onwards is the ruin of "Alloway Kirk." "The auld haunted kirk," the scene of "Tam's" adventure, when "inspired by bold John Barleycorn," mounted upon his nag "Maggie," he saw—

Warlocks and witches in a dance,
While "Auld Nick"—

Screw'd the pipes and gart them skirl,
Till roof and rafters a' did cirl.

Alloway Kirk, with its little enclosed burying-ground, directly skirts the road. The four walls unroofed, remain around the enclosure in which Tam saw "The dead in their last dresses;" "the winnock bunker in the east," where sate "the enemy" in a conspicuous feature, being a small window, divided by a thick mullion; marks of other openings may be detected, more of them being closed up, through which the hero obtained glimpses of the unhallowed rites performed by "witches and warlocks" as preliminaries to the dance—during which

Tam tint his reason a together, uttering the memorable sentence, "Weel done cutty sark," in reference to "the souple jade and strang," who "lap and flang" so lustily, as to make even the devil "glow'r and fidge fu fain;" and which led to the chase which resulted in the escape of Tam over the bridle, the key-stone of which the witches "darena cross," minus the loss of the tail of his good steed Maggie, which she left in the hand of the carline, "cutty sark."

These objects, of course pointed out as "curiosities" of the place, served to arrest the attention of the visitor, until he approaches within sight of "the Monument"—a remarkably elegant structure, standing on a slight elevation, which overlooks the Doon, and the two bridges by which the river is crossed. These, with the several other matters of interest in the vicinity, we shall describe more fully next week; our present purpose being merely to supply such a key as may enable the reader to understand the arrangements of the Festival, and the various "processions" incident to it.

The two bridges—the old bridge and the new—by which the river Doon is crossed, were each crowned by a triumphal arch. The new was constructed simply of wreaths of laurel and bay, intermixed with flowers; the old was surmounted by carved and painted figures, exhibiting immortal "Tam" at the moment when he reaches the key-stone, leaving Maggie's tail "behind her."

In a field immediately behind the Monument, and almost adjoining it, was erected the temporary building to accommodate the visitors, admitted by tickets; while at the other extremity of the inclosure were three or four less dignified erections for the use of less privileged guests. The tickets were obtained in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other places, as well as in Ayr—the prices being for one to admit a lady, 10s., for that which admitted a gentleman, 15s. The interior presented a near approximation to a square; filled with lines of narrow tables, upon which plates were laid for 1600 persons; and by a very ingenuous contrivance it was made to slope gradually to the centre, so that no portion of the crowd might be deprived of a sight of the chairman and vice-chairman,* who, with their "suites," were located in two small galleries to the east and west, while similar galleries to the north and south were appropriated to the musicians. We annex a plan of this Pavilion (see page 94) in illustration of its arrangements.

Thus far the preliminary arrangements were conducted with considerable tact and remarkably good taste; and such were the preparations for "a festival" to commemorate the great poet of the world, more than fifty years after his death, in the place where the lowly born man of genius drew his first birth, amid the scenery he most loved to paint, the banks and bosom o' bonny Doon;" and in the presence of the children of his old companions of the plough, his own honoured and respected sons, and the few other of his relatives yet remaining, who are now, happily, dwelling in peace and comfort within sight of the

* This was effected by laying the floor level for 30 feet in the centre, whence it gradually rose to the height of four feet to the sides; and, the side tables being single, the company there all front the centre of the Pavilion.

ARCH ON THE NEW BRIG OF AYR.

VIEW OF THE GRAND PROCESSION.

"Monument" erected by "a people" to record their gratitude for enjoyments long continued and past all telling—

For Burns—though brief the race he ran,
Though rough and dark the path he trod,
Lived—died—in form and soul a man,
The image of his God!

Through care, and pain, and want, and woe,
With wounds that only death could heal,
Tortures—the poor alone can know,
The proud alone can feel;

He kept his honesty and truth,
His independent tongue and pen,
And moved, in manhood and in youth,
Pride of his fellow-men.

Strong sense, deep feeling, passions strong,
A hate of tyrant and of knave,
A love of right, a scorn of wrong,
Of coward, and of slave;

A kind, true heart, a spirit high,
That could not fear, and would not bow,
Were written in his manly eye,
And on his manly brow.

The idea, now so fortunately and so prosperously carried out, originated in consequence of a visit paid, several months ago, by Col. William Michael Burns, soon after his return from India, to his aunt, Mrs. Begg, the youngest sister of the poet; who now, with her two daughters, inhabit a neat and comfortable cottage within a stone's throw of the poet's birth-place. It was suggested that the appearance of the son among the scenes consecrated to the memory of his father ought not to be passed over as an ordinary occurrence, but that some attempt should be made to welcome him in a worthier manner than by the common greetings of admiring or loving friends. Various circumstances contributed to postpone the accomplishment of so desirable a purpose; and, at length, it was resolved to issue an invitation, which should include not only the Colonel's elder brother, Robert Burns, and his younger brother, Major James Glencairn Burns, but all, from all quarters of the world, to whom the name of the poet was dear, and who desired an opportunity to render homage to his memory. The 6th of August was appointed for the festival; nothing occurred to interrupt the plan of procedure; and, accordingly (all arrangements being, as we have shown, completed) on the sixth of August THE FESTIVAL took place.

The morning of Tuesday was gloomy, and, although it partially cleared up during the day, so as to give several hours free from rain, the weather was on the whole inauspicious; and towards the evening it became so wet as very materially to interfere with the pleasure of the day.

As early as eight o'clock, the several "trades" paraded the streets, preceded by musicians playing the national airs—chiefly those which have been rendered familiar to the world by the words of Burns. The following was the near to Maybole.

Caledonian Union (Old Fellows, Dunlop.

(Departations of the Magistracy joined in the procession from Dunbarton, Dunlop, Maybole, and Irvine.)

During the formation of the procession, the pipers played round the field, greatly enhancing the scene by their music. When fully marshalled, the immense body moved onwards—the bands striking up the well-known air of "A man's a' man for a' that"—along the south side of Wellington-square. The procession was formed three deep, and would extend to nearly a mile in length. It had a very imposing effect. On going down Sandgate, up the High-street, and on to the Maybole-road, every window was thronged with on-lookers, and the streets were densely crowded. As they proceeded, the bands played the national airs of "Green grow the rushes," "This is no man's house," "My love she's but a lassie yet," "Wae ye wha's in yon town," &c.

PROGRESS OF THE PROCESSION.

After leaving the Townhead, the procession moved on at a quicker pace. The road all along was greatly crowded; so much so, that it was with difficulty the mass could keep moving. The walls, houses, and gates, were everywhere lined with anxious observers; and various platforms were constructed for the accommediation of ladies. On approaching the cottage where the poet was born, and where, as already mentioned, a splendid triumphal arch was erected, the hands struck up "There was a lad was born in Kyle;" and the procession uncovering, lowered their flags as they passed the humble but much-enclosed spot. Meeting forward, the pressure of the multitude became immense, owing to the narrowness of the road between Greenfield Avenue and the Monument. The greater number of the vast roll of carriages, the route for which was by the Race-course Road, up Greenfield Avenue, had luckily passed prior to the approach of the procession, otherwise the obstruction would have been much greater. The road from Ayr commands an excellent view of the lay, the hills of Arran, and the Heads of Ayr, but here the scene became doubly interesting. Kirk Alloway, the Monument, the Pavilion, with its waving Union Jack, and the extensive field set apart for the festivities, spread out in beautiful table land, burst on the sight—while "Garrick's Brown Hill," or rather hills, studded by shady woods and fields of grain rising almost to the summit, bounded the scene on the south, the moat of Alloway and Doonholm woods on the east, and those of Mountcharles on the west. Multitudes were in the field, and every eminence commanding a view of the procession was occupied. Even on Newark hill parties were placed, preferring a distant prospect to the annoyance of being crushed amidst the crowd. A platform was erected on the opposite side of the Doon, where an excellent view of the procession was obtained. As the long extended line approached Kirk Alloway, the old bell, which still occupies the belfry, was set a ringing, and continued as while the procession passed on under the triumphal arch along the New Bridge. Deploying round towards the Old Bridge, the curling line, partially obscured by the houses and trees, had a truly picturesque effect. The waving banners, the music of the bands mellowed and echoed by the "Banks and braes o' bonnie Doon," imparted an inexpressible agreeable sensation. On reaching the triumphal arch of the "Auld Brig," venerable and grey with age, the hands struck up the air of "Welcome Royal Charlie," while the procession, uncovering and lowering their flags, passed over on the rustic bridges in front of the platform, whereon the sons of Burns were elevated. On the platform, beside the Earl of Eglinton and Professor Wilson, we observed H. G. Bell, Col. Campbell, Sir D. N. Blair, H. Oulow, R. Chambers, Mrs. General Hughes, W. A. Cunningham, A. Boyle, Lord Justice General, Alexander Haile, M.P., A. Buchanan, J. O. Fairlie, and a number of ladies. The sons of Burns seemed to feel deeply the compliment paid to them, and acknowledged it most cordially. The immense crowd which surrounded the platform seemed highly gratified by the opportunity afforded them of feasting their eyes upon the lineaments of the sons, as they sought to trace those of the father. The procession occupied at least an hour in passing from the New Bridge into the field, on entering which the bands played "Duncan Gray," followed by "The Bells of Aberfeldy." A large circle was then formed round the platform for the musicians in the field, and the whole company, led by professional vocalists, joined in singing "Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon," and "Auld Langsyne." The bands were afterwards stationed in various quarters throughout the field—the Regimental and Glasgow St. Andrew's bands in the centre of the field, and the Kilwinning and Cumnock bands at the cottage—the bagpipers playing at a distance from the pavilion. There were two enclosures for dancing—one towards the head of the field, and the other at the brow, overlooking the water of Doon. Immediately after the procession was over, the crowd were astonished by the sudden appearance of Tam o' Shanter, "weel mounted on his gray mare Meg," and a flight of witches in full pursuit of him. Tam approached from the plantation near the cottage, and jogging along the road, put spurs to his "noble Maggie" opposite the "old haunted kirk," when out the "bellich legion sallied." Maggie, of course, reached the keystone of the bridge in safety, but there left behind her "a gray tail." The enactment of this characteristic interlude created much amusement. The company began to enter the pavilion almost immediately after the close of the procession, when the chair was taken. The pavilion, when all were seated, had a splendid appearance—more like a banquet in fairyland than a thing of real life. The Chairman and Croupier's seats were of oak, made of the rafters of Alloway Kirk; and several splendid silver vases decorated their tables.

The Chairman, the Right Hon. the Earl of Eglinton, was supported on the right by Robert Burns, Esq., late of the Stamp and Taxes, Somerset House, London, eldest son of the poet; Major Burns, youngest son of the poet; Miss Begg, niece of the poet; Henry Glasgow Bell, Esq., Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire; Rev. Mr. Cuthill, Ayr; Mr. Robert Burns Begg, teacher, Kinross, nephew of the poet; Miss Begg, the younger niece of the poet; Mr. and Mrs. Thomson, of Dumfries (the Jessie Lewis of the bard); on the left by Col. Burns, second son of the poet; Mrs. Begg, sister of the poet; Sir John M'Neil, Bart., late Plenipotentiary to the Court of Russia; the Right Hon. Lord Justice General; the Countess of Eglinton; Sir R. D. Blair, Bart., of Blairquhan. The Cr. officer, Professor Wilson, of Edinburgh, was supported on the right by Archibald Alison, Esq., Sheriff of Lanarkshire, and author of the "History of Europe;" Colonel Sturge, of Caldwell, author of "Travels in Greece;" Wm. Aytoun, Esq., Advocate; A. Haslie, Esq., M.P. for Paisley; James Oswald, Esq., M.P. for Glasgow; on the left by Sir James Campbell, Glasgow; Forster, Miller, Ayr; James Ballantine, Esq., of Castlehill; James Campbell, Esq., of Craig.

The Rev. Mr. Cuthill, of Ayr, asked the blessing, in language brief, impressive, and appropriate. The reverend gentleman also returned thanks.

Lord Eglinton said—There is too much which never can be omitted, more especially at such an assembly as this, consisting of loyal Scotchmen; and it is a toast which I am sure will be received here as it is elsewhere, with respect and joy. "The health of the Queen." (Cheers.)

Glasgow Quadrille Band—"Queen's Anthem."

The Chairman then rose and said—"We will drink 'Prince Albert and the rest of the Royal Family.'" (Applause.)

Glasgow Quadrille Band—"The Coburg March."

The Chairman then rose amidst the most enthusiastic applause. He said—Ladies and gentlemen, the subject of the toast which I am now going to bring before you, is one of such paramount importance on this occasion, and is so deeply interesting, not only to those whom I have now the honour to address, but to all whom genius is dear, that I could have wished it committed to more worthy hands; more particularly when I see, the numerous assemblage collected here—the distinguished persons which grace our board to-day. (Cheers.) It is only because I conceive that my official position renders me the most formal and fitting, though most inefficient, mouth-piece of the inhabitants of this county—(Hear, hear, and cheers)—that I have ventured to introduce myself before you on this occasion, and to undertake the onerous, though gratifying, duty of proposing in such an assemblage the thrilling toast—"The Memory of Burns." (Great applause.) This is not a meeting for the purpose of recreation and amusement; it is not a banquet at which a certain number of toasts printed on paper are to be proposed and responded to, which to-day marks our preparations; it is the enthusiastic desire of a whole people to pay honour to their countryman; it is the spontaneous offering of a nation's feelings towards the illustrious dead, and added to this the desire to extend a hand of welcome and friendship to those whom he has left behind. (Tremendous applause.) Here, on the very spot where he first drew breath, on the very ground which his genius has hallowed, beside the Old Kirk of Alloway, which his verse has immortalised, beneath the monument which an admiring and repentant people have raised to him—(great applause)—we meet, after the lapse of years, to pay our homage to the man of genius. (Loud cheers.) The master-mind who has sung the "Isle of Palms"—who has revelled in the immortal "Noctes"—who has already done that justice to the memory of the bard, which a better poet can alone do. Christopher himself is here—(great applause)—anxious to pay his tribute of admiration to a kindred spirit. The historian who has depicted the most eventful period of the French empire, the glorious triumphs of Wellington, is here—(cheers)—Clio, as it were, offering up a garland to Erin. (Loud cheers.) The distinguished head of the Scottish Bard is here—(cheers)—in short, every town and every district; every class, and every age, has come forward to pay homage to their poet. The honest lads whom he so praised, and whose greatest boast is to belong to the Land of Burns, are here. (Cheers.) The honey lasses whom he so praised, those whom he loved and sung, are here; they have followed hither to justify, by their loveliness, the Poet's worth (great applause); while the descendant of those who dwelt in the "Castle of Montgomerie," feels himself only too highly honoured in being permitted to propose the memory of him who then wandered there unknown on the banks of Fallow. (Loud cheering.) How little could the pious old man who dwelt in yonder cottage—with his "lyart haffets" o'er spreading his venerable brow—when he read the "big ha' bible" could have guessed that the infant prattling on his knee was to be the pride of his nation—the chief among the poetic band—was to be one of the brightest planets that glows around the mighty sun of the Bard of Ayr—(in knowledge and originality)—second to none in the fervent expression of deep feeling, in the genuine perception of the beauties of nature; and equal to any who revel in the fairy land of poetry. (Cheers.) Well may we rejoice that Burns is our own—that no other spot can claim to be the birth-place of our Homer except the spot on which we stand. (Cheers.) Oh! that he could have foreseen the intimacy of fame created for him this day, when the poet and the historian, the peer and the peasant, vie with each other in paying the tribute of their admiration to the humble but mighty genius of him whom we hail as the first of Scottish Poets. (Cheers.) Such a foresight might have alleviated the dreary hours of his sojourn at Mossgiel—might have lightened the dark days of his pilgrimage on earth. (Cheers.) Well does he deserve our homage who has portrayed the "Cottar's Saturday Night"—not in strains of inconsiderate mirth, but in solemnity and truth—who breathed the patriotic words that tell of the glories of our Wallace; immortalising alike the poet and the hero; he who could draw inspiration from the humble daisy, breathe forth the heroic words of "The Song of Death"—strains, the incarnation of poetry and love, and yet of the bitterest shafts of satire and ridicule—obeying but the hand of nature, despising all the rules of art, yet tramping over the very rules he set at naught. (Loud cheers.) At his name every Scottish heart beats high. He has become a household word alike in the palace and the cottage. Of whom should we be proud—to whom should we pay homage, if not to our own immortal Burns. (Cheers.) But I feel I am detaining you too long in the presence of a Wilson and an Allison. (Cries of "no, no," and applause.) In such a presence as these, I feel that I am not a fit person to dilate upon the genius of Burns. I am but an admirer like yourselves. There are others present, who are brother poets, kindred geniuses—men who, like Burns, have created a glorious immortality to themselves—to them will I commit the agreeable task of more fully displaying before you, decked out with their eloquence, the excellence of the poet and the genius of the man, and to extend and welcome his sons to the land of their father—(cheers)—and I will now ask you, in their presence, on the ground his genius has rendered sacred—on the "banks and braes o' bonnie Doon"—to join with me in drinking one overflowing bumper, and in joining to it every expression of enthusiasm which you can, to "The Memory of Burns." The toast was received with the most rapturous and enthusiastic bursts of applause.

Mr. Templeton sang with admirable effect, "Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon," which elicited the warmest plaudits of the meeting.

Mr. Robert Burns, on rising to return thanks, was with his brothers, received with enthusiastic cheering. He said—My lord, ladies and gentlemen, of course it cannot be expected, as a meeting such as the present, that the sons of Burns should expatiate on the merits and genius of their deceased father. Around them were an immense number of admirers, who, by their presence there this day, bore a sufficient testimony of the opinion in which they held his memory and the high esteem in which they held his genius. In the language of the late Sir Christopher Wren, though very differently applied, the sons of Burns could say, that to obtain a living testimony to their father's genius, they had only to look around them. (Cheers.) He begged, in name of his sister, brothers, and himself, to return their heartfelt and grateful thanks for the honour that had been done to their father's memory. (Cheers.)

Professor Wilson, who was received with enthusiastic cheering, spoke as follows—When this festival to commemorate the genius of Burns, and it were asked what need of such commemorations since his fame is co-extensive with the borders of our land, and inherent in every soul? I must answer that, though admiration of the poet be indeed wide as the world, yet we, as compatriots to whom it is most especially dear, rejoice to see that universal sentiment concentrated in the voice of a great assemblage of his own people (cheers)—that we rejoice to meet in thousands to honour him who has delighted each single one of us all at his own death. (Cheers.) But this commemorative expression, too, if not a profounder, yet a more tender sentiment; for it is to welcome his sons to the land which their father illustrated—it is to indulge our national pride in a great name, while, at the same time, we gratefully in full hearts the most pious of affections. (Cheers.) It was customary, you know, in former times, to crown great poets. No such honour crowned our bard; yet he, too, tasted of human applause—he enjoyed its delights, and he saw the dial that attend it. Which, think you, would he himself have preferred? Such a celebration as this in his life-time, or fifty years after his death? I cannot doubt that he would have preferred the posthumous, because the finer pleasure. (Cheers.) The honour and its object are thus seen in their just proportions; for death gives an elevation which the candid soul of the poet would himself have considered, and that honour he would have reserved rather for his merits than encountered it with his living infirmities. (Cheers.)—and yet, could he have foreseen the day when they for whom his soul was often sorely troubled, should, after many years of separation, return to the hut where himself was born, and near it, within the shadow of his own monument, be welcomed for his sake by the lords and ladies of the land; and dearest still, far dearer to his manly breast, by the children and the children's children of people of his own degree, whose hearts he sought to thrill by the voice of his own inspirations, then surely would such a vision, have been sweeter to his soul even than that immortal one in which the genius of the land bowed before his forehead—the blue-leaved crown that shall flourish for ever. (Cheers.) Of his three sons now sitting here, one only, I believe, can remember his father's face—can remember those large, lustrous eyes of his, so full of meaning—so full of melting in melancholy, or kindling in mirth, but never turned on his children, nor the mother of his children, but with such expression of tenderness, or most intense affection. (Cheers.)

We are compelled to postpone, until next week, the report of the remainder of the Professor's speech; and it is only just to state, that for what we have given, as well as that of the noble Chairman, we are indebted to the proprietors of the Ayr Observer, by whose extraordinary exertions the Scottish public were supplied with a very full report of the meeting early on Wednesday morning.

The Professor spoke for nearly an hour, and his speech was received throughout with exceeding enthusiasm.

Sir John McNeill then proposed the health of William Wordsworth and the Poets of England.

H. Glasgow Bell, Esq. next proposed, in a very eloquent speech, the health of Thomas Moore and the poets of Ireland. He alluded to Mr. Sheridan Knowles, as the chief dramatic writer of the age, and paid a touching and impressive compliment to Mrs. B. C. Hall, whose writings had so greatly benefited the country, and so largely contributed to the enjoyment and improvement of all classes, not only in Ireland but in Scotland and in England; and he felt the greater pleasure in this reference to one of the most popular of authors, inasmuch as she was present to witness the enthusiasm which Scottish men and women could feel, not alone for the sons and daughters of Scottish soil, but for those whose genius was the birth of other lands.

The toast was received with enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Sheriff Alison proposed the memory of Scott, Campbell, and Byron, and eloquently dwelt upon the influence they had exercised upon the spirit of the age.

W. Aytoun, Esq. (Advocate), proposed the memory of the Ettrick Shepherd, and Allan Cunningham, to which he spoke at some length.

Col. Muir followed, with the toast of "The Peasantry of Scotland;" after which, Sir James Campbell gave "the Land of Burns;" the health of the noble Chairman was then drunk, and the meeting separated.

As we have intimated, we reserve our comments on the meeting for next week, when we shall be called upon to review the proceedings of the day, accompanying our remarks by such illustrative engravings as may seem to convey to the reader a more vivid idea of this interesting and attractive scene, the circumstances which called so large an assemblage together, and the "ceremonials" incident to "a festival," which can never be forgotten by the thousands who witnessed it.

GRAND ARCHERY MEETING AT YORK.

hit at 100 yards was four guineas, that at 80 yards three guineas, and that at 60 yards two guineas.

On Thursday morning the weather was cloudy and threatening, but the archers resolved upon an attack on the targets. The day was ushered in by joyous peals from the new Minster bells, and from the belfries of several of the churches; whilst the British flag waved proudly from many an eminence in the city. The ground was staked out in the centre of the plain, immediately in front of the Grand Stand, and was kept by a strong detachment of the York police. In different parts of the field, the tents of the several societies were pitched; and in the centre was that of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, where luncheon was provided for the archers and their friends. There was a tolerable show of carriages, and the attendance of persons on foot was very numerous. In the early part of the day, the Grand Stand presented a gay appearance. Amongst the company present were Lord and Lady Feversham, Lord Churchill, the Marchioness of Queensbury, Miss Milner, Col. Smith, Mrs. G. Milner (of Hull), Mrs. de Horner, Mrs. Dryden, Captain Dixon, Dr. Belcombe, &c. The band of the 6th Carabiniers, and Walker's brass band, were stationed in front of the Grand Stand, and tended much to give effect to the proceedings.

The number of targets was 30, placed in two lines of 15 each. Five bowmen were appointed to each target, making 75 archers engaged in the shooting; a marker being provided for every five bowmen. The archers appeared in the uniforms of their respective societies, and presented a very splendid appearance.

The shooting commenced at about eleven o'clock, but the rain for a short time put a stop to the sport. The shooting was, however, continued with great vigour until between 3 and 4 o'clock, when a heavy rain came on. The gentlemen then retired to their tent to luncheon; and, owing to the continued rain, the sport was adjourned till next day. The archers shot at a distance of 100 yards from the target, each of them having to deliver 12 dozen arrows. When the rain put a stop to the shooting, Mr. Peckett, of target A, was so far victor in point of numbers; and Mr. Gibson, of target J, was the master of the most central hit, having come within an inch of the eye.

In the evening, about 70 of the party sat down to a splendid dinner, served by Mr. Braithwaite, of the Black Swan, in the Guildhall, which had been granted to the archers by the City Council. The chair was taken by Dr. Belcombe, and the evening was passed in high festivity.

On Friday the shooting was resumed, and, the weather being fine, great numbers of the citizens of York were on Knave-

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT MANCHESTER.

We regret to have to record the almost total destruction by fire, on Monday night, of the fine pile called the "Irwell Buildings," erected only five or six years ago, by Messrs. Robert Charlton and Sons, calenderers, &c., in Blackfriars, Manchester.

It appears that of the premises in question Messrs. Charlton occupied the lowest story of the building, and several rooms in different parts of the premises, and their fire-proof engine-house was at the extreme angle of the pile. The next portion of the premises in Blackfriars-street, was occupied by six firms, viz., Garner and Co., Henry Jaquet, Henry Fisher and Co., M. Radik, Richard Reddon and T. Halstead, export merchants, and Mr. Mendel, also a foreign merchant, had the rooms fronting into Water-street.

The fire was discovered at about a quarter past ten o'clock by two police constables; but other accounts state that a strong smell of fire, as if of burning wood, had been noticed by persons passing the building as early as nine o'clock. At the instant the alarm was given on the spot, flames burst out from different parts of the roof, almost like the lighting up of a vast gas candelabra.

The constables at once proceeded to the police-yard, and alarmed Mr. Rose, the superintendent of the fire-brigade, who went to the spot with the Niagara engine, and was followed by six other engines, and a large body of firemen. Upon their arrival at the place, which was in less than a quarter of an hour after the alarm was given, Messrs. Rose found that the fire had already reached the fourth story, and was spreading rapidly in all directions. Messrs. Charlton immediately set to work to save such of the goods upon their premises as could be easily removed; but little progress could be made on account of the intense heat. The firemen got into the building occupied by the six foreign houses; but, after a short time were compelled by the flames to retreat. In less than 20 minutes the whole of the building, which is 15 windows long by 5 deep, and six stories high, was one mass of flame, with the exception of the engine-house. The night was somewhat stormy; occasionally heavy showers fell, but without producing the slightest effect on the fire; and the wind, which was high and gusty, carried the flames across the Parsonage to the Blackfriars Inn, which for some time was in imminent danger. However, owing to the exertions made, the various branches directed upon it, and the judicious application of wet blankets to the windows, it was preserved from further damage than the charring of the window frames, the breaking of the glass, and other trifling injury. The alarm of the inmates was great, and portions of the furniture, &c., were removed.

About five minutes after eleven o'clock, the fire was at its greatest height, and at this time the heat was so intense, that it became necessary to remove several of the engines, as the men could not work at the pumps. The height and extent of the building on fire, throughout its entire space, caused the flames to be visible at a considerable distance in various directions.

The strong breeze fanned the flames, which raged with great fury, till the roof fell in, and the principal beams, &c. had been consumed, and the floors burned or carried down, and then, about half-past eleven o'clock, the flames began to subside, and the danger of their extension to the neighbouring buildings ceased to exist. By midnight, with the exception of a small part near Parsonage-lane, which was fire-proof, the whole building was reduced to a mere shell.

About half-past three o'clock in the morning, a part of the wall of the upper stories next the Parsonage fell in with a tremendous crash; but no one was hurt. Both the fire brigade and the police, however, had great difficulty in restraining some of the workmen in the employ of Messrs. Charlton from venturing into the smoking ruins in the most rash and reckless manner. In one instance, this led to the loss of life, and a second man lies in a dangerous state in the Royal Infirmary. Both having rushed into the calender-house—the first, a joiner, was killed by the falling of a cut-head and a portion of the wall in which it was embedded; the poor old man was found crushed quite flat by the immense weight. The second man, a packer, was found lying on his back, insensible, and bleeding from some wounds he had received on the head and face from falling materials. The concourse of people which had assembled at eleven o'clock was immense. A strong body of the police, under the personal command of Captain Willis and the superintendents, was on the spot, and by their exertions probably saved some lives from being lost. The pressure was tremendous, and the continual streams of molten lead which fell from the building on all sides, rendered the situation of the firemen one of extreme danger.

The cause of this fire is unknown, but it probably originated in the third story, or that it commenced in the interior, and had gained considerable hold on the wood-lined walls of the building in various rooms, before it approached the front, so as to be seen from the street. The loss, estimated at £25,000, it is hoped will be covered, or nearly so, by the amounts insured. Messrs. Charlton and sons are insured to the extent of £20,000; Mr. S. Mendel's stock is insured to the extent of £2500; Mr. Henry Fisher's to the amount of £1000; and Mr. Henry Jaquet's to £500.

NEW CHURCH AT KENSALL-GREEN.

On Thursday morning, this new church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of London, with the accustomed ceremonies. The church is built in the Anglo-Norman style, of black brick, relieved with flint; the western front has two square towers, with high pitched roofs, with a pinnacle at each angle, surmounted with a cross, as is also the main roof. Each tower has three stories, the upper most of which has belfry windows. These towers flank the centre also of three stories; the lowest is occupied by a gabled porch, with a deeply recessed doorway, the columns of which are of stone, but most of the mouldings of the arches are worked in bricks; and the gabled portion is latticed with bricks, filled in with flints. The second story is an arcade of five arches; the central one being larger than the rest, and serving as a window, whilst the remaining four are fluted; in the centre of the third story is a small circular window, and above is a gable, surmounted by a cross. The main body of the church has side buttresses, and the east end is lit by a circular window, and terminates in a gable, surmounted with a cross.

The interior is almost devoid of ornament: it has an open timber roof of arches springing from the main beams, and bold supporting corbels; it is not divided into a nave and aisles; with pews at the sides only, the remainder of the floor being filled up with free seats; at the western end is a small gallery; the pulpit is placed on one side of the chancel, or east end; and the reading desk opposite. The decolonne will occupy the arcade beneath the circular window. The windows throughout the church, have a narrow strip of faintly damasked glass running up the centres, flanked by a narrow fillet of stained glass; the doors are stained brown, as is also the timber-work of the roof.

At the north-eastern angle of the church is a small vestry; and on the southern side of the south-western tower is a doorway, with neat decorations; and beneath the several windows runs a zig-zag line in flints.

The effect of the entire composition is pleasing; and the church being placed on high ground, forms a striking feature in the prospect from the western suburbs.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 120.—Vol. V.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1844.

[SIXPENCE.]

FRANCE, TAHITI, MOROCCO.

WAR is so tremendous an evil, that all thinking men may well be anxious and alarmed when there is even the slightest probability of it, and there is no question they equally rejoice when that probability is lessened or removed.

The relations between England and France have lately been in a feverish and uneasy state. The large "war party" in France, though made up of many discordant elements, is so influential in directing public opinion, that the Government, which we believe to be really peacefully inclined, cannot disregard it altogether. It is irrational—for it loves war for its own sake, and, provided it could gratify its thirst for blood, and the glory to be attained by shedding it, is perfectly indifferent as to the country or people with whom it is to fight; perhaps, from old grudges, unnecessary to dilate upon, it would give England the preference as an enemy; but Christian or Moslem—Turk, Arab, or Moor, provided there was occupation for the uneasy spirits of the army—skirmishes and razzias, to furnish materials for despatches from head-quarters, and leaders for the Paris papers—the war party would be but too happy to find or make a pretext for hostilities. "Young France," in addition to being "bearded like the pard," fully merits the rest of the description given of the soldier, "jealous of honour, sudden and quick in quarrel." To be careful of honour is a merit either in a nation or an individual, but to be perpetually snarling and quarrelling, for any or for every cause, and frequently for no cause at all, is not worthy of a great people. If there is any nation of the earth whose title to military renown is firmly established, it is France. Alone she conquered the whole of Europe, and alone she long and ably defied the whole of the powers of the Continent united; and even in the unequal struggle she did not succumb save from the sheer exhaustion produced by the policy of the man who dazzled the people into becoming the willing sacrifices to the idol of his own selfish ambition. The military history of France is a grand one—fertile almost beyond example in great men and great achievements. We speak only in a military sense, and divide the deeds and the men who did them from all considerations of the righteousness of the cause in which, in different ages, they may have been performed. If we speak of Turenne as a great soldier, we do not palliate or defend the justice of the ravages he was ordered to make—and did make—in the Palatinate. When we allude to the victories of Napoleon, we say nothing of the policy that prompted them. But great military achievements they certainly were; and the people by whom they were done, need scarcely be anxious to prove to the world—what the world knows so well already—that they possess military talent of the highest order. With such a history to look back upon, we often wonder it does not teach the French some of that magnanimity which can afford to pass unnoticed the "petty quarrels upon petty things," that seem occasionally to drive them into a kind of frenzy. Their sensitiveness on every occurrence that can by any means, fair or foul, be made a cause of national differences, lest they should be thought other than brave and warlike, is absolutely morbid; and it exposes them to much misapprehension, not stopping short of ridicule. The victors of Marengo and Jena, who dictated terms to the sovereigns of the continent in their own capitals, converting into a matter of importance the "ordonnances" directing at what hour the subjects of Queen Pomare's "cocoa-nut empire" were to blow out their candles, and thereupon setting all their diplomacy, and bureaucracy, and journalism—with something like the threat of an invasion of England in the background—at work to shield a blustering and hot-headed official from the blame due to a clear breach of the law of nations, does partake of the absurd; it is much like the "Ocean into tempest tost,

To waft a feather or to drown a fly."

That such a difference should have been fanned into a war would have been very deplorable. There would have been no cause, no principle, to justify the mingled folly and wickedness to which both nations would have been driven. We know well that wars have sprung from the most insignificant causes, and that it is not difficult "greatly to find quarrel in a straw." One war is on record as having been caused by a stolen bucket; and another is said to have arisen from a dispute about the size of a window; but in most great wars great principles have been involved. The French themselves, in the war of the last revolution, struggled against the despotism of Legitimacy and the oppression of Aristocracy; and, when their frontiers were threatened by a foreign army, flung at the thrones of Europe the head of their King as a bloody gage of defiance. That war was at first a war of opinion, though changed by Napoleon into one of conquest and aggrandisement. Assuredly, if the French sought a cause of war worthy of themselves, they could not find it in the Otaheitan squabble. Rejoiced are we, therefore, to see the signs of returning reason and moderation visible even in the journals which we suspect of flattering the prejudices of the war party to an unhealthy degree. And perhaps we judge too much of the opinions and feelings of the people, by what we read in the papers addressed to them, and which, to command attention, must to some extent exaggerate; a French writer may sacrifice the truth both of nature and fact to as great an extent as his conscience permits him, but he must on no account be dull or common-place. This may go far to explain some of the philippics against "perfidious Albion," so many of which we have lately laid down with the commentary of Mrs. Quickly on the vapourings of Ancient Pistol, "I faith, Captain, these be very bitter words." But seriously, we are heartily glad that the danger of a collision from this quarter has almost disappeared. A war between England and France, once begun, would be a fatal one in itself, and could not long be confined to the two powers commencing it. It would be a calamity to the whole human race, and give a check to human civilization, which has only begun to recover from the mischiefs of the last. The most glorious victories for mankind now are those of peace.

Turning from Otaheite to Morocco, we also perceive the signs of returning tranquillity. In this dispute we are less directly interested, though the scene of action is so much nearer our own shores. Had hostilities commenced, it would have been our duty to have seen that no British lives or property were injured; but we could hardly have been called on to act as partisans. As it has turned out, we have acted as mediators; and the negotiations of Mr. Drummond Hay have rendered the bombardment of any of the towns on the coast unnecessary, we hope not to the disappointment of the Prince de Joinville, who, with his fleet, has returned from Tangier to Gibraltar. The Emperor of Morocco has, it seems, agreed to give up, or expel Abd-el-Kader from his dominions, or, at all events, not to lend him the assistance of his subjects. Some doubt is expressed whether he will be as able to expel the brave Arab chief, as he is willing to do it. But that he will withdraw all direct firm support from him, there can be little doubt; and, having made all the reparation for past countenance in his power, we trust the French will be satisfied, for, as to the rest, the poor Emperor can hardly be compelled to do an impossibility.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE PACHA OF EGYPT.—FROM A RECENT DRAWING.

ABDICATION OF MEHMET ALI.

Mehmet Ali, who so long ruled over Egypt, is a man of no ordinary kind. It is not our purpose to eulogise him extravagantly, or to "set down aught in malice" regarding him. We are aware that it is the custom to represent him as a very enlightened ruler; but, in point of fact, his government was essentially an arbitrary one. At the same time, it is only fair to state, that although fettered by the system with which he was identified, he introduced many reforms, and endeavoured to act in an impartial and enlightened spirit. He did justice to all, without regard to religious or political differences. And here we may remark, en passant, that when first the overland route to India was established, he gave every facility in his power to this new mode of communication, and under his auspices the route from Alexandria to Suez, which previously could not be traversed without danger, became as safe as the most frequented region in England.

Mehmet did much to purify the administration of justice. He established a good police, and did away with tortures and other punishments which had disgraced the sway of his predecessors. He did not stop here; but it is undeniable that he attempted to establish a national system of education, a task which has dismayed some of the enlightened statesmen of England. Thus far for his good deeds. On the other hand, it is equally true that his subjects were bowed down by excessive taxation, and he levied a conscription as odious as that of Napoleon. Perhaps, however, the fault was rather with the system than with himself; for, although identified, as we have said, with absolutism, he made vast efforts ind usually to administer the Government in a mild and benignant spirit. Whenever abuses came to his knowledge, he used his exertions to reform and suppress them, although, from the corruption of his subordinate agents, these efforts were not always attended with success.

Notwithstanding this favorable disposition towards enlightened government, he relied more upon his military power than upon the influence of public opinion. His military forces were disproportionate to the population, and in short there was an evident tendency to rule rather by the sword than by the influence of the popular will, guided by moderation and judgment. It must be admitted, nevertheless, that if he did not effect so much in the way of civilization as might have been expected from his great mind, yet at least he gave an impulse to those changes which within the last few years have tended to raise Egypt to greatly in the scale of nations.

The telegraphic notice, in the French papers, hints at the retirement of the venerable Pacha to Mecca, but if all accounts be true, he was by no means of a religious turn of mind. Indeed, an anecdote is told of him which tends to show that his character was more remarkable for dissipation than for devotion. It is said the Sheikh Ibrahim (Bourkessah), once waited upon him to solicit permission "to retire to Mecca." "Pacha," said the traveller, "I want to go and see the Holy City, and to pray at the Prophet's tomb. Give me your leave and pardon for the journey." "You go to Mecca, and our holy Prophet's tomb! That is impossible, Ibrahim; you are not qualified; you are not a true believer." "But I am Pacha; I am qualified in every respect. As to belief, do not doubt me. Tell me any part of the Koran that I do not believe." "Go to the Holy City, go Ibrahim," replied Mehemet, laughing heartily. "Do you think I'll see myself with questions from the Koran? Go and see the Prophet's tomb, and may it enlighten your eyes and comfort your heart!"

But whatever may have been Mehemet Ali's scepticism or indifference in regard to religious matters, it is true that upon the whole he governed Egypt in such a way as to make his sudden abdication a matter, if not for regret, at least for inquiry. He was certainly a friend to England and the English. It was but very recently that he gave an indication of his desire to cultivate friendly relations with this country by the conclusion of a treaty, important for her interests.

Of his son Ibrahim report is less favorable; but it is to be hoped that the mantle of his father will descend upon him, and that Mehemet, if not actually, will virtually, direct the affairs of Egypt. As we have remarked elsewhere, the chance, politically speaking, can afford no ground for apprehension; because the events of 1839 and 1841 led to arrangements with Turkey, by means of which the Porte gave up the pretension to interfere with the succession; so that Ibrahim will succeed to the pashalik as a matter of course.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers contain a telegraphic despatch which communicates an unexpected, but by no means an unimportant announcement—the abdication of Mehemet Ali, the Viceroy of Egypt. The despatch is thus worded:—

"ALEXANDRIA, July 27.
His Highness the Viceroy has just suddenly left Alexandria, declaring that he renounces for ever Egypt and public affairs, and that he retires to Mecca. Ibrahim is at Alexandria. The city is quiet."

The succession to the title having been recently secured to the family of Mehemet Ali, his son Ibrahim will no doubt succeed to the pashalik and government of Egypt without any difficulty or opposition from the Porte.

The subject of the dispute between France and Morocco of course continues to excite considerable attention in Paris; but the reports on the subject are very contradictory. In the early part of the week, confident statements were circulated of an arrangement of the dispute, but subsequently more warlike announcements have been received. Indeed the report of the bombardment of Tangier has been revived, but in reality no intimation of an authentic character regarding the real state of the matter has been received.

On the day previous to the arrival of the despatch announcing the suspension of hostilities, another was received dated the 20, announcing the arrival of the Prince de Joinville before Tangier, and that no answer had been given to the ultimatum, but stating that the Prince was prevented from commencing his operations at once in consequence of the non-arrival from the interior of Mr. Drummond Hay, for whose fate some uneasiness was felt. Since that time, however, news had been received from Mr. Hay. The Emperor, he states, has granted to France and Spain the just satisfaction which they have demanded. Mr. Hay was expected at Tangier. The French fleet was preparing to sail from Tangier for Gibraltar.

Although the Prince de Joinville consented to suspend hostilities, yet when he sent the despatch to Paris, he accompanied it with the following explanation:—"I consented to the suspension of hostilities," said the Prince, "not that I have the least hope of receiving from the Emperor that satisfaction which we have a right to demand, but to show to the population of Tangier that my Government is determined not to commence hostilities until every hope of peace is lost." The Prince, on the 1st and 2nd, received several private letters from the inhabitants of Tangier, entreating him to spare the town, and assuring him that should he be compelled to adopt hostile measures against the Emperor, on his first summons the keys of Tangier would be given up to him. The Pacha of Tangier is far from having any animosity against the French. This declaration of the Prince affords a striking commentary upon the confident hopes expressed in some quarters of the termination of hostilities.

It would appear, from the following account, given in the Affaire, that the temporary arrangement made by the Emperor, was brought about with some difficulty. That paper says:—

"The Phare arrived off El Arich in the morning of the 25th. The sea was rough, and the captain of the port, who usually boards every vessel that arrives, to demand the motives of her visit, was some time waiting for her. Seeing that he did not make his appearance, the captain of the Phare lowered a boat, and the esoy of the Prince de Joinville, accompanied by M. Balanoff, an Algerine pilot, landed on a rock at the foot of a battery. Some Moroccan soldiers came down to ask what the Frenchmen wanted, when a letter was given them for the Pacha, in which M. Warner informed him that he was the bearer of despatches for him, but that he should not come into the town until hostilities, mentioned in the communication, had been sent on board the steamer. The Pacha immediately sent his first secretary, the Amin of the Marine, and the Kad of Mechorat, who commanded the garrison. M. Warner and M. Balanoff then went down on the beach, in spite of the violence of the surf, but when the hostilities were requested to get into the boat, they excused themselves in consequence of the roughness of the sea. M. Warner insisted, and threatened to return on board. The secretary wrote to the Pacha, his master, to consult him on the subject of this difficulty, but the letter had scarcely been sent off, when M. Warner decided on going himself to the Pacha, accompanied by the pilot. The inhabitants formed a double line, through which the French envoy passed, and the Pacha received him with marked distinction. M. Warner handed him the ultimatum of France, and commented on it verbally. The Pacha sent off a courier to the Emperor. There was no time to be lost, for the ultimatum dated by the ultimatum would expire on the 2nd August. As the Consul-General, in the despatches delivered by M. Warner, demanded immediate permission for the embarkation of all the French who were at Tangier, with their property, the Pacha did not hesitate, and, under the dictation of M. Warner himself, wrote to the Khedive at Tanis to allow the French army to act on this subject as he might think proper. The Pacha had also given a similar authority, on the previous evening, to the Neapolitan Consul, who had come to El Arich in the Hecla. He also expressed his desire to see the unhappy differences existing between the two countries removed. At six o'clock in the evening the Phare again set under weigh, to return to the French squadron. On the 2nd of August the ultimatum of France would expire, and on the previous evening the envoys of the Emperor arrived at Tangier, announcing that peace was assured; but these same envoys hastened to remove everything that was valuable, and above all, the public treasure. The inhabitants fled from the town, carrying off their wives, their children, their slaves, and all their riches, into the mountains. A report was also current that a price had been put upon the head of the Governor of Tangier, doubtless on account of his having allowed the Consuls and their countrymen to embark; that the Pacha of Larache had also been compelled to take refuge in the insubmersible asylum of the Marabout Bon-Salam; and that the Kad of Rabat, who was too much a friend to peace, had fled at the approach of the Emperor, and that the mountaineers had entered and pillaged that town as soon as the Sultan had left it. The mountaineers had arrived in crowds at the gates of Tangier, demanding admission ostensibly to protect the place, but in reality to pillage it; they would, however, find nothing to take, for the Moors had so well provided by their forbearance that the place might now be burnt without causing them the slightest regret."

It must be stated also that, according to a well-informed writer in Paris, it was believed that either the Emperor of Morocco is endeavoring to gain time, or that afraid of the increasing influence of Abd-el-Kader, he is anxious to secure the powerful aid of France against the Emir. The Consuls of France, Spain, and Denmark, have quitted Tangier, the others remain. At Tangier, on the 2nd, nobody knew what had become of the English Consul; it was reported that the Emperor had refused to see him.

The Grecus, with the Prince de Joinville's despatches, touched at Gibraltar on the 2nd, and consented to take despatches from Sir Robert Wilson for Lord Cowley and Lord Aberdeen. These despatches were forwarded to Paris from Port Vendre.

The following are the naval forces of the different nations now at anchor off Tangier:—France: 3 sail of the line, 1 frigate, 3 brigs, and 9 steamers; making altogether a force of 450 guns.—Spain: 1 frigate, 1 corvette, 3 brigs, 2 schooners, 1 cutter, and 1 steamer.—England: 1 line-of-battle ship, 1 frigate, and 1 steamer.—Sardinia: 1 corvette of 35 guns; and Sweden: 1 corvette of 35 guns.

The Tahiti Affair has become a subject of much less interest with the Paris papers. The Prover, however, has a violent article against Mr. Pritchard.

The Toulonensis gives a letter from Algiers, by which it seems that Marshal Bugeaud has resigned the command of the expeditionary army to General Lamoriciere, and confines himself to the Government of the colony.

Some uneasiness had been caused at Paris by the news of the departure of three ships of the line for Toulon. It was generally believed their destination was Tangier, but it appears from a Government paper the Globe, that Admiral Paravall, who commands the squadron, has been ordered to direct his course to Tunis to watch the movements of a Turkish fleet, consisting of seven ships of the line and four frigates. According to this authority the French are resolved to protect Tunis.

The Duke de Nemours is at present on a tour of inspection of the army in the provinces. He has received addresses from the authorities of Beaune, and almost every other town he has passed through. The addresses are all very loyal, but have not taken a political turn, as they did last year.

The health of the ex-King of Holland, now the eldest surviving branch of the Bonaparte family, has, it is said, suffered severely from the death of his brother Joseph.

SPAIN.

There is no intelligence of interest from Madrid, but reports of intended plots were rife.

The General Junta of the Haque provinces, in its sitting of the 2nd instant, unanimously claimed the fall and entire re-establishment of the Faeros. The Catolico publishes a letter from Puerto de Santa Maria of the 2nd, stating that the bombardment of Tangier commenced on the 2nd; that the report of the cannonading had been heard at Cadix, and the smoke distinctly perceived from the watch-tower.

The private letters from Cadix are silent on the subject; and the Gibraltar Chronicle of the 2nd positively announces, that the Prince de Joinville, visiting to the considerations submitted to him by the representatives of England, and hearkening to the voice of humanity, had agreed to postpone the bombardment of Tangier until the result of the mission of the British Consul should be known.

POLAND.

The accounts from Poland in the Hamburg papers give most deplorable descriptions of the damage done by the inundations of the Vistula and other rivers. Letters from Kulin state that the Vistula had risen to a greater height than at any time during the last hundred years. It is impossible to say how many thousand villages may be inundated by the mighty river in its long course from Cracow to Danzig. Above and below Calon 100 towns and villages are in a sea, and the inhabitants have been forced to take refuge on the roofs, on trees, and on some neighbouring hills.

PRUSSIA.

The King of Prussia issued the following characteristic declaration before leaving his dominions:—"I cannot quit the soil of my country, though only for a short time, without publicly expressing in my own name and that of the Queen, the deeply-felt gratitude which fills our hearts. It is excited by the innumerable proofs of affection to us, both verbal and in writing, which we have received, and were called forth by the attempt of the 25th of July; that affection which loudly avowed us at the instant of the crime, when the hand of the Almighty averted the deadly shot from my breast. Looking up to my heavenly Preserver, I pressed with fresh courage to my daily work to complete what is begun, to carry into execution what is prepared, to combat evil with increased certainty of victory, and to be to my people everything that my high vocation lays upon me as a duty, and which the love of my people deserves."

RUSSIA.

"Kidmanford, August 5, 1844."
A letter from Berlin gives rather a curious anecdote about Tschetch, from which it appears that he was actuated by the same morbid passion for notoriety which has led to similar infamous attempts in England. "Tschetch lately asked a bookseller whether he would be willing to publish his very interesting memoir of his life. The bookseller, to whom he was a total stranger, replied, that in the first place he must see a specimen of the work, before he could decide. It was said that Tschetch the day before his criminal attempt, sent him not merely a specimen but the whole manuscript, and with a note to the effect, that 'the bookseller should not allow himself to be put out of the way, even if the work, which he heard of him should be that he had died in prison, or on the scaffold.' Almost at the same time as the manuscript the news of the attempt on the King's life reached the bookseller, who, it is said, has thought fit to send the manuscript of Tschetch to the criminal court of Berlin."

ITALY.

Letters from Naples prove that the King has acted with the utmost rigour towards the individuals concerned in the late insurrection in the Calabria. The official paper, the Journal of the Two Sicilies, has the following on the subject:—"On the 25th July the military commission sitting at Cassano pronounced sentence of death upon seventeen of the persons implicated in the descent upon Calabria, nine of which were carried into effect on the following day. The names of the unhappy sufferers were—Antonio and Emilio Bardella, sons of the Austrian admiral; Nelsio Riccio, the commander of the 2nd column of the insurgents of Ascona, in 1831, who subsequently fought throughout the civil war in Spain, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; Domenico Mera, formerly lieutenant in the Austrian army; Anacarsio Nardi, a lawyer, and nephew to the Duke of Modena in the insurrection of 1831; Giovanni Vignaschi, Giacomo Rocca, Francesco Bara, and Domenico Laganelli."

EGYPT.

According to the Notts Times, Sir R. Harding, in three days only, made an important arrangement with Mehemet Ali. By a treaty, which was mutually signed, the English Government guaranteed to Mehemet Ali, as well as to his descendants, the government of Egypt, and that no other Power should interfere with him. In return, Mehemet Ali has treated that the English Government should do as they liked in the country, and to protect all English subjects; he consents, moreover, to allow troops to go through Egypt whenever necessary. The railways from Cairo to Suet are to be commenced without loss of time. [There seems no reason to doubt the statement, and it proves that at the very moment when Mehemet Ali contemplated abdication, he was desirous of carrying out amicable arrangements with England.]

UNITED STATES.

The Hibernia, mail steamer, arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday morning, with New York papers to the 21st July, having, as usual, made a rapid passage. She left Boston on the 1st inst., and Halifax on the 3rd inst. The steamship Caledonia arrived at Halifax on the 1st of August, after an unusually speedy voyage. Although these arrivals are nearly a fortnight later than those last received, nothing of political importance is to be gleaned from them. Commerce is reported to be in a flourishing state, and the weather for the harvest all that could be desired. The yield of grain, especially Indian corn, will, it is said, be superabundant. The inundations caused by the overflow of the Mississippi and its tributaries, of which vague accounts have previously been received, are stated to have done great damage to property, and the destruction of cotton cannot fail to have been large. No correct estimate has, however, appeared. Twenty-one houses have been burnt down at Brooklyn, and a considerable amount of property consumed by the flames. Four of the ruffians who perpetrated the homicides on board of the Sulista were executed at Halifax on the 20th July. Their names are, Anderson, Travagosa, John Johnston, George Jones, and William Hamilton. Carr and Galloway, who were indicted for the murder of Captain Fielding only were acquitted. The four prisoners confessed their guilt previous to execution.

The New York papers have reports of the loss of the West India mail steamer Tay, but a late arrival at that city from Nassau has intelligence that she had been spoken off the coast, waiting for anchors, having lost her own, after being on Colorado Reef. The Captain of the post had boarded her, and the necessary assistance would be rendered.

The accounts from Mexico in the New York papers are interesting. They are to the 3d of June. The Mexican Congress was still occupied in discussing the proposals of Government for a loan of money and a levy of soldiers. The first demand for a loan of 4,000,000 dollars and an army of 45,000 men, had been rejected; but new proposals had been made, and the final vote had not been taken at the last accounts. It seems that the news of the rejection of the Treaty of Amoy by the United States' Senate had somewhat cooled the ardour of the Mexican Congress. The members believe that an invasion of Texas will not require 45,000 men and a 500,000 dollars. It seems nearly certain, however, from the tone of the Mexican papers, that Congress will not adjourn without voting the supplies that may be desired necessary.

Upon the receipt of the intelligence of the transportation of United States troops to the Texas frontier, the Mexican Government asked of the United States Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. B. E. Green, whether the troops to be sent by Mexico against Texas would be attacked by the United States forces? Mr. Green replied that, having received no instructions from his Government, he could not answer the question categorically; but that, as the Mexican Government had declared that annexation would be considered a declaration of war, it was probable that, on submitting the treaty to the Senate, the President had conceived at his duty to despatch troops to the frontier as a measure of precaution.

CHINA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Ningpo, 23rd March, 1844.

My dear Sir,—My last advised the fire of Canton; this present pleasure relates to a more important subject.

You are aware that since October, 1843, three ports have been opened by the Chinese for trade—Amoy, Ningpo, and Shanghai.

This event must be deeply interesting to our merchants and manufacturers commercially, and I am happy to be able to state that I am better off by a very great authority, one probably, from many circumstances, the best informed party here, in saying through you to them, that the trade with this country is likely soon to be the most lucrative that England at present pursues.

Ningpo—Amoy, of the ports, is nearest Hong-Kong, say 450 miles to the N. E.

The adjacent sea is thick with islands, which are so situated as to form long vistas of lake-like scenery; of these opposite and about one-quarter mile distant lies Koonsoo, held by us till the ransom be paid; and it is rumored, to be afterwards a dwelling-place of foreigners, Amoy itself not offering accommodation. A more lovely place they need not wish.

Here are now our dark and faithful followers from India, the gallant "Native Troops." Here the 18th, the Royal Irish, as their name may tell; the gay in the summer-time of peace—the first to face the winter hail of war.

Not long since all the wealth of Amoy resided here; when the business of the day was over, in the bosom of their families luxuriating in the dainty repose of the Chinese love, or in the courts of their mansions enjoying the song-sing of the hired dancer, or wandering in gardens, where the summer-voice of birds scarce ever dies, and many a fruit and many a giant flower unknown to us, owned their lords. All is changed; strange to the mango and the orange tree are the unkindred forms around. Dark falls the foreign shade on the gleaming fountains of that sunny isle.

Around the scene the figures now present the steady mole, the military walk, the close-fitting garb, the exact appointments of European soldiery.

The Chinese possessors, sweeping by with their stately gait, their flowing robes of rarest silks and satins, embroidered richly; their long necklaces of costly beads, their jade-stone ornaments, their cap set with jewels; their high, large satin boots—gone.

The entire centre of this island is a valley—I called it Happy Valley. Sheltered on every side, rich in every produce, with trees and fountains and rocks. But war was heavy on this sweet spot. The stranger trod down its gardens, his foreign feet poisoned its herbage and graves, trampled out their fire, and stood upon tombs over which still then had waved the uncoloured grass of centuries. From its stricken bosom I heard arise the plaintive voice of desolation, I felt its lonely and sad condition; an interest even in that alien and inanimate land stood erect upon me. I turned to my vessel, breathing a fervent wish that we had never entered there.

The town or city of Amoy is in itself, however, wretchedly filthy, and the streets in some parts narrow, even for China, where you can often touch the walls of both sides at once. The people appear to be very civil, and their number may be about 300,000. A gentleman accompanied me once or twice through and beyond the town, and we found the people after we passed, only perhaps a dozen times; this is by no means intended as a "read mille fides;" at the same time I did not hear the Pong-poo—"Foreign Devil," of Canton, once breathed. A man of war in the harbour, and the soldiers at Koonsoo doubtless have their influence; yet I am inclined to think that those in this locality are, to say the least, much more friendly than could be hoped in a city taken by storm. Already, although the port has been but three or four months open, there have been as many, I should say, as twelve vessels, perhaps more; and some sales have been effected, I understand, at paying prices. I am not aware of any tea having been shipped.

Shanghai, though more distant from Hong Kong than Ningpo, was the second port opened; the Consul for the latter place being detained by business at Canton. It is close on 100 miles to the N.E. There is very little of interest in or about Shanghai, from public buildings or natural scenery. The population is, say 350,000, the people civil. There have been to Shanghai five or six vessels, at least. I know of no tea from that quarter yet; a large trade in imports, and, perhaps, of exports, is expected to grow up here; as it is the key to the whole north.

Mr. Thos, formerly in the house of Jardine, Mathieson, and Co., more lately interpreter to the Chinese expedition (in which capacity he was of essential service to his country), is now officiating Consul for Ningpo, where it is considered that his business-habits and information will be eminently useful to the commercial interests of Great Britain; while it is not to be doubted, that his very great talents and extensive acquirements, together with the advantage of a long and confidential intercourse with his Excellency, Sir Henry Pottinger, will enable him to turn to account the high position which his conduct in many trying and critical circumstances during the war, has given him in the Chinese mind, to the sustenance and advancement of our political influence and importance in this vast portion of the east.

Ningpo is situated about twenty miles from the mouth of the river of that name, which by keeping mid channel is a safe, though, perhaps, not exactly of easy navigation, owing to the immense number of junks, many of them of great size, which crowd toward, and from, and anchor about this flourishing commercial city. It is likely, however, that for the benefit of all parties, junks will be compelled to anchor, so as to leave a good channel. The city walls, which entirely surround it, are of most massive construction; it being possible to drive a carriage and four over all parts. We carried and subsequently defended them during the war, of which there are some rich evidences and records on the interior of the whitewashed walls of the now-vacant guard rooms. From these there are many fine views, of a wide spread natural theatre, interesting from its well laid out water, its clusters of plantation, and its handsome country seats. In the distance the mountains surround—the guardians of so fertile a plain; through it rolls a noble river, joined where it passes the ancient city by a branch curious to name, Tenge-Kee, but broad as itself. This vast rich district presents the greatest, most exact, and most economical cultivation.

Though acquainted with some of the "gardens of England," I must confess that we have none superior, perhaps, speaking generally, large tract for large tract, none equal to the plain of Ningpo. Of course I presume our scientific knowledge in agriculture to be much superior, and our mechanical appliances much advanced; but whether some of these latter, as they are at present, are judicious, remains to be seen. Meanwhile the Chinese follow what is called spade cultivation, at least something much akin. Human labour is of small value, however. I presume one would get a spade-man at 2d. to 3d. per diem the year round. Ningpo is clean; many of its shops splendid—full of silks and satins, and embroidery of gold. As, with rich and various velvets. Furs, shaped into or hung all manner of dresses of crapes, &c., fill a whole street, and look very pretty and warm.

The people of Ningpo are civil; there are, probably, half a million of inhabitants.

There have been four vessels here; another is expected daily, and many when the monsoon changes, say next month. Some profitable transactions have taken place.

A vessel is now being loaded with tea, for England (the Nautilus); the first, I believe, which will sail loaded from the three ports.

This second trade compared with the wants of China, could not be more of the physical machinery of commerce here. Neither roads nor banks, nor paper money, nor established agents, nor, unfortunately, that state of which there are but symbols—a wide spread knowledge and a good enlightened government, security and credit stand an enterprising people. Here "let the people perish alive as ignorance," is still the policy, and natural distrust the practice. Partnership even of those at the depths of commodities exchangeable at a passing price are unknown, or truly perhaps of any kind, are scarcely if ever tried. As was once owned. But let us suppose that confidence and credit to a certain extent placed under the old system, that monopolists for once were generous, that the leopard had changed his spots, the Ethiopian his skin; that the twelve Hong merchants were philanthropists in the extreme, and desired to diffuse far and wide the benefits of European civilization; there remained two barriers to be removed, which presented an obstacle so great, as to prevent our fabrics competing properly with nature.

1st. The "Canton man, selling, say to a Shanghai" man, the goods were chargeable, and would have to bear and come into consumer's possession finally, loaded with two profits, the Canton man's and the Shanghai man's, while now one China profit sufficed.

2nd. The fact of transhipment being necessary—I do not allude to extra freight alone—Customs duty, pilfering, custom-house, and other dues, presented, from intricacies of damage and total loss, is a land where no insurance societies exist, a very great obstacle to merchants from the North taking our high-priced, closely-packed products.

From our commerce now all these disabilities are removed. The south and the north are in competition for us. We too may stay; or, unasked, unharmed, we may go. The law allows them and we may, their High Commissioners, the distinguished "Keying," thus speaks:—"Henceforth, joy and profit shall be the perpetual lot of all. Neither slight nor few will be the advantages reaped by the merchants alike of China and of foreign countries." And again:—"I do really day and night indulge in the fervent hope of an improved commercial intercourse, beneficial to all parties." "The people are glad in the prospects thus opened up." Indeed, intact and in feeling, the change in our relations is manifest and real; not a mere paper change, or treaty bombing; and so being, I believe it must be regarded as almost indefinitely valuable.

The towns or ports merely, now and thus opened, with their swarming thousands, will prove great consumers; but these are surrounded by villages, and are the keys to various portions of a vast and nearly overpopulated country.

Let it be remembered, also, that, most important to us as a nation, the carrying trade of our goods to, and their goods from China, is, and will be for long and long, in our own hands. By this is secured to us that important portion of our fellow-subjects, the owners of those 3 or 4 leviathan ships, which trade between the countries, brought for their vessels; and there is established a school for seamen-ship, the greatest in the world, from which is to be obtained for our country the nerve and sinew of an unrequited and unconquerable navy, whom no hardships can deter, and no dangers appal.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE INSOLVENCY OF THE ROMFORD BANK.—On Monday there was a very numerous attendance at the Bankruptcy Court, of the creditors of the Romford Bank, that day being appointed for the examination of the Messrs. Johnson and Mr. Mann. Mr. Alderman Johnson was heard at considerable length. The chief points of interest claimed from his examination by Mr. James are comprised in the following statement:—Had you private accounts with the Romford Bank? Yes, I had, and I admit I owe it from £12,000 to £15,000, though I cannot call it overdrawing it. I had the customers' money out of the bank, and applied it to different purposes. I paid off a bond given 36 years since. I did not pay the bond off as I drew out three sums. I wish for an adjustment as to accounts, in order to give a better account than I can now.—Did you apply the overdrawn money in the amount of £12,000 to the purposes of paying off this bond, because you have to account for the bills to an amount of £15,000? The interest upon the bond was £10,000, and I paid in bills and cheques to the Romford Bank in the name of Johnson and Mann, and which never were paid as my bankers, Messrs. Whitmore and Wells.—Look at the cheque for £1,000, and tell me if you did not direct the cheques not to be presented? I never saw the cheques after I drew them. It is possible that in a single instance I might have given such directions, but it was not my habit. I do not know that the cheques I gave upon my bankers were not to be presented until I gave orders, although I had credit for them at the Romford Bank. I know that the cheques were entered at the end of the cash-books, and I was to compensate them when I was in funds to do so.—Was it not fully understood that the cheques you drew were not to be presented? I cannot say.—Here are cheques for £2750 drawn by Johnson and Mann.—Did Mann know anything about it? I did not ask him an approximation.—Answer the question. I was cash-keeper, and if the cheques had gone through my bankers, I must have given him information in relation to it. The cheques were received as vouchers.—Were you not afraid of having those cheques presented, because of your using your partner's name. Yes or no?—I had no fear at the time; my partner did not dispute my intentions, and there would have been no dispute if my partner had then known it. I meant to have borrowed money to redeem these cheques from the bank, having had a credit for it, and drawn out the money. Have you dealt with several bills in the same manner?—Yes, I have, and that in order to increase my private credit. This bill for £175 is drawn by me on the London House. And in your own name and for your own private purposes?—I admit it, but it was all for the benefit of the partnership. Have you drawn out £15,000 from the Romford Bank for your own purposes?—I never had all the money. No, I dare say not, at any time in your pocket; but you had it?—Yes; I suppose I had. Do you not know the deficiency on the bill account amounts to £15,750 12s. 3d?—The books will tell; and that amount was used for the bank and the trade in London. What have you done with the money?—The bank cost £27,000 in rent, wages, &c., and the profits were very small. I spent nothing in pleasure, or merely for my own use. Mr. Mann was also examined. He stated that Mr. Alderman Johnson kept the cash, and he had the plaintiff's residence in him. Some discussion ensued, and it was stated, that the assessor refused to continue an allowance to Mr. Johnson. Mr. George said the creditors would not consent until Mr. Johnson gave satisfactory accounts. When that was done an allowance would be immediately given. The result of the examination was, that an adjournment was directed to take place till November next, in order that in the interim the bankrupt's accounts should be fully gone into.

Robert Banister, a bankrupt, who recently absconded from his creditors with a large amount of property in his possession, has been arrested at Madeira, and on Wednesday surrendered at the Bankruptcy Court. The property in specie and bank notes recovered, and which is now in the hands of the official assignee, amounts to nearly £75,000.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

DELINQUENT MURDER OF A WIFE BY HER HUSBAND.—WESTERN CIRCUIT.—At Wells, on Monday, John Fisher was tried before Mr. Justice Paterson for the wilful murder of Mary Fisher, his wife. The first witness called was a servant girl named Evans. She stated that she had been a servant with the prisoner and the deceased about a fortnight before the deceased came by her death. The deceased lived at Weston super-Mare, and kept a public-house or beer-shop there, known as the sign of the Devonshire Arms. He and the deceased did not live on good terms; but, on the contrary, there were frequent disputes and bickerings between them. On the 5th of June the prisoner had been out with a horse and cart that he kept, and returned about five o'clock. Nothing particular occurred for more than an hour after his return. At that time the prisoner and deceased commenced a quarrel about a lodger who had given notice to quit. It appeared that prisoner had informed deceased of it, in a way to incite her that she was the cause of it; and she replied, that she was not going to put up with his temper, and that she wished all of them would leave. They continued quarrelling in the bar until nine o'clock, the deceased using the most aggravating terms of reproach to the prisoner. At nine o'clock witness took a candle, and put it in the bar, as she was accustomed to do. Evidently for the purpose of annoyance the deceased immediately blew out the candle. The prisoner and a candle should be brought there, and ordered witness to relight it, which she did. There was a slate kept in this room on which was put the account of the beer sold and not paid for during the day. When witness took back the candle the deceased, in continuation of her annoyance to the prisoner, took up the slate, and said if a candle was put there, it would serve her purpose to rub out the accounts on the slate, and she forthwith deliberately took the slate, and rubbed out all the accounts. This of course but increased the angry feeling between the parties, and they continued to quarrel until half past ten, the deceased all this time saying everything she could think of to aggravate and annoy the prisoner. At about ten o'clock they went to bed, the deceased going up before the prisoner. She went at first in the prisoner's room, where she always slept, but came out of it before she came up, and went into witness's room (where also the two children slept, saying, as she did, that she would never sleep with the old rascal again; when she came into the witness's room, witness locked the door. After a short time the deceased became very violent, and wanted to jump out of the window, which witness, with difficulty, prevented, and got her into bed. Shortly after the prisoner came up stairs, and, apparently not finding her in the room, he came to search for her in the room of witness. He found the door fast, and demanded admittance, which was refused. He then went away, and again returned and tried the door. Deceased wanted to get out at him, but was prevented by witness. Prisoner then said at the door that he wanted to get her to all her, for that he was determined to kill her, and he might as well kill her that night as in the morning. After this they still continued to quarrel, using all sorts of angry and provoking language towards each other. This continued till one o'clock, when their quarrelling and abuse ceased. Witness and deceased continued awake until three o'clock, when witness fell asleep. About five o'clock in the morning, she was suddenly awakened, and saw the prisoner standing with a large iron crow-bar at the bottom of the bed. The deceased was just raising herself in the bed, having one of her arms on the pillow. Before she could do so prisoner struck her three violent blows with the crow-bar on her head, which rendered her completely insensible, and she fell back. The prisoner stood over her for a moment, and then left the room. After the interval of a minute or two he returned, and then jumped on her chest, standing on her. He then got off and left the room again, and in a minute or two returned, holding a carving knife in his hand. He addressed the witness, and said she need not be afraid, as he did not want to hurt her. He then jumped on the chest of the deceased, standing on her with his feet, and, stooping down, lifted her head from the pillow, and deliberately cut her throat with the carving-knife. After having done this he stood and looked at her for a minute, and then left the room. Shortly after he was gone, witness, and Upvall, upon whom she had called before, came down stairs and got out of the house. She then dressed herself and left the house also, leaving the prisoner there. She afterwards returned when the policeman came. In cross-examination, the witness stated that she had only lived for a fortnight with the prisoner. He was a moody man, and upon one occasion she had seen and heard him walking about the house muttering to himself. After he had done the deed, and after Upvall went out of the house, the witness, in her way to do the same, met the prisoner. He said to her that he did not consider he had done any wrong, but had removed a great siner out of the world. The deceased was a very violent woman. Corroborative evidence was given, and Mr. Cockburn addressed the jury on the part of the prisoner. After a summing up from the judge the jury returned a verdict of guilty. His lordship then, putting on the black cap, proceeded to pass on the unhappy man the awful sentence of death, which he heard unmoved, and was led from the dock urging excuses for his crime.

POLICE.

A CANDIDATE FOR IMPRISONMENT.—On Monday, at Union Hall police-office, Nicholas Duff, a poor emaciated-looking man, was charged with wilfully breaking a lamp belonging to the South Metropolitan Gas Company. A policeman of the M Division stated, that while on duty the preceding night in High-street, he observed the defendant sitting crouched up at a door, which he left, and, walking into the road, picked up a stone. He then returned to the pavement, and, while the policeman was looking at him, threw the stone at a gas-lamp, which he broke, and then said he did it for the purpose of obtaining the shelter afforded in a station-house. In reply to Mr. Traill, the unfortunate man said that he was in a state of destitution (which his appearance fully proved), that the wards for the casual paupers being full at the different workhouses where he applied for admission, he had no alternative left than that of seeking shelter in a station-house; but finding that could not be accomplished without his committing some offence, he thought it better to break a lamp than have recourse to plunder. The magistrate commiserated the poor fellow's condition, but said he could not be permitted to destroy property by wilful means. Mr. Traill committed him to prison for twenty-one days, a sentence with which the poor fellow seemed delighted. [We are aware that it is by no means an uncommon occurrence for men to seek refuge in prison rather than submit to become inmates of the poor house. Frequent proofs of this horror of the unions have been given, but yet it is rather curious when instances can be found in happy England of men who are compelled to commit crime in order to obtain food and shelter.]

ROBERT AT A GENERAL POSTMAN.—At Bow-street, on Monday, Patrick Larkin, a letter-carrier, employed at the General Post-office, was charged with stealing a number of checks and bills, the contents of letters placed in his hands, amounting collectively to £72 7s. 6d. Evidence was given of the prisoner having secreted letters which contained remittances addressed to Messrs. Glyn and Co., and Messrs. Barclay and Co. The documents enclosed in the letter addressed to Glyn and Co. were as follow:—A £400 Cornish bill on Price and Johnston; a bank post bill of £15 9s. 10d.; a ditto, £10; a check on Child and Co., £20; ditto, £10; a bill on Barclay and Co., £17s.; bill on Bank of England, £4s.; a Constantinian bill of £33; bill on Barclay and Co., £13; an order on paymaster of warehouse prelosters, £16 10s. 6d.; the letter and its contents having been forwarded from the manager of the Central Bank of Scotland, Mr. R. Burns. The letter to Messrs. Barclay and Co. was sent from the Perth Bank by Mr. David Craigie, and contained a draft on Smith and Co. for £50; a Scottish Hospital receipt for £2; and a navy bill, on the paymaster, for £14 14s. 3d.—The prisoner reserved his defence, and was remanded to Monday next.

CURIOUS ROBBERIES BY A "GENTLEMAN."—At Worship-street, on Tuesday, a gentlemanly-looking young man, named Octavius Clarke, (the son of an emigrant deceased divine), was charged with stealing a gold watch, a number of articles of jewellery, a quantity of wearing apparel, and other articles, the property of Mr. Daniel Stalker Lerue, a gentleman residing at No. 13, Haberdashers'-place, Moles, in the following off-hand manner:—Jane Weatherall, a servant to Mrs. Anne Hetherington, a widow lady, in whose house the prosecutor resides, stated that Mr. Lerue left home shortly before 11 o'clock on the morning of Wednesday, the 17th ult., and that directly after he had done so, the prisoner, whom she recognised as a friend of the prosecutor, rang the door-bell, and on her answering it, he wished her good morning, and walked direct up stairs into Mr. Lerue's sitting room, where he asked her for hot water to shave with; she procured him a jugful, and the prisoner politely thanked her, and directed her to take the water into the prosecutor's bed-room, which she did, and was followed there by the prisoner, who then turned to her with a matter-of-course air, and said, "Jane, Mr. Lerue says that you are to let me have his valise out of the closet, and that you are to put his shooting coat into it." The prisoner then began preparations for shaving himself, when witness, not being able to find the coat, the prisoner suggested that it might be in the sitting-room, and directed her to take the valise with her and put the coat into it. Witness went down stairs and packed up the things, leaving the prisoner in the bed-room, where he remained about 20 minutes, and then came down with another coat of the prosecutor's, a velvet one, upon his arm. He next asked her to call a cab for him, which she did, and on returning with it met the prisoner at the cab-gate, holding in his hand the valise, which having placed in the cab, he good-humouredly wished her good-by, and saying, "I dare say, Jane, we shall not be long till we see you to-morrow," drove off.—Mr. Lerue stated, that he had known the prisoner, who was most respectfully connected, for several years, and on the 15th ult. received a note from him, saying that he should call upon him the next day. The succeeding morning he accordingly did call, and passed the greater part of the day with him. On the morning of the 17th he left home, leaving all his property safe; but on returning in the evening was informed by the servant that the prisoner had been again, and taken away his valise and coat, as she understood, by his directions. Knowing the scapegrace character of the prisoner, and immediately went to his drawers in the bed room, one of which, in which he kept his jewellery, he could not open with his key; and on examining this drawer he found that it had already been forced open and damaged. On pulling the drawer out, he discovered that his gold watch, two finger-rings, a breast-pin, two gold watch-keys, and two mounted razors in a case, had been stolen from it; while from another drawer had been taken a blue cloth cap, a silk stock, one of his shirts, and a pair of socks. The witness, therefore, took steps to procure the apprehension of the prisoner. Mr. Lerue added that the prisoner had formerly been in the navy, which he had been obliged to leave in consequence of robbing the mess; and while filling that situation had tattooed his arms with the figure of our Saviour, and representations of the sun, moon, and various stars. After the prisoner had been taken into custody, he wrote witness a letter, requesting him not to persecute an old friend as he had been, and beseeching him to call upon his (the prisoner's) mother, at her estate in Essex, and arrange the affair with her; but witness did not think it proper to do so, and now produced this letter against him.—John Bennett, footman in the service of Captain Chappel, 17, Queen-street, May-fair, with whom the prisoner was on visiting terms, stated that he met the prisoner on Monday, the 15th ult., in Half-moon-street, Piccadilly, with a valise in his hand. The prisoner said he wished to leave this somewhere till he was able to go down to see his mother, and witness promised to leave it for him at the Sun public-house, in Sun-court, in that neighbourhood. The prisoner accompanied him there, and saw him deliver it to the landlady, when they came out together, and parted at the door.—Sergeant Rogers, C.S., who took the prisoner into custody, said the latter told him it would be useless to trouble any of the witnesses to prove the charge, as it was his intention to make a full acknowledgment of the whole. Witness told him not to be so rash, when he answered, in a tone of poignant regret, that he wished sincerely that he had been shot, for he had done it entirely through spite. Witness afterwards went to the Sun public-house, where he found the valise, containing a shirt, silk stock, a razor and razor-case.—There the prosecutor immediately identified as forming part of the property he had lost.—The prisoner, in a tone of despondency, declined saying anything in defence, and he was fully committed for trial upon that charge.—The prisoner was then charged with stealing a horse, the property of Mr. Samuel Smoothey, a farmer, at Redbeck, near Clare, in Essex.—Evidence was given in support of the charge, and the prisoner was also committed upon it. He was, however, formally remanded for a week, as Sergeant Rogers said he had found upon the prisoner's person a great number of duplicates relating to valuable property; and he was satisfied that some of these, if not the whole, were connected with other robberies committed by him.

STRANGE APPLICATION AGAINST LOUIS PHILIPPE.—On Wednesday, at the Mansion-house, a tall, elderly, military-looking man, giving the name of Hiden Hiden, who stated that he was a Frenchman, proceeded to read to Sir J. P. the sitting alderman, a sort of speech from a written paper. He commenced by saying he was well known to the French Government and the French Embassy; that in France he was, in 1839, Colonel of the 6th Regiment of the line; that he raised at his own expense, and paid from his own pocket, the two regiments called Volontaires de la Charité, and in other respects contributed to the downfall of Charles X., and the establishing Louis Philippe on the throne of France, who had thus become his (complainant's) debtor to the amount of £5000. Louis Philippe was well aware that he had aided in levelling his road to the steps of the throne, and at first duly acknowledged it, but when he got more firmly established, he forgot the claim, and on perceiving for it he was hounded.—Alderman Prie wished complainant to discontinue reading, and say briefly what he wanted.—Complainant: A warrant to apprehend Louis Philippe, as soon as he lands in this country, for a debt of honour, amounting to £5000.—Alderman Prie: The King of the French will not be here for a month, but we cannot interfere in the matter. You must apply to a civil court.—The applicant then left the court, saying he would take the magistrate's advice.

COUNTRY NEWS.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE EARL OF DURHAM.—Wednesday, the 26th inst., has been fixed for laying the foundation stone of the massive and magnificent temple to be erected to the memory of the late Earl of Durham, on Panshale-hill, in the county of Durham. A very numerous and highly respectable body of the friends and admirers of the deceased nobleman will attend the ceremony.

YORKSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of the Yorkshire Agricultural Society took place last week at Richmond, and proved satisfactory. In the cattle ground there was an average quantity of stock. The horses, both as regards number and quality, were superior to last year. In the implement yard there was a great number of agricultural implements of all descriptions, including every variety in ploughs, harrows, threshing machines, &c.

THE HARVEST.—A great deal of rain has fallen during the week in and around the metropolis. Our letters from the country, and the provincial journals, however, state, that although the wet has been considerable, there has, so far, been little impediment to the operations of the harvest field. In many places the hay and ears are down together.

IMPROVED STATE OF TRADE.—We are glad to find from the country papers that trade is improving in many of the manufacturing districts. The Leeds Mercury says, "We do not remember at any time greater activity in the principal branches of manufactures than there exists at present, except when that activity has been of a speculative and feverish character. Throughout Yorkshire and Lancashire, in the cotton, woollen, woested, flax, linen, silk, cutlery, and machine-making businesses, trade is lively, and we believe all hands are employed. The processors are, of course, exceedingly relieved."

EXECUTION AT BOWMILK.—Weeks, the murderer, was executed at the county goal, Bodmin, on Monday, in the presence of thousands—men, women, and children. He made an entire confession of his guilt, of which, indeed, the conclusive evidence adduced on the trial did not leave a doubt. At times he endeavoured to collect his thoughts in reference to his direful exit. He said the perseverance of the young woman, Dymond, in refusing his professions of love for that of another had wrought up a demoniacal feeling that he could not account for, and, urged on thus, he committed the murder.

THE LATE FIRE AT GRAVESEND.—On Monday an inquest was held at the Road and Crown, upon Thomas, near Rochester, to inquire into the cause of the death of James Miller, aged fifty-seven, who died from injuries received at the late fire near Gravesend. The coroner said it was quite clear that the accident happened from some defect in the fire; the fire thus communicated with the thatch of the roof, which, falling in upon deceased, he thus met his end. The jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

SALE OF A WIFE.—A few days ago a man named George Woodhead sold his wife, with all the ordinary formalities, in the Market-place, Leeds. The wife, who is rather a good-looking woman, about 25 years old, made her appearance, according to custom, with a halter round her neck. A large crowd of people having gathered round, the husband, who officiated as auctioneer, proceeded with the sale, and speedily "knocked down" his better half, as he is said to have done many a time before, in another way to the highest bidder, a collier, William Idle, of Quaker-green, near Rothwell, who purchased the lady for 3s. The sale had been previously arranged between the parties, before it took place, the woman having contracted a second marriage with Idle in January last, and been living with him since that time. The people who had assembled on the occasion would have handled the husband rather roughly, had he not escaped into an adjoining public house. Woodhead was, however, discharged of the popular notion, that such sales are legal, as he was afterwards taken before the magistrates, who made him enter into his own recognizances for his good behaviour during the next six months. The woman will be tried for bigamy.

MURDER IN STAFFORDSHIRE, AND CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—A cowardly assassination was committed on Sunday night at Halmerend, near Newcastle-under-Lyme. On that evening a young man named William Cooper, son of a gamekeeper of Sir T. F. Brough, Bart., and who was in the habit of assisting his father, had been to chapel, and afterwards partook of some ale at a public-house. He left for home at an early hour, accompanied by a friend named Colbrough, from whom he parted at his own house, and on reaching the door of his father's habitation he was shot in the throat by some person lurking near. The young man screamed and fell, and his father, hearing the noise, hastened to his assistance, and removed him into the house, where he died in a few minutes without uttering a word. Information of the murder having been conveyed to the constabulary office at Stoke, Major M'Knight and some of his assistants, proceeded to the spot early on Monday morning, and examined the premises. The footmarks of two individuals (one larger than the other) were distinctly traced from the house of Thomas Cooper, over a number of fields leading towards Stot Hay. About noon on Monday, Major M'Knight apprehended a collier named Paul Dawning, in a partial state of intoxication, at Halmerend. Dawning's boots were taken from his feet, and the heels were made to be studied in a remarkable manner with large nails. The larger footmarks, which had been traced, were accurately compared with these boots, and they corresponded in every particular. Dawning, who had only been released from prison the day previous to the murder, where he had been confined for two months upon the evidence of the father of the deceased for poaching, said when taken into custody, that he slept on Sunday night with Charles Powys, at his (Powys's) father's house, at Stot Hay. Powys bearing that Dawning was in custody, came in about an hour afterwards to attempt to clear him, by saying that they had slept together on Sunday night. Suspicion instantly attached to Powys also, and his boots were taken from him and compared with the smaller footmarks, with which they appeared to agree. The house of Powys's father was afterwards searched, and in a nest of drawers a gun was discovered, locked up among some wearing apparel. The gun bore every appearance of having been recently discharged. A small quantity of powder was also found in the same place, wrapped up in a blue paper. This paper corresponded as nearly as possible with a piece of discharged wadding found upon the spot where the murder was committed. These facts were elicited at the inquest, which was adjourned for further evidence.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Saturday last, William Bridge, a labourer aged 56, in the employ of Mr. J. Franklin, of the Buildings Farm, Dunmow, Essex, for the last twenty-one years, came to his work as usual about day break apparently in good health and spirits. About seven o'clock, while in the stable, endeavouring to collar a trace-horse, he called to his companion that he could not do it, and immediately fell dead. His master instantly sent for medical aid, but of no avail; life was gone. The deceased was a pensioner, having been in the Marines, and was confined nine years in prison in France. Mr. Franklin, in his deposition, stated that Bridge was very irregular occasionally in his living; at times breaking out into drinking, and, anon, would not touch a pint of beer; at other respects he believed there was not a more honest man living. On Monday an inquest was held at the Cricketers, before C. C. Lewis, Esq., when the jury, being satisfied that there had been no violence or accident, recorded a verdict "Died by the Visitation of God."

THE LATE BANK ROBBER AT BIRMINGHAM.—William Stanley Warner, the £-hundred pound

District Bank of Birmingham, was brought up before Sir John Colman, at the Warwick Assize, and pleaded guilty. The learned judge said the fact of the prisoner having been a long time entranced as a confidential servant was an aggravation of his guilt, and it became highly necessary to make an example of confidential servants who abused the great trust reposed in them. It was then his duty to sentence him to fourteen years' transportation.

MURDER AT BOSTON.—On Monday afternoon an inquest was held at the Bridge Inn, Boston, on the body of Patrick Murray, aged 39, a private in the 5th Regiment of Foot, who died in the barracks on the previous Wednesday, from a rupture of an intestine, caused by outward violence, inflicted upon him in a house of bad repute, on Saturday night, the 3rd instant. The circumstances attending this case are of a most extraordinary nature. The unfortunate man was brutally attacked in the house, and, apparently in a dying state, thrown into the ash-hole of the Bridge Inn. Early the following morning he was discovered, in a state of insensibility, by the ladies, who called assistance, and the poor fellow was removed, and placed upon some straw in the stable. On the Sunday night he was removed to the hospital, and attended by the surgeon of the regiment; and, although the man was evidently in a dying state, from the injuries inflicted upon him, yet the police were kept in entire ignorance of the affair; and it was not until after the funeral, on Friday, that it was known the man had been killed by some navigators. On Saturday two men and two women were apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the brutal outrage, but the soldier being dead, they could not be identified, and therefore were discharged. The jury returned a verdict of "Died from the effect of outward violence, inflicted by some person or persons unknown."

STEAM-BOLLER EXPLOSION AT WIGAN.—On Monday last an explosion took place at the coal-pit of Messrs. Blundell and Sons, Wigan, by which two lives were lost. The explosion caused a repetition to the front of a valley of artillery, and was heard all over the town. The sufferers were Thomas Worthington, a Brown man, who resided in Pemberton, and a little boy about seven years of age, named Michael Ashcroft, who had been taking breakfast to his father, who was working in the mine at the time of the accident. Worthington, on being taken up, presented a most pitiable spectacle. He was much scalded on the body, one of his arms was fractured, and his head much injured. The boy was in a more lamentable state. One of his legs was severely lacerated, and he was apparently much more scalded than his fellow sufferer. Both the sufferers died soon afterwards. The engineer, at the time of the accident, was at the force-pump, and probably owed his escape from injury to the masonry. The injury done to the engine a very considerable, the spring-beam and collar are broken, and the parallel motion, pumps, and piston rods are much twisted. There was only one safety-valve, two inches in diameter, to the two boilers. The jury, at the inquest, returned the following verdict, "Accidental Death," with a deadlock upon the boiler and other apparatus of £500.

THE HIGHLAND AND AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF SCOTLAND.—The annual cattle show of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, which has just taken place, was an exceedingly good one in every respect. The entries of stock were larger than upon any previous occasion. The names of the exhibitors occupied no less than 87 clearly-printed octavo pages. There were some splendid specimens of cattle. The show of horses gave great satisfaction. Of sheep the entries were very numerous, and under this class a pair of South American alpacas, accompanied by a young one two months old, were shown. The show of dairy produce was also greatly praised. In the class of extra stock some very rare and beautiful animals were shown. A pair of the white shagreened cattle of Scotland, a breed now nearly extinct, were exhibited by Lord Belhaven, and attracted a great deal of notice. Among the implements there were a number of new and ingenious inventions and improvements. The dinner was attended by about 1200 under the presidency of the Duke of Richmond. The noble duke took occasion to deny that in supporting agriculture his views were selfish. He said commerce and agriculture had the same interests, and one could not flourish without the other.

IRELAND.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENT SOCIETY OF IRELAND.—The Dublin Meeting of Monday states that the ensuing meeting of this society will be a very splendid one. No less than 400 new members have lately joined to qualify themselves for the present meeting, including Lord Lorton, Lord Farnham, the Earl of Kingston, Sir Arthur Brooke, Fashill Fortescue, Esq., and several others, who have given large annual subscriptions for the purpose. The arrangements for the show yard are complete. Mr. Yates arrived on Saturday evening in charge of Prince Albert's stock, which his Royal Highness has sent over to the show.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—As usual, there was a meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday. Mr. Daniel O'Connell, jun., read the weekly "bulletin," issued from the Richmond Residence. He was happy to state that the prisoners were in perfect health, and he could state to the association, of his own knowledge, that when the account reached Mr. O'Connell of the speech made by Mr. Shell, on the subject of the state trials, he expressed regret that any such speech should have been delivered—a regret not unmixed with some indignation. Mr. O'Connell totally disavowed and repudiated the matter of that speech; he thought it highly unbecoming as proceeding from any friend of his, and he considered it anything but a friendly act on the part of Mr. Shell. Mr. O'Connell could never consider that man his friend who would talk of compromise. There had been an assertion attributed to Sir R. Peel by the public papers to the effect that the Government had intended to issue a proclamation against the holding of two meetings prior to that of Clontarf; but that the meetings were abandoned. He (Mr. O' C) had made inquiries, and he could now state to the association that if Sir Robert Peel made any such assertion, he did so upon false information, the assertion being itself perfectly untrue, as no meeting had been agreed to be held and then given up prior to the Clontarf proclamation. He did not attribute to Sir Robert Peel the falsehood of the assertion, but to the base men who misinformed him.—A motion was unanimously agreed to for the erection of Repeal rooms throughout the country.—Mr. Cobb Powell, M.P., in a very lengthened speech, commented on the late speech of Sir Robert Peel, which, he affirmed, had only confirmed him in his adhesion to the Repeal policy. The hon. gentleman moved that a petition for a Repeal of the Union, signed by one million of persons, should be forwarded to the Queen.—Mr. Graham supported the motion, and commented upon the late speech of the Prime Minister. He said that the custom of John Bull was to insult and abuse. How long were the insults upon them to be endured? How long? He hoped that he should live to see the day in which they would make England rue the expressions which she had used towards them. (Tremendous cheers.)—The rest amounted to £955 17s. 3d.

THE JUDGMENT IN THE WRIT OF ERROR.—We find from the minutes of the proceedings of the House of Lords that judgment will be given in the case of O'Connell and the other defendants on Monday, the 2nd of September, to which day that house adjourned. The following is the form of the entry on the minutes:—"Gray v. the Queen" (writ of error); and "O'Connell and others v. the Queen" (writs of error). To be considered on Monday, the 2nd of September next, at ten o'clock; the judges then to attend, to deliver their opinions upon the questions of law propounded to them.

EXECUTION OF TWO WOMEN AT BOSTON.—On Wednesday week two women named Catherine Breen and Bridget Lanigan were executed in front of the county goal, Roscommon. There were not less than 2000 persons present, and of these one-half at least were females. The Rev. Mr. Madden, immediately after the arrival of the soldiers, proceeded with the sub-staff to remove the convicts to the chapel, where they heard mass; after which they proceeded across the goal-yard to the jury-room (called the farwell-room), the priest still in attendance. Catherine Breen, on her way to the chapel, laughed and saluted those she met on her way to the execution-room, and appeared in good health and spirits. She protested that she had neither hand, act, nor part in the murder; but did not deny that she knew of it, and therefore admitted the knowledge of all that took place. Bridget Lanigan, who appeared rather weak and depressed, admitted her guilt, and stated that she murdered her brother-in-law, and that she was anxious, along with her sister, to forgive all her persecutors.

ANOTHER FASCINATING MURDER.—An inquest was held last week at Skirrone, on the body of Thomas Granville, a stone-mason, who was brutally waylaid and murdered near that village, which is in King's County, on the 6th instant. The evidence given went to show, that the deceased having been intimate with a girl named Cahill, her brother, inflamed with revenge, had frequently been heard to threaten him, his house was attacked, and on many occasions the police had to protect him. On the evening of the 6th instant, Granville's mother, about ten o'clock, had proceeded to Kildonnan, where her son determined to meet her in order to carry her over a part of the road which was flooded near the bridge of Kildonnan, adjacent to which there was a wake, where many persons, and among them were the Cahills, were assembled. Granville was seen taking off his shoes and stockings, and must have been followed down to a dark part of the road, where his assailants waited his return. They fractured his skull in several places, and broke his arm and jaw-bone, and from the severity of the wounds, it is thought instantaneous death must have ensued. Some boys going home found him on the road, backed in his own blood, and bore him to the home of his aged parents. A verdict of "Wilful murder" against some persons unknown, was returned.

THE EMPIRE OF MOROCCO.

The recent dispute between France and Morocco has naturally excited a desire to obtain some particulars respecting the latter kingdom, which forms the subject of our illustration. It is, however, a matter of considerable difficulty to get accurate statistical information, for there are evidently gross exaggerations, for instance in regard to its population. It is variously represented. Jackson professes to have had access to the Imperial Registers, and gives the following as the result:—City of Morocco, 250,000; city of Fez, 200,000; city of Mequinez, 110,000; other cities, 135,000; provinces, 1,550,000. Total, 14,880,000. Another writer is of opinion that the entire population is not beyond 5,000,000. Perhaps 6,000,000 is nearer the truth. A work has recently been published at Madrid, by Don Servan Calderon, who gives the following estimate of the resources of Morocco. He says:—

The annual revenues of the empire are stated to amount to 2,000,000 piastres, and the expenses not to exceed 900,000 piastres. This excess of more than a million of piastres goes to swell the amount of treasure deposited in Morocco, and is otherwise called, "Muzai Muzai," i.e., the House of Treasure. This fund is stated to belong rather to the Emperor himself, than to the public money. The

MOROCCO.

The comparative smallness of this sum is explained by the fact, that a great portion of the army is formed of free and irregular troops, and paid, not out of the Imperial, but out of different local revenues. The active army is stated to amount at present to about 16,000 men. Of these, about one-half are blacks, and there are about 2000 artillery men in the empire. The maritime forces of Morocco, once so powerful, have dwindled down to three brigs and some gun-boats, which are stationed at the mouths of the principal rivers along the coast. The number of officers and men employed in the maritime department does not exceed 1500. The riches of the Pachas of the different provinces, principally amassed by extortion and the most despotic exercise of power, are described as being very considerable.

The empire of Morocco is on the extreme west of North Africa, bounded on that side by the Atlantic Ocean; on the east, by the river Mubria, which parts it from Algiers; on the north, by the Mediterranean Sea; and on the south, by the river Sas, beyond which is the Sahara, or Great Desert. This extensive space is finely diversified with hills and valleys, a great part of which has never yet been visited by Europeans; and there are various rivers flowing from the great Atlas range of mountains, which traverses the empire in its greatest length, at some distance from its southern and eastern boundary, and attains the height of nearly 12,000 feet. These rivers disengage into the Mediterranean Sea and Atlantic Ocean; the large ones forming bar harbours, which, though now so neglected as to admit of small vessels only entering them, might readily be converted to good stations for steamers. A ramification of the great mountain range turns to the north, and is there known as the Lesser Atlas, of which Mount Abyla, or Ape's Hill, opposite Gibraltar, may be deemed the northern scarp. The plain between the Atlas mountains and the sea is between four and five hundred miles in length; and the highest peak of the chain is 13,050 feet. In 1547, an Arabian chief, of the race of the Schireffes, ascended the throne, and his posterity still rule.

Morocco is necessarily warm, but not so much so as might be expected from its geographical situation; the interior is cooled by the mountain winds, and the margin experiences the alternations of land and sea breezes, while the climate is at once mild and salubrious. The seasons are divided into the dry and the wet, the latter generally being from November till March. The soil, where cultivated, is in the highest degree fertile; but there are everywhere large tracts entirely uncultivated.

The Moors are the principal inhabitants of the towns, where they fill the higher offices of government, and form the military class; hereditary distinctions, however, are unknown among them; by birth they are all equal; and they admit no difference of rank except such as is derived from official employments, on the resignation of which the occupant mixes again with the common citizens. They are the only nation of Morocco with which the Europeans have had an immediate intercourse; and many of them are descended from those who were so impolitically and cruelly expelled from Spain—an act which commenced the downward march of that country. Their language is the Moghreb, a dialect of the Arabic, intermixed with many Amazirk (the original tongue) and Spanish words. They are tall, handsome, and of every shade of complexion, white, tawny, yellow, and even black, a result of the greatly encouraged marriages with the women of Sudan. In the absence of almost every public amusement, the habits of a Moor of condition are very simple; and his rigid adherence to established usages makes one day the picture of every other. He rises with the sun, and as he sleeps in part of his dress, his toilet costs him little trouble. He offers up his prayer as the loud voice of the Muezzin reminds him of monotheism and the prophet's mission, and then breakfasts on a cup of coffee, some sweetmeats, and perhaps the luxury of his pipe of el keef, or hemlock flowers, tobacco being rarely used. He then orders his horse, and rides for two or three hours, after which, about noon, he dines on pilau, zummist, and other dishes highly seasoned. In the afternoon he frequents the coffee-house, or enters the mosque. In the evening he returns home to sup, or rather to take a second dinner, and then goes to bed.

The Arabs are the next important branch of the Moroccan population, although evidently not an indigenous portion. Their language is a tolerably pure Arabic, and they are supposed to be the descendants of those who fled from Yemen when the Mahometan tenets were first promulgated; following the chiefs whose names they have preserved in Beni Zarnot, Beni Razin, Beni Yedir, Beni Talid, Beni Bezil, Beni Walced, and the like. They are widely dispersed over the plain, where they still adhere to their nomadic wanderings and pastoral avocations; and are at once hardy, active, and intelligent. They live in dusky encampments called dowars, each consisting of numerous tents, and having large flocks and herds, from which, with a slight attention to agriculture, they entirely subsist themselves with food, home-made raiment, and surplus for markets; but they are expected to pay the property tribute, and are obliged to provide passing troops with corn, butter, honey, and meat.

The negroes are the least in number of the people of Morocco, yet constitute an important branch of its population. They are usually imported as slaves, though, on good behaviour, frequently obtain their liberty; and the kind liberality with which they are generally treated ensures the propriety of their conduct. From among them is formed the bodyguard of the Emperor—a force once very formidable, but at present not above 5000 or 6000 strong.

The government of Morocco is purely despotic. The Emperor has unlimited power. His authority extends not only over the lives and property of his subjects, but their consciences too, of which, as the representative of Mahomet, he is the spiritual guide. He is the framer, judge, interpreter, and, when he pleases, sole executor of his own decrees; and the duties, coins, weights, and measures are consequently as variable as his own opinions.

With such motley and contradictory elements, it is difficult to predict the consequence of an invasion of Morocco on a competent scale, or what would be the nature and amount of its army on a crisis. In the general cases when the Emperor wants troops, they are levied by contribution in the provinces for a limited service, but they receive very little pay or gratuity, and therefore support themselves and families by plundering every way they can. In this manner he might raise from 150,000 to 200,000 men of sorts with barely any distinction of uniform, and variously armed, but all capable of enduring hunger, thirst, and fatigue, with the utmost patience. Averse to the sea, though dreaded as rovers, they never were good sailors, but on land seem ever ready for action; and with them a stranger and an enemy are synonymous terms. Their general plan of attack is that of rising up till within a couple of hundred yards of the enemy, when they level muskets, fire, wheel round their horses, and gallop away at full speed; after which, when beyond shot-range, they re-load and return to the charge with loud yells.

But should a powerful enemy succeed in occupying the plains of the country, with their towns and cities, it is still very far from completing the conquest of Morocco; and even to maintain such occupation it would require that the conquerors should be absolute in the maritime supremacy of the Mediterranean.

BOMBARDMENT OF TANGIER.

The Times correspondent, dating Paris, Thursday Morning, Aug. 15, quotes the following from the Débats of this day:—

"We are assured that the Government received this (Wednesday) night the following important intelligence from the coast of Africa:—

"The reply to the ultimatum, sent to the Emperor of Morocco by the Prince Admiral commanding the French fleet, has not appeared satisfactory. His Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville ordered the bombardment of the advanced works which defend Tangier.

"Those works have been destroyed.

"The European quarter of the town has been spared.

"Mr. Drummond Hay, the Consul-General of England, took refuge on board the French Admiral's ship."

Tangier, of which our cut affords a representation, is situated near the western entrance of the Straits of Gibraltar, and is the town where the European Consuls-General reside. It is on a hill, near a spacious bay, 14 miles west of Cape Spartel. Three small fortresses defend its harbour. The houses are generally small and inconvenient, excepting those belonging to the European Consuls, and a few wealthy persons. The streets are, however, wider and straighter than those in other towns of the empire. The Roman Catholics have a church, which is the only Christian establishment of the kind in the empire; but the Jews have several synagogues. The commerce of the place is limited to some trade with Gibraltar and the opposite coast of Spain. The population is between 8000 and 9000 persons.

OLD HOUSE IN CLERKENWELL.

The building of New Farringdon-street, engraved in No. 95 of our Miscellany, is gradually progressing; and, in clearing the ground for its continuation northward, some dwellings of considerable antiquity have been exciting much more of the public attention than they are entitled to. Among them is the house represented in our first engraving: it is situated in West-street, formerly called Chick-lane, at which point New Farringdon-street now terminates; it is reputed to have been built 300 years ago, and was once known as the Red Lion Tavern; but, for the last century, it has been used as a lodging-house. It is situated on the west bank of Fleet River, now called the Fleet Ditch, and used as a common sewer. As our engraving shows, it has a lofty gable; but the tiled roof and whitewashed exterior walls, do not denote the actual age of the structure. Our engraving represents the exterior of the house, the artist looking southward, up Fleet Ditch, towards the Thames.

The mode in which this house is internally disposed denotes it to have long been "a den of thieves;" and up to the last Middlesex sessions it was tenanted by persons of dishonest and abandoned habits. It has all the conveniences of a hiding-place, with concealed means of escape—in dark closets, sliding panels, and secret recesses, and by as many trap doors as in the stage of a theatre. By passing down one of these traps, the pursued could elude the vigilance of the police, by getting through a window and crossing the Fleet Ditch over a plank which was kept at hand, and afterwards drawn into the opposite house. The pursued might then pass into Black Boy-alley, and thereby get into Cow-cross, and the knot of courts and alleys in that neighbourhood. Immediately under the basement is a capacious dark cellar, and contains a den, or cell, wherein have been found a human skull and some bones, and the top of a butcher's steel, bearing on it "Benjamin Turtell, July 19, 1787," in silver letters and figures. This cell is about four feet wide, and nine in depth, excavated in the rough earth. It was here that a chimney-sweep, named Jones, who escaped out of Newgate about three years since, was so securely hidden, that, although the house was repeatedly searched by the police, he was never discovered, till it was divulged by one of its inmates, who, incautiously observing that he knew whereabouts Jones was concealed, was taken up, and remanded from time to time as an accessory to his escape; but when at last tired of prison fare and prison discipline, pointed out the place to obtain his own liberty. Jones had his food conveyed to him through a small aperture, by a brick or two being left out next the rafters. It was here, about seven years since, that a sailor was robbed, and afterwards flung naked, through one of the convenient apertures in the wall, into the sewer, for which two men and a woman were transported for fourteen years.

The second engraving shows the principal room on the ground-floor, long occupied as a chandler's shop, by way of lulling suspicion. Immediately behind the counter were trap-doors, one of which was used as a means of escape, and the other opened into a secret depository for stolen articles. Upon the first floor, too, are several hiding-places; and among the contrivances is a spout, the entire extent of the house, through which stolen property could be removed with the greatest dispatch. The means of escape through the roofs, and their communication with the roofs of the adjoining houses, are also very intricate. It is related that, on one occasion, though the premises were surrounded by seven police officers, a thief made his escape by its communications with the adjoining houses, which were all let out to the lowest characters. This house (No. 3) is stated to have been the abode of the notorious Jonathan Wild, but we are not aware of the authority for the statement. There has, however, been found in one of the rooms, an old, rusty, nearly worn-out knife, the blade of which bore the name of "Rippam," and on the handle "J. Wilde." It is of very peculiar make, and evidently of ancient manufacture. These premises, we should add, are approached by

THE LATE DR. DALTON—LYING IN STATE.

West-street, through the gateway of the Red Lion Inn-yard; the adjoining house is old, but has not the fittings of its neighbour.

This extraordinary place has been inspected by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Lonsdale, parties of magistrates, and a crowd of visitors, for some days past. By the active measures of the commissioners for carrying out the improvements in this neighbourhood, possession was obtained of the property, on compensating the freeholders, and the houses have since been taken down.

It is impossible to look upon the place, seated upon the bank of a foul ditch, without reflecting upon the two-fold pestiferous influence of this moral and physical nuisance in the very heart of our metropolis; and it is only in this view, and as a fragment of old London, that the place is entitled to illustration in our columns. The eagerness, however, with which crowds have flocked to this den of infamy, proves that the morbid taste for Jack Sheppardism is not yet extinct. West-street, by the way, debouches into Field-lane, that notorious region of Bandana, admirably described by Mr. Dickens, in his master-piece, "Oliver Twist."

The Fleet, of which we get a glimpse in the first engraving, was formerly navigable to a considerable extent. Along this rapid stream, whence its name, the Danish fleet, under King Sweyn, passed, after burning Southwark, and anchored in triumph beside the spot now known as Bagnigge-wells. Stow tells us, that the river was "of depth and width sufficient, than ten or twelve ships at once, with merchandise, were wont to come to the bridge of Fleet." According to another writer, "the tide flowed as high as Holborn-bridge, where there were five feet of water at the lowest tide, and brought up barges of considerable burthen." Yet, this falls considerably short of vessels sailing up to Bagnigge-wells!

LYING IN STATE, AND FUNERAL OF THE LATE DR. DALTON.

We now supply our readers with a full account of the lying in state and funeral of this distinguished philosopher.

THE LYING IN STATE.

This ceremony took place at the Town-hall, Manchester, on Saturday last. The room was hung for the occasion with black drapery, which covered the whole of the side wall between the two entrances. A semicircular space, extending from one entrance to the other, was enclosed in front of this wall, by a light guard, or rail, covered with black cloth. In the centre of this space, which, at its greatest diameter, extended ten or eleven feet from the wall, was placed a platform (to which there was an ascent by two steps), about eight feet in length, by three feet in breadth, upon which the coffin was placed, with its head to the wall, and its feet towards the centre of the arch formed by the fence. Over the platform and coffin was a handsome square canopy, covered with black drapery, appropriately festooned. The floor of the platform, steps, and enclosed space, was covered with black cloth, and black fluted draperies covered the whole wall. The room was darkened for the occasion; all the windows were closed, so as to exclude the daylight; they were covered with black draperies; and the apartment was lighted by the two gas candelabra, and also by eight wax candles of exceedingly large size, in tall candlesticks, covered with crape, and placed on square pedestals covered with black cloth.

The inner coffin is of strong oak, which is enclosed in a leaden one.

Upon the lid of this lead coffin is soldered a strong copper plate, bearing the following inscription:—

Within this coffin are the mortal remains of John Dalton, D.C.L., L.L.D., F.R.S.S.L. and E. 1 M.I.C.A., member of the Institute of France, President of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, &c. &c.; the illustrious philosopher, who, amongst his many brilliant discoveries, first developed, by the power of his exalted genius and profound scientific investigations, the law of the arrangement of the ultimate atoms of matter, and of their uniting in certain definite proportions, which compose that great variety of bodies existing in nature. He was born at Eaglesfield, in Cumberland, on the 6th day of September, 1766, and died at Manchester, the 27th day of July, 1844, where he had lived 51 years.

The outer coffin is a very handsome one, being constructed of a very beautiful specimen of the finest curled Spanish mahogany, highly polished. It is quite without ornament, other than a projecting lid and base, and handles of frosted brass. Upon the lid is a shield-shaped breast-plate of brass, on which was engraved:—

John Dalton, D.C.L., F.R.S., &c. &c. Born, September 24th, 1766; died, July 27th 1844.

As a proof of the high estimation in which the deceased was held, it might be mentioned that during the first hour and a half, the number of persons entering the room averaged 110 a minute; afterwards the average number varied from 90 to 100 per minute; and, during the eight hours, it has been computed that not fewer than forty thousand persons passed through the room.

THE FUNERAL.

On Monday morning, the preparations for the funeral commenced at an early hour. The sky looked gloomy; and, as the barometer indicated more rain, many parties were, from the apprehension of showers, induced to take their part in the procession in carriages rather than on foot. Fortunately, however, the sun broke forth, and the morning continued fine during the whole of the procession and interment; and the first few drops of rain that fell were about a quarter before two o'clock, some short time after the last rites had terminated. The various societies and public bodies assembled at their own institutions, and proceeded thence at or soon after ten o'clock to the Town Hall, where different rooms were assigned to them, and whence they were directed to their places in the procession.

At twenty minutes after ten o'clock the hearse arrived at the Town Hall, and shortly afterwards the coffin was placed in it. The design on the funeral car was simple, but bold in execution; the cornice was composed of scrolls and arches, supported by massive trusses, resting on a plinth, dividing the sides into three compartments. The centre on one side was occupied by a representation of Death: at the supposed moment of the departure of the spirit, the relatives are gathered round the couch; the clergyman has closed his book; all seem absorbed in grief, whilst the spirit is represented as winging its way to realms of bliss. The six black horses, with black velvet quarter-cloths, led by two grooms in mourning attire, greatly heightened the tout ensemble of this handsome funeral car.

The following was the programme of the procession, as fixed by the committee of management:—

- Police constables.
- Mutes.
- Steam engine and machine makers, millwrights, &c.
- Manchester and Salford Temperance Association.
- Private carriages.
- Gentlemen, not representing any public body, on foot.
- School of Design.
- Portrait Committee.
- Salford Literary and Mechanics' Institution.
- Medical Society.
- Private club of which Dr. Dalton was a member.
- President of the Sheffield Philosophical Society.
- Athenium.
- Geological Society.
- Botanical and Horticultural Society.
- Manchester Mechanics' Institution.
- Royal School of Medicine and Surgery.
- Royal Manchester Institution.
- Medical Officers of the Manchester Lying-in Hospital.
- Natural History Society.
- Manchester Agricultural Society.
- The Society of Friends.
- The Boroughs of Salford, the constables and churchwardens.
- The Mayor and Corporation of Salford.
- The Churchwardens and Salmans of Manchester.
- Boroughs of Manchester.
- The Mayor and Corporation of Manchester.
- Mutes.

drawn by six black horses; all covered with black velvet quarter cloths, with two men in mourning attire, at the leaders' heads. On each side the hearse walked four bearers.

RELATIVES AND MOURNERS.

The mourners, relatives, and immediate friends of the deceased, were contained in six mourning coaches (each drawn by four black horses), and a private carriage, which set out from the late Dr. Dalton's residence, Faulkner-street, and took their place in the procession at the Town Hall.

After the procession moved, the police lining the streets on both sides gradually closed together as they approached the cemetery, at or near the gates of which the greatest pressure was to be apprehended; and, by their numerical force, and the excellent arrangements, they prevented any disorder or confusion. It is right to add, that there was not the slightest attempt, on the part of the dense crowds, to force their way; and nothing could be more marked or gratifying than the quiet, orderly behaviour, and silent and respectful demeanour, of the immense concourse of persons along the whole distance.

On the procession entering the cemetery, the police kept the gates and the outer enclosure, and lined the principal walk; and some of them directed all the carriages into the side walk, where they set down their occupants, and then passed out of the cemetery by the gate at the end of the side walk, in Summer-place. The van of the procession entered the cemetery at a quarter-past twelve. The hearse reached the gates at twenty-five minutes before one o'clock; and it wanted ten minutes of one o'clock when the last carriage entered the cemetery, followed by the police, who then closed the gates.

The train of mourners proceeded up the principal walk in the following order:—

- Four Mutes.
- Mr. J. A. Ramsome.
- Mr. H. H. Bailey.
- Mr. J. A. Ramsome.

THE COFFIN.

Mr. John Moore. The Mayor of Manchester. (Dr. Holmes was to have been one of the pall-bearers; but, we believe, he was at Northampton, attending the annual meeting of the Medical Provincial Association.)

The coffin was borne by eight bearers, four on each side; and they supported it during the forming of the procession within the cemetery.

Mourners:

- Mr. and Mrs. R. Abbott, and Mr. and Mrs. R. Benson, jun.
- Mr. Henry Dalton and Miss Wood.
- Mr. John Robinson and Miss Johns.
- Mr. John Dalton and Miss Hoyle.
- Mr. John Dalton, jun., and Mr. Henry Dalton, jun.
- The Rev. William and Mrs. Johns.
- Mr. Alderman and Mrs. Neild.
- Miss Potts, Mr. Peter Clare, and Miss Taylor.
- Mr. Josh. Compton and Mrs. Ramsome.
- Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Binyon.
- Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Simms.
- Dr. Lyon Playfair and Mrs. J. A. Ramsome.

The procession was met at the west avenue to the platform by the Rev. James Bradley, registrar of the cemetery, who wore a black silk scarf over his white surplice. The reverend gentleman, at eight minutes to one o'clock, breasted the procession to the vault, pronouncing, as he walked, passages from scripture.

Having taken his place in the pulpit, and after the coffin had been placed at the side of the vault,—the mourners, municipal authorities, friends, and the members of the Literary and Philosophical Society, being all grouped around,—the reverend registrar read the following parts of scripture:—Psalms xxxix. xc. and 1st Cor. xv. verse 20 to the end. The coffin having been lowered into the vault, the reverend gentleman read passages in the usual burial service.

The Rev. Mr. Bradley then offered prayer, which was composed by him and uttered on his own responsibility, and from veneration for the character and very extensive usefulness of the deceased.

The funeral service was concluded with the usual benediction, at twenty-four minutes after one o'clock. The parties forming the great bulk of the procession then left the cemetery, after looking at the coffin as placed in the vault. The mourners were the only parties who left by the principal gate. They returned to the residence of the late Dr. Dalton, in Faulkner-street; and during the afternoon, the will and codicil of the deceased were read.

The cemetery was thronged with crowds the whole afternoon; the public being freely admitted to see the vault and coffin. The cemetery was admirably kept by a strong body of the police; but they had little trouble or difficulty in doing so, as, notwithstanding the many thousands of people that were admitted during four hours, there was not the slightest disorderly feeling manifested. All appeared hushed, respectful, and subdued, and passed in and out of the cemetery in the most orderly manner; and throughout the whole day the greatest propriety of behaviour distinguished the immense concourse collected; and, although in places they were densely and inconveniently packed, they everywhere preserved an ample space for the passage of the procession.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1844.

THE virtual, if not actual, end of the Session, of course "makes a pause and leaves a void," in the domestic politics of the week; the legislators have dispersed,—one to his farm, another to his merchandise, and what is called "the Season," is brought to a close. The Opera only outlives by a few nights, the other, and rival house at Westminster, so much frequented by "Her Majesty's servants," and where they enact so many parts, more we fear to their own satisfaction than that of the spectators—the nation. The voices of the Premier and the prima donna cease together, and for the public Peel and Persiani are alike mute; grouse-shooting has begun, and Grisi sings no more; the summer is over, the woods are in the sere and yellow leaf, the beauty of the country is gone, so every body rushes into it, having spent the best months of the year among the artificial amusements of the artificial life of a great capital! Such, however, is custom, that it can reconcile us to anything, however irrational.

Parliament then being "up," as it is called, the attention of the public is more exclusively directed than before to foreign politics. On the improved prospect of affairs between this country and France we have remarked elsewhere, and as the Tahitian question is allowed some respite by the Paris press, since it has been taken in hand by the respective Governments, it may be left to their decision.

A more important article among the items of the foreign intelligence of the week is the abdication of the old Pacha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali. He has retired in favour of his son, Ibrahim, whose Government he will probably direct till consolidated. The succession is, we believe, secured by the treaty between the Pacha, the Porte, and the foreign powers who were parties to the operations in Syria under Sir R. Stopford and Commodore Napier. The history of Mehemet Ali is one of the most curious that modern times has furnished. He raised himself from a low station to the Pacha of Egypt; he then, finding himself embarrassed by the Mamelukes, got rid of them by an act which could not be exceeded for cruelty, treachery, and the determination with which it was conceived and executed. He assembled them at Cairo under a specious pretence, entrapped them into an enclosed space, and then opened a fire on them by which they all perished. In the same manner Sultan Mahmoud destroyed the Janissaries at Constantinople. Mehemet was a man of energy, but not of principle; he was a great improver, but he cared not at what amount of cost and suffering to the wretched inhabitants he emulated the enterprise of European sovereigns. The principles on which he encouraged the trade of Egypt were those of a wholesale monopolist, as he so contrived that all the crops of the country passed through his own hands. For this, however, there might be much said in extenuation; but for the compulsory measures of the Pacha, it is more than probable the fellahs would produce no more than what is barely necessary for their livelihood, leaving the resources of the country to remain undeveloped. He has always displayed a disposition to cherish an alliance with England, and in this respect we may feel some degree of loss from his abdication, since our intercourse with Egypt has been so much increased by the establishment of the over-land route to India; if the ruler of Egypt chose, it would be in his power to render the journey across the Isthmus of Suez difficult if not impossible. Mehemet rose when the fabric of the Turkish empire was tottering, and when the Sovereigns of Europe were too busy among themselves to take much note of the disputes of the Sublime Porte with her rebellious Pachas. The Kingdom of Greece and the Pacha of Egypt have been thus severed from her dominions; and but for the support of Europe, the whole of Turkey would probably be divided into separate independencies, under governors who, as Mehemet Ali did for many years, would pay a nominal homage to the Sultan, but at the same time make themselves too strong to be deposed.

THE state of the country at the period at which Parliament separates is of considerable importance, as it enables men to judge what are likely to be the prospects of the autumn, and the yet more trying season of winter. At the present moment the accounts from the great seats of our manufactures are most satisfactory—activity, employment, and, as a consequence, wages and food, abounding on all sides. The only exception is in the coal works of the north, where the men are idle in consequence of a strike, to which the sooner a termination is put the better for all parties, both masters and men. The intelligence from America shows that there, too, there has been a great revival of commercial energy, and that the States are gradually recovering from the effects of that monetary derangement which told so fatally both on them and on us. The whole Union, we read, "is one vast hive of industry." So complete is the change, that there is even a probability alleged of Pennsylvania resuming the responsibility of her debts. If the refusal of the payment of liabilities deliberately incurred, proceeded only from inability to do so at the time payment was demanded, there would not have been so much ill feeling created as there undoubtedly has been. It was the repudiation of the debt altogether that stirred the bile of the creditors, and the refusal not only to pay them then, but at any future time. Poverty drives many men to play fast and loose with principle, and it may be the same with states; but with the return of prosperity we hope for better things; for a rich delinquent in money matters there can be neither excuse nor pardon. But it is never too late to repent; Pennsylvania may yet liquidate, and Sydney Smith will not have written in vain. The returning prosperity of America must react on us, since she is so large a customer, and in both countries we must hope the revival will be permanent. Another source of congratulation is the promise of an abundant harvest both here and in Ireland, with respect to which the only anxiety is the state of the weather, the rain having lately been more in quantity and of longer continuance than is desirable. With plenty of employment and abundance of food, winter will be disarmed of most of its terrors, and we shall not have the sad spectacle of thousands in compelled idleness watched by a military force, which it was not long ago our misfortune to witness.

ONE of the most interesting public banquets ever given, took place on Wednesday evening at the London Tavern, where the Court of Directors entertained Sir R. Sale, the gallant defender of Jellalabad, on his return from India. Sir W. Nott, his fellow soldier, and "sharer of his toils, his feelings, and his fame," was to have been present, but was prevented by ill-health from attending. Full honour was done, however, to his gallantry, and his name was received as warmly as if he had been present. It has been said that men only appreciate merit when it is crowned by success; this may be the case when merit is of that kind that it is by success only it can indicate its existence. But the qualities that make the hero are often more strikingly developed in difficulties and disaster than in the hour of triumph. The Affghanistan campaign is a sad chapter in our military history, and the retreat by which it was closed was a fatal one. But the defence of Jellalabad, and the operations by which the prisoners were rescued and the character of the British arms redeemed can be contemplated with national pride; they gave a glorious termination to what had been a series of disasters, as the battle of Corunna atoned for the retreat of Sir J. Moore. The proceedings received additional interest from the presence of Lady Sale, who performed so distinguished a part in the campaign.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY AND THE ROYAL PRINCE.

We are highly gratified to state that her Majesty's condition is so satisfactory, that, as will be seen by the following bulletin, the Queen's medical advisers do not think it necessary to issue any more. This most welcome announcement was made on Wednesday morning in these terms:—

"Windor Castle, August 14, 1844, Eight o'clock, A.M.

"The Queen is convalescent.
"The infant Prince continues well.
(Signed) "JAMES CLARK, M.D.
"CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D.
"ROBERT FRASER, M.D.
"Her Majesty's recovery is so far advanced that no more bulletins will be issued."

The Queen, we rejoice to state, is now going on so extremely favourably, as to be enabled to sit up two or three hours during the day.

The inquiries at Windor Castle, respecting her Majesty, during the week, have been very numerous.

Last Saturday the members of the Hebrew persuasion offered up songs and thanksgiving at the Synagogue on the accouchement of her Majesty the Queen, and the happy birth of a Royal Prince.

On Sunday a pastoral letter from the Right Rev. Thomas Griffiths, R.C. Vicar Apostolic of the London district, was publicly read at each of the masses in all the Roman Catholic chapels of London and its vicinity, on account of her Majesty's accouchement.

On Saturday last Prince Albert visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—This morning his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken sittings in the pleasure grounds of the Castle.

MONDAY.—Prince Albert drove out this afternoon in a pony phaeton and pair, and the royal children also were taken to the royal gardens for an airing. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen in the evening, and dined with his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

TUESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Esquerry in waiting, went this morning to inspect the battalion of Scots Fusilier Guards. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice, were taken an airing in the forenoon. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal was also taken in the royal gardens.

WEDNESDAY.—Notwithstanding the extremely unfavourable state of the weather his Royal Highness Prince Albert left the Castle this morning, and proceeded to Virginia Water, to enjoy the sport of angling on the lake. Sir R. Peel arrived at the Castle this afternoon, and had an audience of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. His Royal Highness Prince Albert took a drive in a carriage in the afternoon. The Duchess of Kent dined with his Royal Highness. A very numerous meeting of the town council took place in the council chamber, at the Town-hall, this morning, for the purpose of voting congratulatory addresses to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert on the birth of a prince. The addresses were carried by acclamation.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty still continues advancing towards her usual health and strength, most satisfactorily. The infant Prince also continues exceedingly well. This day, at noon, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Esquerry in waiting, and Mr. G. E. Anson, treasurer to the Prince, left the Castle in a carriage and four, with outriders, for the Slough station, and proceeded thence by the Great Western Railway to town. The Prince returned to the Castle this afternoon, between four and five o'clock. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal and Alice, have been taken their accustomed sittings, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who was attended by Lady Chatterton Dundas, visited her Majesty, and remained at the Castle for upwards of two hours. Dr. Locock took leave of his royal patient this morning, and left the Castle for town. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will dine with the Prince Consort this evening.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.—His Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia arrived at Windor on Tuesday evening, from Quana, by the Princess Alice steamer. The Prince Royal is a remarkably fine-looking personage, and appeared in excellent health, and pleased with the attention paid to him during the passage and on landing. His Royal Highness went on Wednesday to Windsor, to pay a visit to Prince Albert. Prince Albert received his illustrious visitor in the entrance-hall of the Queen's entrance. A déjeuner was served to their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince of Prussia. The latter then paid a visit to the Queen Dowager.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER'S BIRTHDAY.—Tuesday being the anniversary of the birthday of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, some of the public buildings at the west-end of the town were illuminated, and a similar mark of respect was paid by several of her Majesty's tradespeople. The Queen Dowager received complimentary visits, at Bushy-park, from the members of the Royal Family and several members of the nobility.

THE KING OF SAXONY.—His Majesty had an excellent passage from Grafton Pier, near Edinburgh, to Hamburg. Upon landing the King was received by a deputation from the senate and corporation, who escorted his Majesty to the principal hotel, where apartments had been prepared for him.

PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.—The birthday of Prince Albert, which takes place on Monday week, the 26th inst., will be celebrated with great splendour and magnificence at Windor Castle.

Lord Augustus Fitzclarence has arrived on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Krol, at Busine Castle, Aberdeenshire.

The Dowager Lady Holland has gone on a visit to the Earl and Countess Cowper, at Panshanger, Herts, where the Hon. Spencer Cowper, Mr. and Mrs. Milbank, and a select circle are assembled.

Count Neeseldorff has been to Brighton for the benefit of the waters and salt-water baths. The count's son and daughter are at Brighton also.

We regret to hear that Lord Kease is dangerously ill at his seat, near Christchurch, Hampshire.

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE FRENCH TO HER MAJESTY.—It is now stated that Louis Philippe will arrive in England on a visit to her Majesty about the middle of next month. His Majesty will embark, it is expected, at Dieppe, in a French man-of-war, and, accompanied by another 74-gun ship and a small fleet of steamers, will land at Portsmouth. The same apartments (and also some additional state rooms) at the Castle, which were occupied by the King of Prussia, at the christening of the Prince of Wales, and the Emperor of Russia, during the recent war, will be prepared for the reception of the King of the French and his suite. Splendid banquets will take place in St. George's Hall and the Waterloo Chamber, to be followed by state balls and grand evening parties. Preparations have already been commenced at the Roman Catholic chapel, at Clewer, about a mile from Windsor, for the accommodation of his Majesty and suite. There is very little doubt that the christening of the infant Prince will take place during his Majesty's visit to Windsor. Among other celebrations in honour of the King's visit, there will be a grand review in Hyde-park.

MAJORITY OF VICOUNT LEWISHAM.—On Monday last the coming of age of the Viscount Lewisham, eldest son of the Earl of Dartmouth, was celebrated by a splendid dinner, and other demonstrations of joy, in the "Four Acres," at West Bromwich, Staffordshire, a place of land generously given by the noble earl as a place for recreation to the inhabitants of the town.

Lord Saltoun has arrived on a visit to his mother, at Ness Castle, Inverness-shire. The safe return of the noble lord to his native country, from his command in China, was celebrated by bonfires and all the other demonstrations by which the Highlanders are accustomed to express their joy.

The Earl and Countess of Minto and the Ladies Elizabeth and Charlotte Elliot have arrived at Minto-house, Roxburghshire, for the winter. Lord and Lady John Russell are expected to visit the noble earl and countess in the course of next month.

Lady Augusta Somerset, daughter of the Duke of Beaufort, who for some time held the appointment of Lady of the Bedchamber to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, has recently resigned that situation.

DEATH OF LADY HARRIET FRAMPTON.—We have to record the demise of the above highly respected lady, at Merton House, Dorset. The deceased was third daughter of the late, and sister of the present Earl of Rochester, and was born June 17, 1778. In September, 1799, she married Mr. James Frampton, of Merton.

DEATH OF LORD POWERSMOUTH.—It is with pain that we announce the death of Lord Powersmouth, which took place last Sunday at Rochester. Viscount Powersmouth left Canterbury at a late hour on Saturday, accompanied by Lady Powersmouth, the Countess of Roden, and Lady Maria Jocelyn. They proceeded as far as Rochester, where they dined. After dinner his lordship complained of indigestion, medical assistance was immediately procured, but the unfavourable symptoms increased, and at seven o'clock an express was sent off to London to request Lord Roden (his father-in-law) with the painful intelligence. The noble earl immediately left town, and reached Rochester at an early hour on Sunday morning. Viscount Powersmouth, although sinking rapidly at that time, was perfectly sensible, and remained so until the period of his death, which took place between ten and eleven o'clock the same morning. His lordship was in his 30th year, having been born in January, 1815. It will be recollected that he sat in Parliament for the city of Bath in 1839, having defeated Mr. Roebuck.

The Marquis of Chandos, only son of the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, will attain his majority on the 10th of next month, when the event will be celebrated by splendid festivities at Stowe.

A vacancy has been created in the foundation of the Military Knights of Windsor by the decease of Major J. J. Anderson, K.G.H., late of the 10th Foot, who died last week, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. The deceased, who had been engaged in active service, both in the East and West Indies, has been buried at St. George's Chapel with military honours.

DEATH OF LORD HUNTINGFIELD.—Lord Huntingfield died on Saturday last at Haveringham-hall, Suffolk. The deceased, Joshua Vaneck Baron Huntingfield, of Haveringham-hall, in the peerage of Ireland, and a baronet of England, was eldest son of Joshua, first Lord Huntingfield, by Maria, second daughter of Mr. Andrew Thompson. He was born on the 12th of August, 1778, so that his death was within two days of completing his 66th year.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. Henry Ives Bailey, incumbent of Drighlington, near Leeds, has been instituted by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln to the vicarage of North Lopham, near Bedford, Nottinghamshire, on the presentation of the Lord Bishop of Ripon.

OXFORD, August 10.—At the annual visitation and election at Abingdon School, founded by Mr. John Rouse, the following gentlemen of that school were elected Scholars of Pembroke College:—Edward Duncan Hall, son of the late Master of the College; Frederick Goodenough, son of Dr. Goodenough, of Bristol, and founder's kin; Henry Swales, son of M. Swales, Esq., Harrogate-at-law.

The following members of this university have been ordained by the Lord Bishop of Worcester:—Deacons: Thomas Westcott, of Queen's College; Chas. Allen, of Brasenose College. Priests: The Rev. William Lee, of Brasenose College; Rev. John Merry, of Queen's College; Rev. C. C. Adams, of Hertford College; Rev. G. S. Munn, of Trinity College; Rev. C. B. Turner, of Balliol College; Rev. W. G. Bradley, of Brasenose College; Rev. John Bickardike, of St. Edmund Hall; Rev. A. T. Wilmshurst, of Magdalen Hall.

Dr. Pusey preached his first sermon, since his suspension by the Vice-Chancellor, in the parish church of Ifford, on Sunday last, in aid of the funds of the national schools of that parish, from Matthew, xiv. 5—"Wherever shall receive one such little child, in my name, receiveth me."

CONSECRATION OF ST. MARK'S CHURCH, HULL.—On Wednesday, the new church in the Groves, Hull, dedicated to the service of God by the name of Saint Mark, was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Ripon, in behalf of the Archbishop of York.

Sir R. Peel, Bart., has presented the Rev. R. K. Bailey, of New Inn Hall, to the incumbency of the new parish of St. Paul's, Hull.

The beautiful new church at Andover, built at the sole expense of the Rev. Dr. Goldend, was opened on Sunday last for divine service. The remainder of the old church will now be taken down and the tower erected, which, when completed, will give the new building a noble appearance.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—It appears from the report of the select committee of the Lords on the progress of the new House of Parliament, that "instead of the new House of Lords being covered in by Christmas last, as was stated to be practicable by Mr. Barry, in his evidence last year, it is now only in course of erection." Mr. Barry, however, states that if great exertions were made, the House of Lords, the lobbies at each end of it, the corridors connecting the same with the front building, and the libraries, the committee and other rooms belonging to the House of Lords, may be covered in before winter; and the committee, having examined the building, with the clerk of the works and one of the contractors, are of opinion that the whole of these apartments may be prepared for the use of the Lords by April next. The committee do not recommend that any temporary fittings should be prepared, but that all the works connected with the buildings above mentioned should be advanced with the greatest possible speed. It is stated that the House of Commons will not be ready for two or three years.

CABINET COUNCIL.—It is to be presumed that some important and urgent State matters engaged the attention of the Cabinet, for, although several of the Ministers had left town, they returned on Tuesday to attend a Cabinet Council which was held on that day. All the Ministers were present except Sir James Graham.

THE PROPOSED EMBANKMENT OF THE THAMES.—Previous to the adjournment a bill was laid on the table of the House of Commons, to authorize an embankment and terrace on the River Thames and convenient landing places. Nothing of course will be done in the matter till next session. The most interesting clause in the bill is the third, which empowers the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to construct a raised terrace and public roadway or communication from or near Whitehall-place, on or along the bed or shore of the River Thames, on the Middlesex side, from Westminster-bridge to the said intended roadway, at or near the northern pier of the intended Hungerford Suspension-bridge, and also from time to time to alter, widen, divert, and remove all causeways, piles, stairs, barks, or landing-places, on the shore of the river, or projecting from the bank thereof, on the side aforesaid between Westminster-bridge and Chatham-place; and to drive other piles, and construct other causeways, piles, stairs, &c., in such situations and in such manner as they (the Commissioners) shall deem best suited to the convenience of the public.

STATUE OF WILLIAM IV.—Workmen are actively engaged in excavating the ground at the top of King William-street, City, prior to the building of the foundation for the statue of his late Majesty King William IV. that is to adorn this part of the new London bridge approaches. The pedestal is composed of Dutch granite, and the statue is to face the bridge. The statue and pedestal, which will be forty feet high, will be seen from the Surrey side of the water, and will occupy the spot where formerly stood the Old Bear's Head Tavern, immortalized by Shakespeare. The figure of his late Majesty is chiselled out of two immense blocks of granite, the largest weighing thirty, and smallest fifteen tons.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The annual commemoration of Henry Purcell will take place in Westminster Abbey, on Thursday, the 25th instant.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—During the last few days considerable progress has been made in the completion of the New Royal Exchange. Under the embankment of the western façade, the following inscription has been chiselled out of the stone work:—"ANNO ELIZABETHÆ K. XIII. ædificatus: ANNO VICTORIÆ K. VIII. restauratus." Above this, on the front of a pedestal, is the ancient scriptural quotation:—"The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." The framework is now being placed in the tower, for the bells, of which there are fifteen. The enormous painting over the merchants' colonnade is nearly completed, and a great portion of the area is laid down with large flag stones, while the entire structure externally is being cleared and renovated. In a few weeks this magnificent edifice will be divested of the scaffolding, which at present gives it so ungraciously an appearance.

IMPROVEMENTS IN WHITECHAPEL.—For the last few days workmen have been engaged in pulling down the mansion in Essex-street, Whitechapel, which was in the occupation of the Earl of Essex, the favourite of Queen Elizabeth, shortly before his death. It was the east side of Essex-street, and was at the rear of the houses forming that street. It was three stories high. The attic windows were latticed, and the rooms on the first and second floor were about fourteen feet square. At a short distance from the spot, between Ellison-street, Petticoat-lane, and Houndsditch, is another large mansion, which will be demolished for the purpose of having new buildings erected on its site. This was the Palace where Queen Elizabeth occasionally resided. The building, the walls of which are strongly constructed, is four stories high, and some of the windows are latticed. The ceilings of the ground and first floors are ornamented with different devices, coats of arms, figures, &c., among which may be distinguished roses, drums, shells, and the word "Britannia." There are also several Latin inscriptions, scarcely legible. There is a quantity of oak panelling in various parts.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND THE CLOTH-WORKERS COMPANY.—On Wednesday a deputation from the Cloth-workers' Company waited on Sir Robert Peel, at his residence in Privy-gardens, for the purpose of presenting the Right Hon. Baronet with the freedom of that company. Sir Robert Peel received the deputation with much courtesy, and acknowledged the compliment in a few appropriate remarks. It will be recollected that a few days since Sir Robert Peel, with several of his Ministerial colleagues, dined with the Society of Cloth-workers, at their hall, in Mincing-lane.

THE OUTRAGE AT TAHITI.—A meeting of the London Missionary Society was held on Wednesday at Exeter Hall, for the purpose of expressing an opinion upon the recent conduct of the French at Tahiti. Mr. Frederick Smith, the chairman of the society, presided on the occasion. Mr. Peitchard, our Consul, who has lately returned to England, sat on his right hand. The body of the hall was about two-thirds filled. The report, which was read, entered into the history of British connection with Tahiti, from the earliest visits of missionaries down to the present time, and strongly deprecated the conduct of the French in their recent aggressions. Dr. Winter Hamilton, of Leeds, proposed the first resolution, and in doing so, made a very brilliant and exciting speech. He said, "He was not an advocate for war, he hated it; but tyranny and oppression, falsehood and injustice, he hated much more." Dr. Winter Hamilton proceeded to make the following comparison:—"France had at this very day no less than five vessels at Oahu, while this country, the Queen of the seas, had a ketch, only a ketch there! (Great cheering.) There were many present who, doubtless, did not know what that was. He was not much of a nautical man, but he thought he could tell them. (Laughter.) It was a small vessel having one mainmast and a mizen—a fine vessel truly for a country like England, whose flag had braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze—(cheers)—to have at Oahu!" The resolution proposed by Dr. Hamilton was to the effect, that reviewing the history of the missions of this society in Tahiti, and numerous other islands in the South Pacific Ocean, during the past eight-and-forty years, and remembering the former idolatry and degradation of the natives before the blessings of Christianity were communicated to them, and the delightful change which, through the instrumentality of this society, and the favour of Heaven, had crowned their efforts, they regarded the recent events as threatening not only the prosperity but the very existence of these missions. The resolution having been seconded, was unanimously adopted. Many other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and other resolutions of the same character were agreed to, after speeches abounding in angry commentary upon the conduct of France. Before the meeting separated there was a general call for Mr. Peitchard, but Mr. Freeman, the secretary of the society, stated that Mr. Peitchard felt the honour of being called upon, and would have willingly addressed the meeting in obedience to their wish, but as a servant of the Crown, in the hands of the Earl of Aberdeen, he was anxious not to give offence, and perhaps occasion excitement, which might be referred to in other quarters, and become the means of embarrassing the governments of both countries.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths in the metropolis during the week ending Saturday, amounted to 954; the weekly average of the last five summers having been 960, and of the last five years 946. The number of males that died during the last week was 473, and of females 481. Under 15 years of age, 215 died; from 15 and under 60 years, 310; and from 60 upwards, 429.

STATISTICS OF CATS' MEAT AND HORSES' TONGUES.—Mr. Wakley, M.P., on Tuesday, held an inquest at the Elephant and Castle, St. Pancras, on John King, aged sixteen. It appeared in evidence that the deceased was a deputy vendor of cats' meat, and put from his employer 2s. 6d. a week and his breakfast and dinner each day. On Monday last he knocked at the door of a customer in Henry-street, Hampstead-road, and the instant the door was opened he fell into the passage and died. He was subject to fits. The Coroner: His must have been a very laborious occupation, for he must have travelled a long distance with a large quantity of meat, which I understand is sold at a penny a pound, before any profit could be realized.—A Juror: Oh dear no; cats' meat is sold at fourpence and threepence a pound, and he would not have to wheel meat at any time in his barrow than half a hundred weight. A good cat's meat walk is a fine fortune, and the proprietor would not sell his vested interest for a trifle.—The Coroner: I believe it is loaded home-fish they sell. Did any of you ever see them sell for cats' meat boiled horses' tongues?—The Jury: Never.—The Coroner: To be sure you never did. They are salted and dried and sold for cat's tongues.—A Juror: Yes, many of the so-called pickled and cured cat's tongues come from the knacker's yard.—The Coroner: It requires, I am told, a nice palate to distinguish the flavour of an ox's tongue from that of a horse's. I do not see why it should not be so.—A Gentleman: The prejudice against equine flesh is not universal. The celebrated manna of Arise, in the south of France, are principally composed of asses' flesh and condiments. They are considered a great delicacy, easy of digestion, and extremely appetizing. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The heads of the different departments of the Horse Guards, Admiralty, and Ordnance, have recently had repeated communications with the Premier, and there is reason to believe that there will be an extended promotion in the army and navy this autumn.

VISIT OF THE LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY TO THE RUSSIAN FRIGATE AT GRAVESEND.—On Monday the Earl of Haddington, Admiral Sir George Cockburn, Bart., and Vice-Admiral Sir W. Hall Gage embarked on board the Black Eagle steam-yacht, Master-Commander B. Cook, at Woolwich, and proceeded down the river on a visit to the Russian Admiral, in the Aurora frigate, lying off Gravesend. As soon as the Black Eagle was in sight of the Russian, the salons of the frigate, who looked remarkably clean and smart, manned the yards, and when their lordships arrived alongside (exactly at two o'clock) they were received by the admiral and his officers with every demonstration of respect and gratification, a land at the time playing a welcoming air. Their lordships remained on board the Aurora about two hours, and after minutely inspecting the foreigner in every department, partook of an elegant dinner.

THE COLLINGWOOD.—We regret to hear that Captain Henry Eden, who has fitted this ship out, and manned her in such a manner as to excite the admiration of every one, has been obliged, in consequence of continued ill-health, to resign the command. Captain Robert Smart, R.N. (1837), has been appointed the dog captain of Sir George Seymour, on board the Collingwood, in the room of Captain Eden.

The Thunder, 6, Commander Edward Barnett, which has been engaged in surveying on the North American and West India station, has arrived at Portsmouth from Nassau. Having been in commission since July, 1841, she will be paid off.

PORTSMOUTH.—Orders have been given for the immediate equipment of the royal steam-yacht Victoria and Albert. She has accordingly been masted, &c., and received on board her fuel. Her captain, Lord Adolphus FitzClarence, had arrived from Cowes, for the purpose of hastening her outfit; and the yacht will in a few days make a trial cruise. Rumour states the 5th September as the contemplated period of her Majesty's embarkation for autumn cruising.

Sir George Seymour has gone to the Admiralty, to receive his final instructions before proceeding to the Pacific to relieve Rear-Admiral Thomas. Our Commander-in-Chief, Sir C. Rowley, has struck his flag on board the Keystone gunnery-ship, pro tempore, and proceeded on leave to his seat at Windsor, to recruit his health, which still continues much impaired. The Quercus, 110, Captain Martin, fitted out in this harbour, is ordered to be expedited and proceed to Spithead, and when there will receive the flag of Admiral Sir C. Rowley, during the absence of the Saint Vincent 120.

DEATH OF REAR-ADMIRAL GALWAY.—This gallant flag-officer died on Friday last, at an advanced age. He entered the navy on the 19th of February, 1786, and had seen considerable service in his profession.

PROMOTION.—Major Henry B. Errant (1836), of the Devastation steam-ship, to the rank of Lieutenant.

APPOINTMENT.—Lieutenant Horace Bullock (1843), late of the Madagascar, additional to the Penelope, for service on the coast of Africa.

At a general meeting extraordinary of the United Service Club, held on Friday week, Sir George Seymour in the chair, Sir Robert Sale was unanimously elected an honorary member of the club. This is the only instance of a British officer being elected out of the regular course, and the exception to the rule is well worthy of the distinguished club.

The 6th Regiment, on arriving from Manchester, replace the 1st and 2nd depots at Templemore, the former to proceed to Limerick, to replace the 15th Regiment, who go to Cork, and the latter to Clare Castle, to replace the 52nd depot, which moves to Dundalk.

The first division (two companies) of the 6th Regiment will embark at Liverpool for Dublin on the 16th instant.

The 31st Regiment return from Canada next year, and expect to be made Light Infantry on their arrival—their facings to be changed to Lincoln green, the regiment having been raised in Lincolnshire, in 1795, as the Royal Lincoln Volunteers, which title they retain and wear on their appointments.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.—At Gibraltar, the Formidable, 84, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. R. Owen, the commander in chief; Calcutta, 120; Albion, 98; Warspite, 68; Hecia and Vesta, war steamers; and Sydneyham, steam-packet. At Barcelona, the Scout, 18. At Marselha, the Polyphemus, steam-packet. At Malta, the Ceylon, receiving ship, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir L. Curtis, second in command, and superintendent of Malta dockyard; Locust, war steamer; Achéron and Alerte, steam-packets. At Corfu, the Medea, war steamer. At the Piræus of Athens, the Belvidere, 38; L'Aigle, 28; and Virago, war steamer. At Patras, the Oréole, 18. At Andros, the Hebe, surveying vessel; and on her way thither, from Malta, the Bonetta, surveying brigantine. Cruising in the Archipelago, the Savage, 10. At Beyrout, the Tyr, 28, and Snake, 18. At Alexandria, the Geyser, war steamer; and at Constantinople, the Devastation, war steamer.

The 1st division of the 6th Regiment will embark on the 19th inst. at Liverpool, for conveyance to Dublin.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ANOTHER DEATH FROM TIGHT LACING.—On Monday evening an inquest was held before Mr. Bage, at the Coach and Horses, Argyll-street, Broad-street, as to the death of Miss Elizabeth Allen, aged twenty, a pupil of Madame Devy, of No. 75, Lower Grosvenor-street, maniac. Mr. Robert Burt, of No. 6, Bruton-street, surgeon, stated that he was called in to see the deceased on Friday afternoon, about five o'clock, and found her quite dead in the bed. He understood she had gone up to her room at two o'clock, after eating a hearty dinner, she had been found by the side of her bed, and he heard she was subject to fits. He had no doubt the sleeping posture and tight laced stays had brought on congestion of the vessels of the head, which no doubt was the cause of death. He had measured her chest, which was one foot eleven inches round, and on her body it would not meet in the smallest part by two inches. The jury returned a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

MANSLAUGHTER.—On Monday Mr. Baker held an inquest at the London Hospital, on the body of Thomas Spence, aged sixteen, a bricklayer's labourer. The evidence went to show that a person named H. Burton, aged twenty, the keeper of a toll bar, in Thomas-street, Whitechapel, has been for a considerable time past subject to the piques and peevish jokers of the boys in the neighbourhood on account of a curious squint in his eye. On Friday week he was in the toll bar reading, when deceased and another lad, drawing a truck, passed by, and began calling Burton very annoying names. They also threw pieces of rotten apples at him, and poked their truck, which had lime in it, in such a way, that particles of that material flew into Burton's eyes. He then ran after them, and with his fist struck deceased under the right ear, and the latter fell. He got up, however, pulled off his jacket and placed himself in a boxing attitude, and whilst in the act of striking at Burton, he fell insensible on the pavement. Immediately afterwards he was conveyed to that hospital, in which he died in about four hours. The jury, after a long consultation, returned a verdict of "Manslaughter against Henry Burton." He has been committed for trial by the magistrates of Lambeth-street.

SUICIDE WITH A CHISEL.—On Monday afternoon an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, at the Duke of Wellington, Sussex-street, Tottenham-court-road, on the body of William Marshall, aged thirty-seven. The deceased was foreman to Mr. Ernest, builder, of Newman-street. He banished his wife about three months ago, being then left with three young children, and he had since been very desponding. On Monday, about noon, he was missed from the shop, and in the course of two or three hours, on one of the workmen going into some lock premises, wherein is a saw-pit, he discovered deceased lying near the pit, on the ground, writhing in his blood, which had flowed from a frightful wound in his throat, dividing all the principal arteries. He was quite dead, and by his side was a two-and-a-half-inch blade chisel, coated with blood, with which he had committed the act. Verdict, "Temporary Insanity."

DEATH FROM DRINKING BRANDY.—On Tuesday, Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Lord Renshaw, Catherine-street, Lime-house, on the body of Sarah Feiry, aged sixty-seven. From the evidence of Mrs. Mary Ann Calford, 28, Edward-street, Stepney, it appeared that on Sunday last deceased came to take tea with her, and, complaining of being poorly, witness gave her some brandy from a quart bottle full of that liquor. Afterwards, she left deceased alone for some time, and, on her return, she found her on the stairs apparently in a fit. She had her removed to a bedroom, and, thinking a little brandy would revive her, she went to the bottle, and, to her infinite surprise, found it empty. There was no one besides deceased in the house that could have emptied it. A surgeon administered an emetic without effect. Other remedies were applied in vain, and deceased died next day, of peripneumonia, caused by an overdose of brandy. The jury returned a verdict to that effect.

SUICIDE OF A FEMALE SEPTUAGENARIAN.—Mr. Baker held an inquest on Tuesday, at the Royal Standard, Bedford-street, on the body of Mrs. Sarah Williams, aged seventy, a widow lady in affluent circumstances. It appeared from the statement of a child ten years old, the granddaughter of the deceased, that they lived in Arundel-street, and that her aged parent for some time past had been in a very distressed state of mind, and used frequently to say that "it would be a charity to knock her on the head, otherwise she would destroy herself." About half-past six on Friday morning week the witness saw her get up and leave the room, and afterwards return with a sharp-pointed knife, and seat herself on the bedside. She then suddenly stabbed herself several times in the front of the throat, and the witness screaming, a nephew of deceased came and wrangled the knife from her. A surgeon was sent for, who sewed up the wounds, but deceased sank, and died on Monday last. Verdict, "Temporary Insanity."

FIRE AT WHITECHAPEL.—Early on Wednesday morning an alarming fire broke out upon the premises of Mr. W. H. Barton, boot and shoemaker, 3, Church-lane, Whitechapel. Water was speedily obtained, and copiously poured upon the blazing premises, but, notwithstanding the exertions of the firemen, the flames were not extinguished before the shop was burned out, the first floor and warehouse seriously damaged, and other injury done. The loss is covered by insurance.

POSTSCRIPT.

ROYAL SOUTHERN YACHT CLUB REGATTA.

SOUTHAMPTON, Thursday Afternoon.

The annual regatta of the Royal Southern Yacht Club commenced this morning. There were four sailing matches. The first was for a piece of plate, value £25, by yachts not exceeding 45 tons; the second for a piece of plate, value £20, by yachts not exceeding 35 tons; the third for a piece of plate, value £15, by yachts not exceeding 25 tons; and the fourth for a piece of plate, value £12, by yachts not exceeding 15 tons. There were seven vessels entered for the first match, but three only started, viz., the Champion, Elizabeth, and Phantom. The Champion won this match, heading the Phantom, which came in second, by four minutes. The Elizabeth was only thirty seconds behind the Phantom.

The second match was one of the most interesting that has ever taken place on these waters; two of the competing vessels being the Mystery (which won the cup yesterday at Cowes) and her rival the Blue Belle, which has supplanted herself with a new bowsprit, in place of the one she carried away during the gale yesterday. There were six vessels entered, but the following only started:—Blue Belle, Mystery, and Skyl. At six o'clock the Blue Belle and Mystery were heading up the Southampton water, about five miles and a half distant, both of them close together, so much so that it was impossible to tell which had the advantage.

The vessels that started for the third match were the Maceppa, Termagant, Victorine, and Jill. The Maceppa came in first, and the Termagant the second, in the first course.

The vessels that contested the fourth match were the Sea Nymph, Pet, and Don Juan. The course for these vessels was only a buoy little more than half way down the Southampton water—twice round. The Sea Nymph rounded the station-head first, each time, beating upon the last course the Don Juan by two minutes fifty-five seconds, which vessel, consequently, is the winner, as she was allowed six minutes for difference of tonnage.

BIRTH OF A FRENCH PRINCESS.—The Princess de Joinville was safely delivered of a Princess at Neuilly on Tuesday night. Her Royal Highness and the infant at the last account were both going on favourably. It may be noted as a curious coincidence, that the day was the anniversary of the birthday of the Prince de Joinville, who then entered on his 27th year.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF IRELAND.—The national cattle show and exhibition of agricultural implements and articles of Irish manufacture, instituted by the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland, was opened to the public on Wednesday, in the College gardens, Dublin. The number of black cattle exhibited amounted to very nearly 300, and their appearance, speaking generally, was considered by competent judges to be of a first-rate description. In spite of bad weather, the attendance was very numerous.

In the Insolvent Debts Court yesterday, the case of Thomas Henry Horatio Cauty was disposed of. The insolvent's name has been often before the public for his bill dealing transactions with Lord Huntingtower and Colonel Copland. The court decided that the insolvent was entitled to his discharge.

THE ANCIENT HOUSES IN WEST-STARKE, SMITHFIELD.—On Thursday morning, as the labourers were digging out the foundation of the house No. 3, West-street, formerly the Old Red Lion Tavern, they discovered, about a foot below the surface of the soil, two perfect skeletons, in a high state of preservation. They are both males of tall stature, one measuring from head to foot above six feet, and the other only a few inches shorter. The situation in which they lay, and the particular part of the premises where they were discovered, confirm the opinion that they must have become the victims of the lawless wretches who inhabited this den of infamy, and, after being waylaid, robbed, and murdered, thrown through a trap-door, which stood immediately over the spot.

COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—An explosion occurred on Wednesday at the Crabtree colliery, West Bromwich, belonging to Messrs. J. Bagshall and Sons, by which four men were instantly killed, and five others were so severely burned that they are not expected to recover. It is supposed that the "air-luck" had become choked up during the night, and thus caused an accumulation of explosive gas in the colliery beneath.

MURDER AT MANCHESTER.—A woman named Jane Millins, fifty-two years of age, was barbarously murdered between the hours of ten and twelve o'clock on Wednesday morning, in Bradshaw-street, Hulme, Manchester. It appears that she was married, and that her husband is living. In the house with them lodged a machine maker, named George Evans, who for the last few days appeared to be idling and loitering about. On Wednesday morning Millins went to his work and left Evans in bed. When he came back to his dinner at twelve o'clock he found the front door fast, and, upon forcing it open, discovered the dead body of his wife lying upon the floor. She had evidently been dragged from the front room into the kitchen; her head had literally been smashed to pieces with an iron instrument, since found on the premises, and made something in the form of a life-preserver, with a large iron knob at the end. The supposed murderer, Evans, who is a native of Bristol and his connexions are recent working people. A subsequent account states that Evans was apprehended at Liverpool on Thursday, from whence it is supposed he meant to proceed by boat to Wales. Whilst sitting in the police-office, in the middle of the night, the prisoner killed a mouse. He then remarked to those near him, with the utmost levity, that that was another murder he had committed. The whole of the stolen property, with the exception of a watch, was found in the possession of the prisoner. It does not amount in value to more than a few pounds.

A son of the celebrated Mozart has just died at Vienna of cancer in the stomach.

THE BURNS FESTIVAL ON THE BANKS OF THE DOON.

BY MR. AND MRS. S. C. HALL.

The last number of our journal contained an introductory description of the preparations made for "THE FESTIVAL," and a brief account of the several leading matters connected with it. The report was necessarily meagre; inasmuch as it was impossible to render anything like justice to the subject, either by the pencil or the pen, in time for publication in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS of the same week. We propose now to furnish our readers with more minute details of the arrangements made, the progress of the business of the day, and a review of the whole of the proceedings—the task of supplying the explanatory letter-press having been confided to Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, while the pictorial illustrations were undertaken by an accomplished artist of Scotland.

We may commence our report by an expression of regret that but few of the distinguished authors of England were present on the occasion. A number of invitations were issued by a committee charged with the task of arranging the festival; but of the "men of mark," so distinguished, there was not one who crossed the border; and to Scotland was left almost exclusively the honourable duty of rendering homage to the memory of a poet to whom all who speak the language in which he wrote have contracted a debt of large and everlasting gratitude. It is only just to add, that much of the apparent apathy arose from the injudicious plans of the committee; among those who were selected for especial honour were individuals who could not have been expected to undertake a long journey—even for so high a purpose; while two or three of the invited guests were away from England, and will not have heard of the compliment conferred upon them until long after the ceremony had taken place. Neither did there appear to exist a very sanguine expectation that the call would have been responded to, for no preparations had been made to receive distinguished Englishmen—the two galleries set apart, as seats of honour, having been fully occupied by those who were to act their parts in conducting the business of the day. This neglect, indeed, received conclusive evidence from the fact, that in the body of the pavilion were seated several of the most respected men of letters of whom Scotland can boast—men who have not only conferred honour upon their country by great achievements of mind, but whose industrious energies have made useful knowledge acceptable to the humblest classes of all countries.

BURNS' THREE SONS.

We are anxious to offer these preliminary remarks, because we are loth to have it supposed that a cause so strongly exciting, so universal in interest, and so honourable to Scotland, could have failed to produce kindred feelings in England—where the great poet of Scotland, and of mankind, is as much esteemed, beloved, honoured, and valued, as he is in the land that gave him birth.

We turn to a more agreeable theme. The pretty and picturesque little town of Ayr is, as our readers know, within two or three miles of the birth-place of Robert Burns. The neighbouring scenery is immortalised in his verse, and the town itself contains many objects inseparably associated with his name. There is one which, as it seems to have been overlooked by his biographers generally, we thought the artist might select—the small parlour of a little inn at the "town-head"—where the poet spent many an evening during his visits to Ayr. The house bears evident tokens of antiquity; and the little chamber we have pictured contains a rudely carved chimney-piece, a recess in the wall (as usual in Scottish houses of the humble sort), being occupied by a bed.

The house is still a rustic inn, or, as the landlady pleases to have it named, "a tavern;" and the landlady exhibits, with considerable pride, an ancient "quaich" (a drinking-cup of wood), out of which the poet is believed—and perhaps with reason—to have quaffed, many a time and oft, with the friends of his youth.

It was adjacent to this "tavern" that one of the triumphal arches stood on the memorable 6th of August. As our readers will readily imagine, the house was thronged with eager visitors throughout the day.

The day commenced gloomily; and, although it partially cleared up towards its mid-hour, and continued comparatively fine during the more important period of the ceremony, the rain, falling at intervals, considerably diminished the effect of the festival. By ten o'clock, when the whole of the visitors may be supposed to have arrived—the last having been brought by the train from Glasgow (decidedly the worst managed railway in Great Britain)—the number congregated in the streets, and along the roads leading to the pavilion, must have exceeded 30,000.

The several processions—enumerated in our publication of last week—assembled on a large green, west of the town, bordered by the sea, and having in view the Brown Hill of Carrick, the ruined tower of "Greenan," and, in the extreme distance, the fair isle of Arran, while, midway, was the solitary sea-rock, Ailsa Crag, rising like an ill-shaped giant from out old Ocean. The various clubs, societies, and trades having formed in their appointed places, commenced their march through the town, passing over the "Twa Bries"—the "auld" and the "new"—commemorated in, perhaps, the most striking and original of all the poet's compositions; the crowd gathered as it went, "fringing," as it were, the formal line of dressed and decorated sheep-herds and artisans, who, with banners flying, and music playing, seemed as if that day were in reality the happiest as well as the proudest of their lives.

First came a regimental band, then a party of Freemasons, next a body of "Ancient Foresters," preceded by a remarkably fine young fellow dressed as an archer in a suit of Lincoln green. The various trades of shoemakers, tailors, gardeners, &c. &c., followed, and a huge bunch of thistles brought up the rear. The birth-place of Burns is distant about two miles and a half from the town. The procession marched on without stop or stay, until this interesting place was reached. Here it paused a few minutes, and then advanced slowly, lowering their banners, while each man doffed his cap, and bowed reverently, in the direction of the humble, but far-famed cottage. Here all eyes were directed to the group of shepherds, represented in the appended cut.

The cottage in which Robert Burns was born, on the 25th January, 1759, is now, as we have already stated, a public-house. On Tuesday, the 6th, it was the centre of attraction, and very numerous were the names added to the book kept there, to say nothing of the prodigious accessions in the shape of carved initials to the tables, chairs, and window-panes throughout the house.* The interior is, we understand, but little altered. It contains however, no single item of the original furniture. Much of it, nevertheless, remained long after Burns's removal; and was subsequently sold by public roup, when the veritable bed on which the poet was born (and which occupied a recess now used for a similar purpose) was purchased for a few shillings, by a stable-boy, who afterwards obtained for his lucky bargain a sum of twenty guineas.

How little did the exhausted mother, when she thanked God that "a man was born into the world," imagine what a strong, yet tender heart, beat within the shelter of that little bosom—or what fearful throes and lofty imaginings were cradled in the head that rested on her bosom: the future was sealed from her, as it so wisely is from us all; nor is there a tradition that the infant's destiny, so chequered, even in its immortality, was revealed by the "second sight," on which Scottish superstition still relies.

A double chest of drawers divides the bed from a little window, consisting of four panes, through which the capricious sunbeams blinked, and the field without looked gay: the window is the same through which the infant first looked out upon the nature he so loved. There is the usual comfortable fireplace, which has so antique an appearance, that it is probably coeval with the poet; and on the same side a new room has been added, of a much more ambitious character than the other portions of the dwelling. The second room, however, of the original cottage, still remains, and in its centre stands a table hacked and blotted (as we have intimated) into rude mosaic, by the desire people have to connect their names with immortality. There is believed to be nothing here that the poet either touched or looked upon; still the walls could tell much of joys and sorrows; the that shook them to their foundation; the wild, enthusiastic fever—the inspiration, and deep depression—of the poet's existence.

The landlady, in her snow white cap, was outrageously busy in setting her house in order, telling how "lairds and bra laddys" thought much of touching "the wall," in which the bed was set, and how the people screamed and "stampit" when they got hold o' the "great professor fra Edinboro"—such a bra' man—and carried him into the house, in which he could hardly stand straight up; and how glad they were to shake hands with him, and to look in his face—as glad as if he had been one of the poet's sons.

* From the information of Gilbert Burns, Dr. Currie gave the following account of the first settlement of the poet's father upon the place. It was while in the service of Mr. Crawford, of Doonside, that William Burns (so he spelt his name) "being desirous of settling in life, took a perpetual lease of seven acres of land from Dr. Campbell, physician in Ayr, with the view of commencing nurseryman and public gardener, and, having built a house upon it with his own hands, he married, in December, 1757, Agnes Brown, the mother of our poet. Before William Burns had made much progress in preparing his nursery, he was withdrawn from that undertaking by Mr. Ferguson, who purchased the estate of Doonside, in the immediate neighbourhood, and engaged him as his gardener and overseer; and this was his situation when our poet was born. Though in the service of Mr. Ferguson, he lived in his own house, his wife managing her family and little dairy, which consisted of two, sometimes of three, milk cows; and this state of unambitious content continued till the year 1766." Two additions have been since made to the building—a second cottage was added to the south gable, and a barn at the opposite extremity.

The procession—which we followed very closely—next reached the old kirk-yard of Alloway, scene of the famous poem of "Tam o' Shanter," and of which we have already given a brief description. Here the bell rang out a dismal chimie, calling up the several associations connected with the venerable structure.*

Passing this object of universal attraction, the throng reached the little cottage of Mr. Auld (Doonbrae), the early patron of graceful Thomson, the self-taught sculptor; whose rude carvings of Tam o' Shanter and Souter Johnny having been exhibited in nearly every city and town of Great Britain, are now appropriately placed in a small I

* The churchyard contains several old monuments, of a very humble description, including one to William Burnes, a renewal of the original stone, which had been demolished and carried away in fragments. The churchyard of Alloway has now become fashionable with the dead as well as the living. Its little area is absolutely crowded with modern monuments, referring to persons, many of whom have been brought from considerable distances to take their rest in this doubly consecrated ground. Among these is one to the memory of a person named Tyrie, who, visiting the spot some years ago, happened to express a wish that he might be laid in Alloway church-yard, and, as fate would have it, was interred in the spot he had pointed out within a fortnight. Nor is this all; for even the neighbouring gentry are now contending for departments in this field of the departed, and it is probable that the elegant mansions of rank and wealth will here soon be jostling the stunted obelisks of humble worth and pitiless poverty.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

The opera season has now reached its close, and bright and beautiful have been the stars which either paid a transient visit, or lingered for some time in its horizon. As in the preceding year, it commenced last March with Donizetti's opera of "Adelia"—the charming Persian sustaining the principal part, and a new singer (Corelli) that of Oliver. The ballet was "La Esmeralda," in which Carlotta Gristi was delightful, as was also a débütante, Mlle. Frasi, of whom we have not heard much since. On the 19th of the same month Herold's struggling opera of "Zampa" was produced, with a Signor Felice as the hero, who made a dead failure of it. After this came Rossini's "Cenerentola," in which Mlle. Pavanti created a sensation. On Tuesday, April the 9th, the full force of the troupe appeared in Bellini's delightful opera of "I Puritani," which, with nearly its accustomed cast, went off as brilliantly as ever. Rubini certainly was not the Ezio, but we hardly missed him in the presence of Mario. To this succeeded a revival of "Zampa," in which Fornasari contrived to give some interest to a part which had failed in many other hands; but we fear that, with all its acknowledged excellence, the opera will never be popular. We cannot go through a dull reprint of play bills or affiches, but must request our readers to turn back to our pages, where everything worthy of notice can be found. We must not, however, in common gallantry and politeness, forget to notice one or two other matters, and make a few remarks.

In the ballet department Cerito was nightly crowned with flowers, as she made her almost supernatural appearance in "Ondine." Then came the matchless Lablache in "Don Pasquale;" but, despite his great powers, the opera seemed to be supported by its previous fame more than the applause it received in this country. Perhaps its production at the Princess's Theatre deprived it of its novelty in some degree. The ballet of "La Vivandière," with the introduced Redowa Polka, by the charming Cerito—the doubly digital man St. Leon (who plays the violin as well as he dances), next appeared for our wonder and delight. After this, public appetite was content with ordinary dishes for some time, when the announcement of Costa's "Don Carlos" gave it a new zest for change, which, after all, did not seem to be relished much being tasted. As to our own opinions of the merits of the opera we have already given them. The goddess Elsie has been nightly charming us in conjunction with Cerito, St. Leon, and Perrot; and Moriani, although he might have said on his first night's performance, "Mi venisse la voce" with some truth, has no claims now to anything but our unqualified applause. The public is an Apician in its taste, and we fear that Mr. Lumley, eager and liberal as he is to gratify it, will find it a difficult thing to set forth better fare than he has hitherto afforded. But we will not presume to set bounds to his active and generous speculation.

Ricci's opera of "Corrado di Altamura" is a most sorry affair. On Thursday night last, for the charming Persian's benefit, such was the press of the multitude, that even the privileged press could scarcely obtain admission. We do not recollect ever to have seen a greater crowd of disappointed. The bill of fare was rich, and raised the appetite to the highest anticipation of luxurious enjoyment; but the affiche, which promised so many good things, turned out to be a corte, not monche, but filled up and pre-occupied by some earlier visitors or customers. It was a hungry thing to look at it and not be allowed to participate in it. The opera season closes to-night.

THE LONDON ART-UNION.—DRAWING OF THE PRIZES.

On Tuesday the annual meeting of the subscribers to the Art-Union of London took place at Drury-lane Theatre, the Duke of Cambridge in the chair. His Royal Highness, after alluding to the exertions made by Lord Montevale and Mr. Wyse to legislate such institutions, congratulated the subscribers upon the fact that the number of subscribers to the Art-Union of London had doubled in two years. Their number was now 14,000. Mr. Godwin, the secretary, then read the report. The first portion of it detailed the steps which had been taken by the committee when the question of the illegality of Art-Unions was first mooted, until the enactment of the act of Parliament to legislate them. The report thus proceeds:—

"The subscription for the present year amounts to the sum of £14,848 1s., being an increase of £2,513 1s. over that of last year. There are now 571 gentlemen acting as foreign honorary secretaries, and it is hoped that the list will be still further increased. In America, especially, your committee are most anxious to increase their relations; and they have accepted with pleasure friendly offers of co-operation from the officers of a Society for the Promotion of the Fine Arts in the United States, named 'The American Art-Union.' The number of works of art selected by the prizeholders last year was 236, including two pieces of sculpture. They were exhibited for three weeks to the subscribers and their friends in the Suffolk-street Gallery, by permission of the Society of British Artists, and for one week gratuitously to the public without any limitation or restriction. It is estimated that in the whole nearly 200,000 persons visited this exhibition, and that, too, without the occurrence of any accident; another gratifying proof, if it were needed, of the eagerness of the public to avail themselves of any opportunity to examine works of art which may be afforded them, and of the perfect safety with which, under proper supervision, this privilege may be accorded."

The other most interesting parts of the report we subjoin:—
"The engraving after Mr. Clarkson Standfield, R.A., by Mr. Goodall, 'The Castle of Iechia,' due to the subscribers of the current year (1844), in addition to the outlines, is in a forward state. The fact that two such works as these (either of which, under ordinary circumstances, would cost a guinea or more) can be produced for every subscriber of that sum, and still leave the greater part of the aggregate amount for the purchase of paintings and sculpture, affords an extraordinary instance of the results of co-operation. Every subscriber for 1843 will receive an impression of a line engraving, after Mr. Mansueti, R.A., by Mr. G. T. Dox, 'The Convent,' which is far advanced towards completion. In consequence of the very successful result of the first competition of designs in outline, the advertisement was repeated. In reply, 32 sets of designs of various degrees of merit were received, from which the committee selected, as most deserving of the premium offered, a series illustrative of Thomson's 'Castle of Iechia,' by Mr. William Rimer. For a future year the committee have arranged to engrave 'Jephtha's Daughter,' painted by Mr. O'Neil, and selected by Mr. Cyrus Legg, a prizeholder of 1843; and have placed it in the hands of Mr. Peter Lightfoot for that purpose."

"In order to insure a good subject for engraving hereafter, and to induce the production of a superior work of art, your committee see about to offer the sum of £500, under conditions which will be advertised for an original picture illustrative of English history."

"The bronze from Flaxman's 'Michael and Satan,' and Sir R. Westmacott's 'Nymph and Child,' executed very satisfactorily by Mr. Edward Wynn and Mr. Woodington, have been distributed to the prizeholders. For the present year the committee have caused a bust of Hebe, by Mr. A. Galtley, selected by Miss Aeches, a prizeholder in the last distribution, to be put into bronze by Mr. Ratfield. Many of the casts are already finished."

"The account of receipts and disbursements for the current year showed that the sum set apart for engraving 'The Castle of Iechia' was £1899 7s. 9d.; for the outlines, £1400; for bronze, £400; for expenses, £2103 13s. 3d.; for pictures, &c., £8350. It is satisfactory to observe that the expenses are little more than they were last year, notwithstanding the increased number of subscribers and the expenses caused by the late proceedings of Government. The amount set apart, according to the foregoing statement, for the purchase of works of art, viz., £6098, will be allotted as follows:—40 works of art of the value of £10 each, £400; 35 works of art of the value of £15 each, £525; 45 works of art of the value of £20 each, £900; 35 works of art of the value of £25 each, £875; 35 works of art of the value of £30 each, £1050; 14 works of art of the value of £40 each, £560; 12 works of art of the value of £50 each, £600; 8 works of art of the value of £60 each, £480; six works of set of the value of £80 each, £480; six works of set of the value of £100 each, £600; two works of set of the value of £150 each, £300; two works of set of the value of £200 each, £400; one work of set of the value of £300; one work of set of the value of £400. To these are to be added 30 bronze of the 'Bust of Hebe,' making in the whole, 288 works of art."

The report concluded with some sensible remarks upon the importance of advancing the fine arts.

The Duke of Cambridge then introduced Mr. Wyse, M.P., who was received with very great applause. The hon. gent., after referring to the recent proceedings, made an eloquent appeal on behalf of the arts.

"There were some who held to the opinion that the tendency of the arts was a demoralising tendency. He had heard that opinion advanced in the House of Commons. Those who held it had, he believed, arrived at it from an inadequate conception of what art really was. Why, art, after all, was but another language. (Hear, hear.) It was the mode of giving expression to the feelings of a sound mind. If the language of words was employed to give expression to the reason, so the language of the arts might be said to be employed to give expression to the imagination. (Repeated cheers.) Music, sculpture, and painting, were only different idioms of the same tongue, and if no one would refuse the language of our own nation, or the language of Rome or of Greece, because some inhuman writer had employed those languages to express impure sentiments, so no one should reject art, which might be employed for a high moral purpose, merely because some painter or sculptor had used it to express the baser ideas of an impure imagination. (Loud and repeated cheers.) But, even admitting that art had now and then been perverted, how often had it been employed to exalt high and honourable sentiment! Let no one tell him that he was not mentally elevated by a contemplation of the wonderful creations of a Michael Angelo or a Rubens!"

Mr. Wyse then alluded to the knowledge and love of the Fine Arts possessed by her Most Gracious Majesty. He said—

"As one of the Royal Commissioners of the Fine Arts, he (Mr. Wyse) could safely assert, that more enthusiasm joined with a more excellent discrimination he had never witnessed than in our beloved Queen. (Hear, hear.) But it was not to the throne or the aristocracy alone that he looked at this epoch, for the encouragement of art; unless the people constituted the pedestal of the pyramid it would be in vain to hope that it would stand. Happily, however, there was every reason to believe that the arts were daily becoming more and more appreciated."

The report was unanimously adopted, and thanks were voted to Lord Montevale, which the noble lord acknowledged. The Duke of Cambridge being compelled to retire, Lord Montevale took the chair, and the drawing of the prizes commenced. The number of prizes was 383. It was, as usual, performed by two young ladies, one of whom drew from a wheel the numbers corresponding to the tickets, while the other drew from another wheel the prizes appertaining to the numbers.

The first prize drawn was one of £750 in favour of Mr. Colling, of Dartford. This was followed by one of £325 in favour of Mr. Skipton, of Nova Scotia. The next prize drawn was one of £100 in favour of Mr. C. K. Burns, of Port Phillip, Australia. The singularity of these two last prizes, awarded to persons dwelling on such opposite points of the earth, succeeding each so immediately, created a sensation of surprise, and the announcement was loudly applauded.

The following prizes were among those of greatest value and interest that were awarded:—

PAIR OF £200.—Miss G. Hemmington, near Lonsdale.
PAIR OF £100.—Mr. E. M. George, 31, Chancery.
PAIR OF £100.—Mr. W. Sanders, Barton upon Trent; and Mr. J. Flamm, Tavistock.
PAIR OF £150.—Mr. R. Hazlett, Hounslow; and Blentley.
PAIR OF £100.—Mr. W. Collingwood, Liverpool; Mr. Watlington, Bedford-place; Mrs. M. Queen, Tottenham-court-road; Mr. Joseph Chancellor, Bolton; Mr. Maberly, of the Post-office, Dublin.
PAIR OF £50.—Mr. T. Rawlings, of Southbridge.
PAIR OF £50.—Mr. E. Pritchard, of Montgomeryshire; Mr. E. Hawkins, F.R.S.
PAIR OF £30.—The Countess of Arundel, and Surrey; the Countess of March.
PAIR OF £25.—The Earl of March.
PAIR OF £20.—Mr. T. C. Foster, of the Middle Temple.
PAIR OF £10.—Karl Grey.

Thanks having been voted by acclamation to the noble chairman, the meeting separated.

DINNER TO THE HEROES OF AFGHANISTAN.

A splendid dinner was given on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, by the Directors of the East India Company, in honour of Sir W. Nott and Sir R. Sale. Sir W. Nott, however, was unfortunately unable to attend in consequence of indisposition.

The Chairman of the Hon. Company (Mr. Sheppards) was supported on the right by Sir Robert Sale, the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Eliot, Sir Robert Peel, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir George Murray, Sir E. Kestell, Mr. Wooding, and Mr. Astell; and on the left by the Deputy Chairman of the Hon. East India Company, the Earl of Ripon, the Earl of Dalhousie, Lord G. Somerset, the Hon. W. Saring, Sir T. Fremantle, the Lord Mayor, Sir J. Macdonald, Sir John Pelly, Sir R. Campbell, Mr. Sheriff Maugrove, and Mr. Sheriff Moon. The company numbered about 150.

At each corner of the dining-room, behind the Chairman, and at the opposite extremity of the hall, were ranged sideboards of massive gold and silver-gilt plate, consisting of gigantic, costly, and elaborately-chased vases, shields, and cups. On the principal cross table, and immediately before the Chairman, was placed a magnificent plateau; while on the three longitudinal tables were displayed numerous gilt candelabras, vases, goblets, and a profusion of other plate, which gave to the entertainment an extremely rich, if not dazzling character.

The gallery at the lower end of the room was set apart on one side for the ladies, among whom were Lady Sale and her daughters, Mrs. Strutt, with Lady Nott and the Misses Nott, who were most loudly cheered on their entrance.

After the accustomed loyal toasts, the Chairman proposed "Sir George Murray," who returned thanks in appropriate terms.

Leutenant Peel acknowledged the toast of the Navy.

After the health of Sir W. Nott had been given with all the honours, the Chairman proposed "Sir Robert Sale," which was given with great enthusiasm.

Sir R. Sale, in acknowledging the toast, said, "It has been my fortune to have served in India for many years, and I can safely vouch that I have had the honour of commanding the troops of the East India Company to my entire satisfaction. (Cheers.) Many instances I could mention in which no body of Europeans in the world could have shown more devotedness and attachment to their commanders than the native Sepoy troops. (Cheers.) Jellalabad has been allotted to me—I may say that a finer corps there is not in the world than that in garrison under Colonel Montebell. I consider them all as brothers—a more jovial and jolly set I never met with. (Loud cheers and laughter.) They all very well knew that we were in jeopardy, but their determination was, that if the enemy came it should cost them dearly." (Loud cheers.)

The Chairman next proposed the "Health of Sir Robert Peel and her Majesty's Government."

The toast was drunk with three times three.

The toast was drunk with three times three. Sir R. Peel returned thanks, and in the course of his speech said, "I confess I do rejoice, and while I live I shall never forget, that I have been present on this occasion, when Sir Robert Sale has received these demonstrations of public gratitude in the presence of that heroic lady (loud cheers) who has shed a double lustre on the name of Sale. (Repeated cheers.) We are not merely returning our grateful acknowledgments to distinguished men, but we are returning to the soldiers and sailors of this country that if they should be placed in situations such as those which Sir W. Nott and Sir R. Sale have occupied, if they should be charged with such grievous responsibilities as have fallen on them—however distant the scene of action, however comparatively small the army they may command, whether it be at Waterloo, or amid the shattered walls of Jellalabad—if British officers will do their duty—if they will make such sacrifices as those which were made by these gallant men, at the distance of 3000 miles, there are millions of British hearts beating in sympathy with them, and millions of British tongues which, on their return to their native country, will re-echo with their grateful acknowledgments. (Loud and continued cheering.)

The evening afforded the utmost gratification to all present.

THE MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

(Concluded from our last.)

AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE is, in its "leader," "St. James's, or the Court of Queen Anne"—a more life-like than usual; but, the period is miserably unattractive; the incidents, this month, are Sacher's Trial, a sorry scene for the novelist; the consequent riots, fires, and dispersion of the rioters, are more in the Editor's vein: here is a specimen:—"The captain gave the word to proceed to Blackfriars at once; and, putting spurs to their horses, the troop dashed through Temple Bar, and so along Fleet-street. As they came in sight of the little bridge which then crossed Fleet-ditch, a bright flame suddenly sprang up, increasing each moment in volume and brilliancy, and revealing, as they drew nearer, a great pile of burning benches, pews, and other matters. Behind this pile was ranged a mighty rabble, rising to a considerable distance, both on the right and the left, the opposite bank of the ditch. The ruddy light of the fire glimmered on the arms of the rioters, and showed the extent of their numbers. It was also reflected on the black and inert waters of the stream at their feet, disclosing here and there a lighter, or other bark, or falling upon the picturesque outline of some old building." Yet the incidents of this highly wrought chapter are but the striking of some dozen troops into the mud of Fleet-ditch, and the fall of Freddy, the coachman, into the same happy haven! The paper on "The Writings of Douglas Jerrold" evinces higher critical acumen than we are wont to recognize in this miscellany. A tale of Lynch Law is much too long for its merit; and a string of "Excursions and Passing Occurrences" has the same fault. The remaining papers, with the exception of Mr. Peak's "Prussian Paddy Grenadier," do not rise above mediocrity: that of Mrs. La Chaise, describing the monuments as "grand and beautiful," the "situation sweet," and the "grounds graceful," is laughably dull. We should except from condemnation the continuation of Leigh Hunt's "Jae of Honey from Mount Hybla," as usual, seeming with classic thoughts and poetic imagery.

THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE is, this month, nearly as bright as either of its competitors; but, why should its massive columns be crammed with tales of the French Revolution, reminiscences of Old London, and eight pages on Whitebait, with stock quotations of the latter paper, is the Miscellaneous may have suggested it. "The Birth of Venus," by Agassiz, is another staple magazine commodity. The Editor's contribution, "Lizzy's Black Hair," is a gentle reproach of one of the vanities of our nature. A fond mother will not allow her child's black hair to be cut off, or qualify her for admission to the parish school; she, consequently, does not go to school at all, and remains "ignorant as the pig."

"Miserable vanity! thinks the reader, that in such condition sacrifices mental hopes to outward ornament! Alas, good Sir, 'tis very well to shake the head in adro of pauper Lizzy Dock, and her foolish mother, but how many are there, with all the world's comforts about them, who, in some way or other, do not sacrifice an inward excellence for some sort of 'black hair'?"

The lovers of light reading may sympathize with "The Adventures of a Soap-sop," in which there is a sort of dramatic interest. The paper, "Trafalgar-square; a Glance at the Past and Present," is the reverse of the situation, and square; is a strange jumble of antiquarian scraps and politico-economical speculation: some of the writer's associations are very dull, as when he tells us of a spot near an old burial-ground being used, after the exhumation of the bodies, "for the exhibition of the skeleton of the great whale, which must be well remembered." Miss Parker's "Edina, a Fairy Fanny," may, probably, lend wings to the graver matter of the number. There is an amusing notice of Mr. Twiss's "Life of Lord Eldon;" we should like to see more of the topics of the day in this miscellany. The plate illustration—"The Mayor and Corporation of Swinstead waiting upon Mr. Bagges," is a comic etching, by Leech.

THE GENTLEMAN is as rich as ever with origins and antiquities, variety and research. Only think of twenty pages of "Conjectured Emendations on the Text of Shakespeare." We agree with the author, that when "the use of original genius has passed, that of criticism begins;" though, for criticism, we are inclined to read "trifling." There is a serviceable piece of gossip about the Organs of the London Churches; and in the Obituary, the Memoir of Mr. Beckford is circumstantially copious. The Utilitarian reader will smile at a Correspondent's statement that the origin of the name of Tooke is not Danish or Saxon, but British or Celtic Tog, a leader or commander; whence also came the Togodunnus, the brother of Caractacus.

THE METROPOLITAN contains its usual medium of tales and novellities, by Mrs. Crawford, Mrs. Abby, &c.; with whom recent French history appears to be a favourite phase. "A Visit to Sark," one of the Channel Islands, will gratify the tourist who is not "used up." The gravest paper in the number is a short treatise on "The Instinct of Animals."

Tail opens with a rattling continuation of "Bon Gaudier and his Friends," a gay story for some of the great lyrists' gems, translated by Young Scotland. "The Spirit of Anthonia" is a very broad piece of quizzing; but the best paper is "The Rose of Tiverton," an analysis of the new Swedish novel by Emilia Carlin, a formidable rival to her countrywomen, Fredrika Bremer. The number is unusually poetical.

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY continues its tale of 1700, "The Nevilles of Garretstown," in four stirring chapters. There is a clever analysis of the Life and Writings of the late William Taylor, of Norwich; a capital bird's-eye view of Australia; and a sort of postscript article on Sir Robert Peel and the Conservative party. The number is somewhat too matter-of-fact; but its gravity is lightened by the conclusion of Mr. James's "Arrah Neil;" or, Times of Old.

A TREATISE ON THE STEAM ENGINE, by the Artizan Club (Nos. 1 and 2) has been undertaken to enable every man of ordinary intelligence and assiduity, however humble his means, to become thoroughly acquainted with the steam-engine in all its phases. The authors promise data, from which single practical rules will be constructed for determining the proper dimensions of every part of every kind of engine, so that when the size of the cylinder and pressure on the piston are given the right dimensions of every other part may be immediately computed. A work thus capable of supplying the wants of practical men has long been wanted; and, from the known repute of the "Artizan Club," we opine the present work will be satisfactorily executed: it will be completed in 20 parts, copiously illustrated, and will be obtainable for as many shillings.

MAXWELL'S HISTORY OF THE IRISH REBELLION, Part VIII., is occupied with the Battle of Castlesbar, and the French occupation, the suppression of the insurrection, military exercises, &c. An interesting document is commenced—"The Diary of the Bishop of Kilika," detailing the transactions of the French army and their rebel associates, during their occupation of Kilika—this having been placed at the disposal of the author by a relative of the gentleman to whom the letters were originally addressed.

STYVENSON SOUND, Part X. The recall of the hero to London, and a trial, the plea Non-est, damages £2000, are the main incidents.

THE ART-UNION reports the distributions and exhibitions of the past month, and has a pleasant page or two of varieties. In an extra number (70), a "Report on the Exposition of the Industrial Arts at Paris," illustrated with several woodcuts, which, when completed, will be a valuable record of this great assemblage of French ingenuity.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Venetian journals notice the discovery of a native dwarf, of very extraordinary dimensions and unusual mental qualifications. The new genius is named Pietro Bianchi, and is a native of Istria, being born a few miles from the celebrated cape of that name, and in a district which is somewhat famous for giving birth to dwarfs, for more than one has been noticed of extraordinary restricted growth within the last few years. He is about 21 years of age, and only 2 feet 10 inches high, and weighs less than 25 pounds. He is well-proportioned, and agreeable in face and figure, and devoid of all deformities which generally distinguish dwarfs; the form of his head is particularly fine, and the development of his mind is in conformity with his age. He has learned several languages with great ease, and speaks fluently, besides his native tongue, the Illyrian, the Italian, German, and Croatian. He is shortly to visit the European cities.

Ministers have determined upon removing the seat of Government in the Falkland Islands, from Port Louis to Port William.

The Prince de Joinville was 25 years of age on Wednesday last, having been born at Neuilly on the 14th of August, 1818. He will be promoted to the rank of Vice Admiral on his return from the expedition against Morocco.

The Paris Papers say that the Comet discovered by M. Mauryan may now be seen with the naked eye in the direction of the east. It is well-known to be about one foot long, and 1½ light is rather dim. Round the comet is a circle similar to that which surrounds the moon when the weather is about to change.

The Skylark, 10, Commander Gooch, on the 28th May last, delivered to the Black King, Rye and Ambo, the presents from the English Government, in the Calabar River, up which she had proceeded for more than 100 miles. The presents consisted of a complete Court dress of morocco velvet, with silver lace of four inches width, gold-laced cocked hats, scarlet trousers, with gold lace, and shoes with silver buckles. King Ambo gave a feast on the occasion, and introduced his 23 wives, some young and some old, who danced before our officers and men.

The celebrated tenor Duprez, who had purchased from M. Aguado, formerly banker to the Court of Spain, an hotel in the Rue Turgot (Paris), valued at from 300,000 to 500,000, for a certain sum of money and a life annuity of 25,000 fr., has, by the death of the annuitant, become possessed of the property after the payment of only one or two years' annuity.

An instance of the evil of too precipitate interment occurred a few days ago at Arles (France). After the burial of a child, the sexton, who remained alone to finish filling up of the grave, heard a cry issue from the coffin. He immediately took it up, and without opening it, carried it to the house of the mother. The lid being taken off, the poor child was found alive, and is now completely recovered. Not long ago, in making a grave in the same cemetery, a coffin was by chance broken into, and it was found that the occupant had revived after burial, and had gnawed the flesh of both the wrists before life was finally extinguished.

M. Baudin, for many years director of the Academie de Musique of Douai, whilst waiting a few days since to attend the marriage of his daughter, suddenly expired. He was sitting in his chair, when some one handed him his gloves, when he exclaimed in a faint voice, "I want nothing more, I am dying!" and drooping his head instantly expired.

The journey from London to Brussels can now be accomplished regularly in one day. The arrangements for this great object commenced on Sunday last. The train left London for Dover at half-past 5 a.m., arrived at Dover at 9; the embarkation on board the Princess Mary, belonging to the Dover Railway Company, took place immediately, and the voyage to Ostend was performed in little more than four hours and a half. The passengers left Ostend at a quarter-past 4 o'clock, and arrived in Brussels at a quarter-past 9 the same evening, the whole distance (238 miles) having been accomplished in 15½ hours. The stoppage in Ostend exceeded two hours.

A letter from Geneva gives some details of a renewed attempt of Messrs. Bravais and Martins to ascend to the summit of Mont Blanc. On the 2nd instant, they set out, and reached the Grands Mulets. A second party followed them, composed of three young Englishmen and a Hungarian; they all slept there that night; and on the 3rd, the latter party set out first, and reached half way from their sleeping-place to the summit, but were then compelled to return, from fatigue and fear of bad weather. The servant of the Hungarian, however, prevailed on two of the guides to go on with him, and they all three reached the top. They remained there only ten minutes, being alarmed by a dense cloud floating below them. The descent was very dangerous, the cloud having condensed into a coat of thick snow. Messrs. Bravais and Martins remained below, where they slept, and if the whole of the two parties had not returned immediately, they would have been in great danger of perishing. They returned in the evening to Chamouni.

The Thomas Bennett, which sailed from Liverpool for Charleston on the 3d inst., returned to that port on Wednesday morning in consequence of the master, Capt. Haley, having been murdered on the 9th inst., in the Bay of Biscay, by the cook. The man was landed on the vessel's arrival, and conveyed to Bridwell.

On the turn of the tide, on Tuesday, the Russian frigate Aurora weighed anchor and left Grasse, where she has been lying for nearly a month, on her return to St. Petersburg with despatches for the Emperor.

A grand dinner was given, on the 1st inst., by the Prince de Joinville, on board the Suffren, to the commanders of the different foreign ships then in the roadstead at Targier. There were also among the guests M. de Nyon, Consul-General of France; M. Jorrel, Consul at Mogadore; and M. Martineau, the Neapolitan Consul, who, after the departure of M. de Nyon, took charge of the French Consulate.

THE BURNS' FESTIVAL ON THE BANKS OF DOON.

lodge at the foot of the monument to the memory of Burns. Mr. Auld's cottage, with its beautifully laid-out grounds, its shell houses, miniature lakes, and shaded walks, form a feature of the vicinity. The excellent owner has exhibited considerable taste in the arrangement of his tir- demesse; and is the guardian of the several sacred things about him; protecting the old grave-yard, the monument, and the garden that surrounds, from the encroachments of interlopers and the more perilous cupidity of "curious" strangers. Immediately opposite his house, and at the foot of the bridge, is a good inn. Beside this the crowd passed, then over the new bridge, and, by a circuitous route that conducts to the summit of a small hill, commanding a view of the whole scene, they reached the "Auld Brig o' Doon," which ascending and descending, (for it is remarkably steep) they arrived opposite the platform, where the leading conductors of the ceremonies of the day, and the more dignified of the visitors, were arranged to receive them. Some idea of this scene, by far the most interesting, impressive, and exciting of the day's proceedings, may be gathered from the appended print, which exhibits "the processions" walking slowly and in admirable order before the platform, on which stood the three sons of Burns—on the right of these gentlemen were Lord Eglington, his lady, and their friends, and the Lord Justice-General of Scotland; on the left were Professor Wilson, and Alison, the historian, Mrs. S. C. Hall having been condescendingly placed between them, three of two honoured and distinguished men. Immediately behind were ranged a number of eminent persons, the interest in whom, however, was absorbed by that which attached to Mrs. Begg, the sister of the poet, her two daughters, and her son.

When this highly-exciting incident had terminated, the guests proceeded to the pavilion. It was about two o'clock when they took their seats. The two galleries allotted to the Chairman and the Croupier, with their friends, were placed at the east and west extremities of the buildings. On the right of the Chairman were seated Robert Burns, Esq., the poet's eldest son; Major Burns, the poet's youngest son; Miss Begg, niece of the poet; Henry Glassford Bell, Esq., Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire; Rev. Alexander Cuthill, Ayr; Robert Burns Begg, Esq., the poet's nephew, teacher in Kinross; Miss Begg, the poet's younger niece; and Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, of Dumfries, the "Jessie Lewars" of the poet. On the left of the Chairman were Colonel Burns, the poet's second son; Sir John M'Neill, late Ambassador to Persia; Lord Boyle, Lord Justice General of Scotland; the Countess of Eglintoun; and Sir David Hunter Blair, of Blairquhan, Bart. At the Croupier's table were Archibald Alison, Esq., Sheriff of Lanarkshire, and author of "Alison's History of Europe;" Colonel Mure, of Caldwell, author of "Travels in Greece;" William Aytoun, Esq., advocate, Edinburgh; W. R. Collett, Esq., M.P. for Lancashire; James Oswald, Esq., of Ayr; and Mr. Collett, Esq., M.P. for Glasgow; A. Hastie, Esq., M.P. for Paisley; Sir James Campbell, Glasgow; Hugh Miller, Esq., of Midlothian; Provost of Ayr; Charles Mackay, Esq.; James Halliwell, Esq., of Castlehill; and James Campbell, Esq., of Craigie. The space allotted to these ladies and gentlemen was, as we have intimated, very limited; and allowed of no accommodation for the guests—informed if not expected. To this "mistake" it is needless again to refer. In the body of the pavilion were a few—very few—men of letters, visitors from far away places, and of some of whom Scotland has great reason to be proud; such, for example, as Dr. Moir, the "Delta" of "Blackwood's Magazine;" Robert Chambers, whose works are so well known, and good right had he to be there—foremost among the men whom the people delight to honour; for, but for his exertions, near relatives of the great poet—to render homage to whose memory the tens of thousands had assembled—would have been enduring neglected penury instead of enjoying independent comfort. It cannot be indelicate here to allude to a subscription—creditable alike to the receivers and the givers—in procuring which Robert Chambers was mainly instrumental, by which Mrs. Begg and her family were placed in the comparatively luxurious home they now possess. A time will come when an assemblage equal in extent and enthusiasm to that which rendered famous the 6th of August, will be called together to commemorate the prosperous industry and useful energy of a gentleman who has made not Scotland alone, but the whole civilised world, his debtor.

Of the Chairman's opening address we have already given a report. It was pithy and condensed, yet remarkably conclusive and comprehensive. It was indeed an example of true eloquence,—if eloquence is to be estimated by the effect produced. There was in it no word too much—not a syllable that might have been as well left unsaid. It was delivered in a calm impressive manner, yet with a degree of chivalrous zeal which showed that the heart as well as the mind was interested in the issue. There was one expression which in particular told with amazing power upon the assembly—when the speaker made reference to the occasion as one that exhibited the feelings of "repentant" Scotland.

A brief notice of the speeches which followed that of the chairman, may content the reader. From that of Professor Wilson we give the leading passages. He thus introduced the toast—"Welcome to the Sons of Burns!"

Were this Festival to commemorate the genius of Burns, and it were asked what need is there of such commemoration, since his name is co-extensive with the literature of our land, and inherent in every soul, I would answer that though admiration of the Poet be indeed unbounded as the world, yet we, as compatriots to whom it is more especially dear, rejoice to see that universal sentiment concentrated in the voice of a great assembly of his own people—that we rejoice to meet in thousands to honour him who has delighted each single one of us all at his own hearth. (Loud cheers.) But this commemoration expresses, too, if not a profounder, yet a more tender sentiment: for it is to welcome his sons to the land which their father illustrated—to indulge our national pride in a great name, while, at the same time, we gratefully felicitate the most pious of affections. (Cheers.) It was customary, you know, in former times, to crown great poets. No such ovation honoured our bard; yet he, too, tax of human applause—he enjoyed his delights, and he knew the trials that attend it. Which, think you, would he have preferred? Such a celebration as this in his life-time, or fifty years after his death? I cannot doubt that he would have preferred the posthumous, because the finer income. I would not even in the presence of his sons pass altogether over the father's faults. But surely they are not to be elaborately dwelt upon in this place, and upon an occasion like this. It is consolatory to see how the faults of those whom the people honour, grow fainter and more faint in the national memory, while their virtues grow brighter and still more bright; and if in this, injustice has been done them—who shall dare to deny that our illustrious poet was once done to Burns—the succeeding generations become more and more charitable to the dead, and desire to repair the wrong by some profounder homage. Truly said "the good which men do lives after them." All that is ethereal in their being seems to survive; and, therefore, all our cherished memories of our best men, and Burns was among our best, ought to be invested with all consistent excellences; for far better do their virtues instruct us by the love which they inspire, than ever could their vices admonish us. Burns, who, while sorrow oppressed in his own generous breast by the worst of anxieties—the anxiety of providing the means of subsistence to those of his own household and his own hearth—was, notwithstanding, so free faithful to that sacred gift with which heaven had been endowed. (Applause.) Obedient to the holy inspiration, he ever sought it purely in the paths of poverty—to live which is indeed from heaven. From his inimitable fancy, warmed by the sunshine of his heart, even in the thickest gloom, he drew forth the weary words of the world's flower, so beautiful, that even to eyes that weep—that are familiar with tears—they looked as if they were flowers dropped from heaven. Among mighty benefactors to mankind, who will deny that Robert Burns is entitled to a high place? He who reconciled poverty to his lot, who lightened the burden of care, made toil charmed with its very task work, and almost reconciled grief to the grave; who, by one immortal song has won for ever the poor man's cot, and by a picture which genius alone, inspired by pity, could have conceived, a picture so tender and yet so true of that happy night, that it seems to pass, by some sweet transition, from the working world into that hallowed day of God's appointment, and made to breathe a heavenly calm—a holy serenity. Now, I hold that such sentiments as these which I have expressed, if they be true, afford a justification at once of the character of Burns—his moral and intellectual character—that places him beyond the possibility of detraction, among the highest order of human beings who have benefited their race by the expressions of noble sentiment and glorious thoughts. The people of Scotland loved their great poet. They loved him, because he loved his own order, nor ever desired, for a single hour, to quit it. They loved him because he loved the very humblest condition of humanity, so much, that by his connection he saw more truly, and became more distinctly acquainted with what was truly good, and imbued with a spirit of love in the soul of a man. They loved him for that which he had sometimes been, most absurdly, questioned for—his independence. They loved him for bringing sunshine into dark places; not for representing the poor hard-working man as an object of pity—but for showing that there was something more than is dreamed of in the world's philosophy among the tillers of the soil, and the humblest children of the land.

The eloquent and accomplished Professor spoke for about an hour. His speech excited the utmost enthusiasm throughout the assembly. Its effect was enhanced by the "forceful" style of his delivery, augmented, at least to strangers, by the highly "picturesque" appearance of the speaker—his manly form, expressive features, and fine intellectual head, aided by a deep-toned and exceedingly musical voice.

Robert Burns, Esq., rose to reply to the toast. He said:—

I am sure the sons of Burns feel all that they ought on an occasion so gratifying as which so nobly generous a welcome has been given them to the Banks of Doon. Wherever they have gone they have found a reception prepared for them by the genius and fame of their father, and, under the providence of God, they owe to the admirers of his genius all that they have, and what compensations they now enjoy. (Cheers.) We have no claim to attention individually—we are all aware that genius, and more particularly poetic genius, is not hereditary—and in this case the mantle of Elijah has not descended upon Eliah. (Applause.) The sons of Burns have grateful hearts, and will remember, as long as they live, the honour which has this day been conferred upon them by the noble and illustrious of our own land, and many generous and kind spirits from other lands—some from the far West, a country composed of the great and the free, and altogether a kindred people. We beg to return our most heartfelt thanks to this numerous and highly respectable company for the honour which has been done us this day. (Loud cheers.)

Sir John M'Neill, in proposing the health of "Wordsworth and the Poets of England," paid this beautiful compliment to the great poet of the age:—

Dwelling in his high and lofty philosophy, he finds nothing that God has made common or unclean—he finds nothing in human society too humble—nothing in external nature too lowly to be made the fit exponent of the bounty of the goodness of the Most High. (Cheers.) It may be that the lofty position of such a mind has much that is obscure to every inferior intellect. It may be that its vast expanse can only be but dimly visible—it may be that the clouds of intense splendour from the star may veil, from common eyes, some portion of the stately temple they perfume; but we pity the man who can turn from the sublimity of the coffee he has been invited to survey, which has been brewed by the night of creative genius, for there he will find "sermons in stones, beauty in the running brooks, and good in everything." (Applause.)

Henry Glassford Bell (Sheriff-Substitute of Glasgow) proposed the next toast—"Thomas Moore, and the Poets of Ireland." Having offered some preliminary remarks upon the great occasion of the assembling, he asked:—

Will this meeting refuse a similar one of welcome, and of thanks, to the poets of Great Britain? (Great cheering.) Will this meeting, where so many bright eyes rain influence, and many hearts beat high, not hail with simultaneous delight the name of one who shines conspicuous as the very poet of youth, of love, and of beauty—the poet, with deference he it spoken, of better things than even beauty—of gentle thoughts and exquisite associations, that give additional sweetness to the twilight hour, and to the enjoyment of home a more enduring loveliness—the poet, too, of his own high-souled country, through whose harp the common breeze of Ireland changes, as it passes, into articulate melody—a harp that will never be permitted to hang mute on Tara's walls. (Immense applause.)

"Ernst the tear and the smile in thine eye Bless like the rainbow that shines in thine sky!"

(Applause.) How many voices have today murmured a wish that he were here; but the echo of the acclaim with which we greet the name of Moore will reach him in his solitude, and he will feel—that Burns died too young to feel—that it is something worth living for to have gained a nation's gratitude. (Cheers.) Of the great men of Ireland who are dead, I must not pause to speak. But let me be permitted to express, in name of this meeting, our respect and admiration for the best of the living dramatists—one deeply imbued with the spirit of the Elizabethan age—one who has rescued our stage from the reproach which seemed ready to fall upon it—one to whose exuberant poetical fertility, and bold originality of thought, we are indebted for such beautiful creations as "The Virgin" and "William Tell," the "Hunchback," and the "Love Chase"—our valued friend, James Sheridan Knowles. And I might have stopped here, had it not been that I have to-day seen that not the give I came alone, but also some of the gifted daughters of Ireland, have come as pilgrims to the shrine of Burns—that one in particular—one of the most distinguished of that fair sisterhood who give, by their genius, additional lustre to the genius of the present day, has paid her first visit to Scotland, that she might be present on this occasion, and whom I have myself seen moved even to tears by the glory of the gathering. She is one who has thrown additional light on the antiquities, manners, scenery, and beautiful traditions of Ireland—one whose graceful and truly feminine works, are known to us all, and whom we are proud to see among us—Mrs. S. C. Hall. (Great cheering.)

(The warm and cordial manner in which the name of Mrs. S. C. Hall was received, under such circumstances, and at such a meeting, cannot fail to remain among the most cherished memories of her life—one that she must ever regard as a noble and liberal recompense, and a sure encouragement to such exertions as can alone secure to an author a place in the esteem of a thinking and upright people. The enthusiasm with which she was greeted from all parts of the building thoroughly astonished her. It was an honour for which she was totally unprepared; one for which she is deeply grateful, and one to become worthy of which is a high ambition.)

Archibald Alison (the historian) proposed the "Memories of Scott, Campbell, and Byron!"

Three illustrious men—the far-famed successors of Burns, who have drunk deep at the fountain of his genius, and proved themselves the worthy inheritors of his inspiration. (Applause.) And Scotland, he added, I require to say, can claim them all as her own. For if the Tweed has been immortalized by the grace of Scott, the Clyde can boast the birth place of Campbell, and the mountains of the Dee first inspired the muse of Byron. (Prolonged cheering.) I rejoice at that burst of patriotic feeling; I hail it as a pledge that as Ayrshire has raised a fitting monument to Burns, and Edinburgh has erected a fitting structure to the author of Waverley, so Glasgow will, ere long, raise a monument to the bard whose name will never die while Hope pours its balms through the human heart; and Aberdeen will worthily commemorate the far famed traveller who first inhaled the inspiration of nature amidst the clouds of Lochagar, and afterwards poured the light of his genius over those lands of the sun where his descending orb set—

"Not as in northern climes obscurely bright,
But one unclouded blaze of living light."

W. Aytoun, Esq., (the distinguished Advocate) next proposed the "Memories of James Hogg and Allan Cunningham," in a speech full of hearty eloquence and true feeling. The former, he said:—

Was a man indeed cast in nature's happiest mould. True-hearted, and brave, and generous, and sincere, alive to every kindly impulse, and fresh at the core to last, he lived amongst his native hills the blameless life of the shepherd and the poet (cheers)—and on the day when he was laid beneath the sod in the lonely kirkyard of Ettrick, there was not one dry eye amongst the hundreds that lingered round his grave. Of the other sweet singer, too—of Allan Cunningham, the least-hearted and kindly Allan—I might say much, but why detain you further? Does not his name alone recall to your recollection many a sweet song that has stirred the bosom of the village maiden with an emotion that a princess need not blush to own? (Applause.) Proud, indeed, may be the district that can claim within herself the birth-places of Burns and of Cunningham; and proud may we all be—and we are proud, from yourself, my lord, to the humblest individual here—that we have the opportunity of testifying our respect to the genius that will defy the encroachment of time; and which has stood, and will continue to stand, a splendour and a glory around the land that we love so well.

Sir D. H. Blair, having proposed the "Health of the Ladies," Colonel Mure gave "The Fanny of Scotland." Sir James Campbell followed with "The Land of Burns;" the Chairman with "The Provost of Ayr;" the Lord Justice-General with "The Noble Chairman," who, after replying, gave that of "Professor Wilson," immediately after which the meeting began to separate, and the proceedings of a most important day—a day that will be for ever distinguished in modern Scottish history—terminated.

Without, "the common people" had been pursuing their sports; bagpipes and violins came to the aid of merry dancers, and the several bands paraded about the field and roads. The rain, which descended grievously towards the close of the day, materially abridged the enjoyments of the crowd, but in tents erected on the ground they contrived, no doubt, to obtain as large a share of pleasure as the guests who were housed in the pavilion; and, all matters considered, this was an object of even higher importance than the festival within doors; and this to a stranger must be described as the principal achievement of the day, for the accomplishment of the main purpose was the bringing together a mass of persons of humble stations, who saw in the homage rendered to one of their own class, the surest acknowledgement of genius, and the most direct encouragement to honourable efforts on the part of the "meaner sort." Of these, indeed, as we have intimated, there was no lack; but it is to be deplored, that of the aristocracy, in rank and in letters, the gathering was infinitely less numerous than we were led to expect it would have been. This evil strikes us the more forcibly when we know, that within two hours' journey of Ayr there were a couple of dukes, half-a-dozen other noblemen, and a score or two of men of title, attending a show of "fat beavers," who left the duty of commemorating a man who has glorified Scotland, to a single peer, about a dozen of Scottish "worthies," and 50,000 Scottish women and men. Moreover, the attendance from Edinburgh was miserably poor; and the absence of some of its leading characters ought to be accounted for. The assembly was, in truth, rescued from the reproach of failure, because Wilson was there with his sound heart, high intellect, and delicious voice; and Alison, a master-mind of the age, whose manly person and eloquent countenance indicate the searching inquiry after truth, and the earnest resolve to establish truth, which characterise the produce of his powerful pen. There were indeed others present whose presence would give importance to, and confer dignity upon, any meeting; but upon these two great men the glory of the occasion mainly rests. It cannot be denied that if Scotland—"repentant Scotland"—has discharged its debt to its poet, that debt has been paid by the "common people" of the country.

AUTOGRAPH.

We are by no means sure that even now, the poet, Robert Burns, if he lived again to sing his immortal songs, "wandering unknown (to quote a fine sentence from the speech of Lord Eglintoun, who did his devoted nobly) along the banks of Fife," would receive a whit more homage from the higher classes, than he did, when, struggling with poverty, he roamed about a depressed gauger—such in his own esteem—because of the wretched "calling" to which necessity compelled him to resort.

Alas! how true it is that men of letters are valued only during the moments of pleasure they bestow; and that in this country the lucky dealer in "soft goods" is a man of far higher importance than he who enlightens a world, and makes of his debtors all mankind.

Yet Scotland will be for ever proud of this "great gathering;" for fifty thousand of its people met in honour of their bard!

To us the movement seemed the most united and fervent we had ever witnessed. We were unprepared for the steady resolve to honour the poet's memory, which, however fixed, was animated ever and anon by an uncontrollable impulse that uncovered the heads of the multitude, and sent their shouts into the sky, peal after peal, taken up and repeated again and again, as company after company of the various "trades," "archers," and "shepherds" waved their banners above the "Auld Brig o' Doon." As we looked upon the heaving multitude, we could not avoid thinking, that if all the preparations for the banquet had suddenly disappeared, the manifestation of respect on the part of the people towards their poet, would have been accomplished—the heart-beatings of Scotland as thoroughly exhibited, as if no pavilion, with its tasteful draperies and elevated galleries, had been planted on the banks of the river that waters the land of Burns. The arrangements of the day, as far as the processions went, were perfect; but it must not be forgotten that those were the people's arrangements, and if the literati of the United Kingdom had but manifested the same unanimity, assembling to evince their honour to the dead, and their sympathy with the living, as it was hoped they would have done, the "gathering" would have then been in all respects the most extraordinary ever witnessed in Great Britain. Yet, while we regret what it was not, we shall always rejoice that we witnessed what it was. Who that has done so can cease to remember the fervent looks of the old and middle-aged—the tearful eyes and exclamations of the young, the eagerness with which parents pointed out to their children the grey-haired sons of the poet, whom they delighted to honour. On, and on, and on they came—in peace and harmony—disturbed by no jarring feelings, moved by no political object—warmed by the genial influence of the tenderest, and most elevated patriotism! The shouts of the people echoed by the enthusiastic cheers of the nobleman and gentlemen who were on the platform, while the tears of the fairer portion of the assembly proved how deeply they sympathised with the great purpose they had met to commemorate! As long as the procession was in progress, the men who composed it abstained from any manifestation of their feelings, beyond lowering their banners, uncovering their heads, and gazing upon the poet's sons; but when the gigantic thistle, the emblem of their native country, closed the procession, and had been not only honoured, but divided and borne off, blossom by blossom, and leaf by leaf, by the company, as mementos of the "field of Burns," there was a fearful rush of human beings back towards the platform, and eager hands were upstretched from below to grasp the hands of the children of the poet. Their rapture knew no bounds; it could not be controlled, and certainly Professor Wilson came in for a fair share of the popular applause, and his hands were eagerly shaken by many, while mothers lifted up their infants to be touched by the sons of their bard; if the platform had not been strongly built, it must have given way, for the pressure against the supporters was immense; but it was well constructed, and bore up bravely.

When the fever of our own excitement had subsided—when the day was past, and the grey twilight of the succeeding morning crept slowly into our window, we asked ourselves how it was that such a multitude were moved in these days of utilitarianism, at a time too when much discontent, consequent upon the want of employment, is so largely felt and talked of. We asked, we say, how it was that such a number of a cool and calculating nation assembled to pay tribute to the memory of a poet! Does it not prove that the feelings of the Scot, however guarded by conventional usages, are warm and earnest, that his nature is fervent, that he throws himself passionately into a cause, when that cause is connected with either of the two great main springs of his heart—his religion or his country?

Thou shalt not forswear

AUTOGRAPH.

For some days after the festival, the objects of interest connected with the early life of Burns received many visitors. The number of those to whom he was known, except by his imperishable works, is now very limited. Our notice of the meeting on the banks of Doon would be, however, incomplete without some description of the poet. He is thus pictured by his earliest biographer:—

Burns was nearly five feet ten inches in height, and of a form that indicated agility as well as strength. His well-raised forehead, shaded with black curling hair, indicated extensive capacity. His eyes were large, dark, full of ardour and intelligence. His face was well formed, and his countenance uncommonly interesting and expressive. His mode of dressing, which was often slovenly, and a certain fulness and bend in his shoulders, characteristic of his original profession, disguised in some degree the elegance and symmetry of his form. The external appearance of Burns was most strikingly indicative of the character of his mind. On a first view, his physiognomy had a certain air of coarseness, mingled, however, with an expression of deep penetration, and of calm thoughtfulness, approaching to melancholy. There appeared in his first manner and address, perfect ease and self-possession, but a stern and almost supercilious elevation, not, indeed, incompatible with openness and affability, which, however, bespoke a mind conscious of superior talents. Strangers that supposed themselves approaching an Ayrshire peasant who could make rhymes, and to whom their notice was an honour, found themselves speedily overawed by the presence of a man who bore himself with dignity, and who possessed a singular power of correcting forwardness and repelling intrusion. * * * His dark and haughty countenance easily relaxed into a look of good will, of pity, or of tenderness; and, as the various emotions succeeded each other in his mind, assumed with equal ease the expression of the broadest humour—or of the most extravagant mirth—or of the deepest melancholy—or of the most sublime emotion.

A ramble about the scenery associated with the poet's name, in the immediate neighbourhood of his birth, is a noble theme for the pen and pencil; but we have already occupied on the subject greater space than we can well afford, although far less than it deserves. A few brief comments, indeed, we have offered in reference to the points most conspicuous; and it only remains to us to supply some notice of the monument to his memory, which stands above "the banks and brigs of Doon." This we shall borrow from the beautiful and valuable book, published by Messrs. Blackie of Glasgow, entitled "The Land of Burns." The monument was erected by subscription.

It was finished on the 6th of July, 1823, when Mr. Fullerton of Skelton, in the presence of a numerous assemblage of freemasons and subscribers, placed the stone on the summit, and delivered an appropriate address. The building recalls the parent days of Grecian architecture. It was meant by Mr. Hamilton to be in some measure a revival of the celebrated monument of Lycabettus at Athens; and it also, we believe, bears some resemblance to the church of San Pietro in Montorio at Rome. The edifice consists of a triangular basement (representative of the three divisions of Ayrshire—Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham), upon which rises a circular peristyle, supporting a cupola. The peristyle is composed of nine pillars, representative of the number of the muses, thirty feet in height, and of the Corinthian order. They were designed from the three remaining columns of the Conitium in the Forum at Rome. Above the cupola rises a girt tripod, supported by three inverted dolphins—fishes sacred to Apollo, and hence selected as ornaments proper to the monument of a poet. The whole building, the cost of which was about £2000, is sixty feet in height, from the platform within the peristyle. The view embraces not only Alloway Kirk, the Old Bridge, the banks of the Doon, and other objects consecrated by the genius of the poet, but a track of country of unsurpassed beauty and richness, and one of the noblest inland seas connected with our Scottish shores. About an acre of shrubbery surrounds the monument; and it is not unworthy of notice, that the gardeners of the district, led by an admiration of the genius of their gifted countryman, assemble once every year, and give this spot a day's labour. In the interior chamber there are exhibited several articles appropriate to the place—a copy, by Mr. Steven, of Edinburgh, of the original portrait of Burns, by N. A. Smyth—a range of various editions of the poet's works—a snuff box, made from the wood-work of Alloway Kirk—eight chairs, made from the beam which supported the bell in the old castle of Ayr (the bell of "the Dungeon Clock")—and some old illustrations of scenes in the poems of Burns.

The cottage where Mrs. Begg, the only surviving sister of the poet, resides, is a model of neatness. One window of the little parlour looks into a small garden, where flowers and vegetables are trained and cultivated; and another commands a view of the high road,

BANQUET IN THE PAVILION.

Within, when we visited it, all was cheerfulness; a fire sparkled warmly, and not unseasonably, although the month was August; the venerable lady was surrounded, not only by her own children and grand-children, but by the sons of that brother, to whose memory thousands had paid homage during the past day.

Mr. Robert Burns, the eldest of the poet's sons, bears a strong personal resemblance to his father. His eyes are large, dark, and intelligent; and his memory is stored with legends, poems, and historical records of great value: these materials are not only abundant, but well arranged and ordered, and when a question is asked, the intelligent reply is ready. His conversation is rich in illustration, and, though he most gracefully said, that "the mantle of Elijah had not descended upon Elisha," we believe that the son possesses much, which nothing but the memory of his father's greatness could have obscured.

It was most pleasant to meet Colonel and Major Burns beneath this humble roof, when we knew how much their society was coveted by those who had stately halls, wherein to receive them; but neither the luxury of Eastern life, nor the brilliancy of London society, had rendered their true hearts insensible to the delightful and natural feelings which hallow the Scotsman's home. Although an absence of three-and-thirty years from "kith and kin," had elevated (mainly by their own honourable exertions) the poet's sons to a much higher "caste," in the world's estimation, than is allotted to their cousins, they were not, therefore, the less eager to enjoy the "cracks" and memories of the days, when they sported, in innocent childhood, amid the "braes of Doon"—gazed with reverence, and it might be awe, through the chinks of the walls of Alloway Kirk—clustered around the stone, which the piety of the poet-son had placed at the head of his father's grave—or gathered wild flowers upon the spot, where thousands assembled, and which will be known and hallowed to posterity, not as the battle-fields of Scotland are known, but as the PEACEFUL FIELD—the FIELD OF BURNS—the "POET'S FIELD"—over which his plough, no doubt, had passed; and where, after a lapse of fifty years, the titled, and honoured, and wealthy, of his own and other lands, met to render homage to the "Poet of the Poor." The memory of their boyish days and the excitement of the past day struggled together upon their lips; while the "auld lady's" quiet voice was heard at intervals, giving a word or two of information, or setting something right that had been imperfectly stated.

BURNS' "QUAICH" (DRINKING CUP.)

There was also a very old man, a brother of Mrs. Burns, present during a portion of our visit; but the interests of this world do not seem to have much charms for him; he reminded us somewhat of his sister's picture—the one published in Cunningham's "Life of Burns."

These various members of so interesting a family met together but for a few days, and are now dispersed again to their various homes and occupations; but they will carry the memory of that day with them to the very brink of a new existence.

SCENE FROM "ALADDIN," AT THE LYCEUM.

Four-and-twenty pretty fairies
All in a row,
Harness'd too in flower-bands
Lightly they go!
There's A LAD in the gilt car,
They very well know,
Who with them altogether makes
A very nice show
As they trot along to merry tune
Of Long-Jumeau!

Long-Jumeau for Postillions
Has been a place of Fame,
But Batty, Batty, (not Mozart's Tho' similar in name)
Can boast another Postillion
Who beat of all alive
Can, four-in-hand, ay! twenty-four
To Greenwich take a drive,
And trot along to merry tune
Of Long-Jumeau!

He 'as liv'd a thousand twelvemonths,
And will live another yet,—
The Genius of the Ring-dome Kingdom
No one can forget!
But still we do not envy him
While here we chance to see
A troop of such a two-times twelve
Of Grace and Symmetry
As trip along to merry tune

FITZ-STEPHEN.

"THE OLD SAILOR."

Here then was a strange vicissitude—a change from joy to sorrow; from merriment to misery; and he who had hoped to repose in the arms of beauty was that night the lonely inmate of a prison cell, with a tortured conscience depriving him of rest. His father had not been idle; his own honour had been wounded through that which had been inflicted on his son; and without a moment's loss of time he instituted an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the alleged offence; and those who knew the elder Fitz-Stephen were well aware of his sterling integrity.

The principal witness, who had laid the information, was one of the crew of the Carack on her last voyage; and had quitted her on his arrival home through ill health. He had gone to the dwelling of his parents in Limerick, where, though every care and attention were bestowed upon him, he continued to droop, till feeling, as he supposed, the near approach of death, he revealed to his father circumstances that induced the latter to request the attendance of a magistrate; and in the presence of that functionary and the priest, he made the deposition on which the warrant had been granted. He was still too ill to make his personal appearance as an accuser, and, as the charge was of so serious a nature, Lynch and Mac Connor were kept in suspense. In a few days, however, to the surprise of every one, the man, having recovered his mind, rapidly recovered, and a time was set apart for public examination.

The court was densely crowded—the Mayor occupied the magisterial seat, aided by two others whom he had called in to his assistance. The prisoners were brought up, and both seemed full of confidence as to the result. The usual forms having been gone through the informer made his appearance, looking more like a corpse risen from the grave than a living man—his eyes were sunk and his cheeks hollow and deadly pale—and he could scarcely walk without support from others. A seat was placed for him, he was sworn, and then commenced to relate all the particulars that had come to his knowledge.

He stated, that "on the night Don Sebastian disappeared he had laid himself down beneath some loose sails in the boat that was in anidships, on the deck, and, after sleep, but was awake by a commotion about, and raising himself up he beheld his commander struggling with the Spaniard, over whose mouth Phelim was fiercely pressing his hand, and they were trying to force Sebastian over the stern; that Phelim succeeded in gagging the foreigner, and Lynch having stunned him by a blow they raised the unconscious victim in their arms and launched him overboard."

"And was there no one else on deck at the time this took place?" inquired one of the magistrates.

"Not a soul, sir, barring the Captain, Phelim Mac Connor, and myself," answered the man.

"You then alone were a witness to this transaction," remarked the same magistrate; and then, turning to his brother officials, he added,—"That is strange!"

"Not strange at all, Sir," uttered the man, "seeing as it was midnight and moonlight, for it was the time for the watch to be relieved, and one watch had been ordered below to send the other up."

"Did you give no alarm when your shipmates came on deck?" inquired the magistrate.

"Not a bit of alarm, sir," answered the witness, "for I was afraid of the life of me if it was known that I had seen what I did, and so I got under the sails again."

"Have you never repeated this tale to any one until it was divulged to your father?" asked the Mayor.

"Nay, your honour," replied the man with a shake of the head; "I loved Mr. Lynch too much to speak a word about it."

"What induced you, then, at last, to confess?" inquired the magistrate who had first questioned him.

"What made me tell, sir? Oh, then, the cold hand of death was on my heart, for my conscience would not let me rest so how at all, and I pined and withered because of my trouble. But when I had cleared it out, then the heavy, heavy hand was taken off of me, and, please God, I hope I shall recover yet."

"Was it at the helm on this night?" asked the other magistrate, who had not spoken before.

"Not a creature did I see, sir," answered the man, "barring when I heard the body splash into the water, Phelim took the tiller, and the captain went below. I never listened nor saw any more, sir."

"Did the foreigner make no noise—no crying out—no appeal for mercy?" demanded the Mayor.

"Not in my hearing, your honour," was the reply; "though it was the common and skimming shaft that woke me from my sleep, and may be there was a sound of voices, but no words came to my ears."

"Could you perceive no struggling in the water after the body was thrown overboard?" inquired the first magistrate.

"I never looked, sir," responded the man; "for when I heard the splash it's bothered I was entirely, and so I ducked my head as soon as the captain left the deck."

The magistrates whispered together: the statement was plain and unvarnished, but the elder Fitz-Stephen still strongly suspected that the whole was a fabrication to cover some secret purpose of revenge. The total absence of all alluring motives for such a murder had great weight in the old man's mind.

"Were the young men friendly together previous to this time?" questioned the Mayor.

"Sure, and they always was; never an angry word or look did myself ever see pass between them; they always spoke kindly to each other, barring the Captain was a bit dull at first."

"There is much mystery in all this," said the first magistrate. "Pray did you ever have a quarrel with your captain or the other prisoner?"

"No, never, sir," answered the witness with emphasis, "saying a taste of the spoke, for love, with Phelim; but that's no quarrel, and sad and sorry I am for bringing them here; but the truth is the truth, and it's myself has told it this blessed hour."

Nothing further could be elicited from the witness, who adhered most undeviatingly to his evidence. Others of the seamen were called, who corroborated the statement of the informer, that the watch had on that night been ordered below by the captain; that Phelim had been left at the helm, and the Spaniard was seated near the stern. Others deposed that, belonging to the relieving watch when they came on deck Phelim was still at the helm, but the Captain and Sebastian were not to be seen; of the fate of the latter they were wholly ignorant. All, however, testified to the good feeling that existed between the deceased and Lynch Fitz-Stephen at all times during the voyage home.

The prisoners were called upon to explain, or not, as they might deem fit, but they merely denied the accusation in positive terms; and Phelim averred that he had left the Spaniard on deck after he was relieved. Under all the circumstances the magistrates came to the determination to commit the accused for trial, and never had such strong excitement been raised in Galway as was prevalent now. The prisoners were sent back to the gaol, and preparations were made for their defence before the judge, who arrived about a fortnight afterwards to clear the prisoners. The court was opened with great pomp. The prisoners were placed at the bar—every corner, and nook, and avenue was filled by anxious expectants of an acquittal, for the evidence against the accused was considered too slight to insure condemnation, and the body of the deceased had not been found. The same witnesses were rigidly examined, but their testimony remained unshaken; nothing further was advanced to procure conviction, and Lynch whispered to his foster-brother that they were certain to be acquitted: even the Mayor, who sat on the judicial seat, smiled with complacency as confident of the innocence of his son.

The trial was drawing near its close, and the prisoners had just been called upon for their defence, when an unusual bustle at the entrance of the court attracted attention in that direction—it was caused by the officers clearing the way for a venerable personage in foreign attire, who was, after considerable exertion, able to approach the table. The elder Fitz-Stephen immediately recognized his ancient friend, the father of Don Sebastian, who had just arrived from Spain, and the meeting between them was touching in the extreme, whilst the hitherto assumed indifference of Lynch and Mac Connor quailed before the agonized gaze of the afflicted father.

Explanations were made to the Spanish merchant respecting the trial and its course, and the evidence was read over to him by the Mayor, who was well versed in the Biscayan tongue. The old man listened with agonized attention, though he could not repress his grief, nor prevent occasional bursts of horror and indignation. At the close, he rose up, and, briefly addressing the judge, announced that he had another witness to bring forward in support of the accusation. The prisoners gave each other a rapid glance, but instantly resumed their firmness, though Lynch could not conceal from himself that his fraudulent conduct must necessarily be revealed.

The Spaniard took the oath, and the Mayor was sworn to translate his statements duly and truly to the court, but he did so without hesitation, under a fervent expectation that the character of his son would now be cleared even from suspicion. He related the whole of the circumstances connected with Sebastian's departure from Spain, and his real object in doing so, and the elder Fitz-Stephen learned with amazement and terror the delinquencies of Lynch, his licentiousness and guilty profligacy.

"And now," said the merchant, in a tone of almost overpowering emotion, "be on whom my soul delighted is no more; the hand of the assassin has struck him down, and the faithless friend has cruelly and murderously deprived me of my child." The Mayor withstood his cruelty, for the motive was assigned which might lead to such a cowardly and wicked act. "You have heard the testimony of the accuser," continued the aged man. "It is true—all true; and I will produce my proofs in support of my assertion." He waved his hand, and four stout seamen with difficulty made their way, carrying a long black case, which they laid upon the table.

Lynch had bowed down his head, wholly subdued by mental agony, as the Spaniard's address proceeded—he covered his face with his hands, and wept. But when the witness spoke of further proofs, he suddenly aroused himself, and watched with keen interest as the box was brought into court. But what was his horror and despair, when, on the side of the case being removed, he beheld the corpse of the murdered man—the features were bloated, and scarcely to be recognized; but the dress was indisputable—the skull had been fractured by a blow and there was a gag bound in the dead man's mouth.

A wild and soul-piercing cry escaped the superior of the two prisoners, who loudly and vehemently exclaimed, "It is he—it is he! Great God thou art just, and the murdered rise in judgment against the murderer—I am guilty, I am guilty," he groaned, as if his heart was bursting, and fell heavily to the floor. Phelim was more firm, but the appearance of the dead to testify against him made even his strong frame tremble, yet he uttered not a word. As for the Mayor, the prop that had supported him was torn away, the stay of his declining years was snapt asunder, and his heart failed within him, for Lynch had avowed his guilt and hope was at an end.

The evidence was resumed; and the merchant stated that after receiving intelligence of his bereavement he embarked for Galway, and when on the Irish coast the spot was pointed out to him near to which the accident was supposed to have occurred. Sorrow and anguish had almost overpowered him, and he sat down and wept.

"There is something floating at a short distance on the starboard bow," exclaimed a sailor who was on the foreyard—"it looks like a dead body—some poor creature who has suffered shipwreck; rest his soul!"

The merchant heard it; he sprang from his seat and hurried forward, where the men were gathering to obtain a sight of the object—it was indeed a corpse, and, conjecturing that it might possibly be the perishing remains of his child, he earnestly entreated that the boat might be put out to ascertain the fact. The captain demurred, for the wind was fair, and the superstitious notions of seamen urged them to have nothing to do with the decaying putrefaction, but the aged man was so importunate that his request was granted; he went to the boat himself, and found not only that it was indeed his son, but also that he had lost his life through a deed of violence. Contrary to the feelings of the sailors, the corpse was taken on board, and a case made to contain it. They reached Galway on the day of trial: the agonized parent was informed of what was passing; he hastened to the court, and the events occurred as they have been already narrated.

The evidence was corroborated in every word, and, independent of the confession that had been made, was considered conclusive, so that the prisoners were found guilty, and the judge proceeded to pass sentence of DEATH. The duty of the Mayor compelled him to retain his place on the judgment seat whilst condemnation was uttered, and, appalling as it was, he was forced to listen to the cries of the prisoner for "mercy, mercy," that was beyond his power to bestow. But the venerable parent performed his soul-harrowing functions, though the tremor of his frame and the quivering muscles of his face strongly evinced the intensity of his suffering.

The prisoners were removed from the bar, the judge departed, and the mayor laying aside his office with its symbols, became again the father. He visited his wretched son, received a full and free confession of the past, gave him no hopes of commutation, but urgently exhorted him to prepare to die, as the next day but one would assuredly be his last, and Phelim, who was immediately to be removed to another place, would expiate his offence upon the gallows at the same time.

The parting between the foster-brothers was very distressing; but still Lynch clung to hope: he knew that his mother's family was numerous and powerful, and he trusted much, not only to their intervention, but, even if that should fail he relied upon their successful attempts at rescue rather than have a stain upon their name. Alleen, the blighted and drooping Alleen, came to bid him a last adieu, and she was accompanied by the sister, whose long cherished hopes of happiness he had for ever blasted. The interview—but who could adequately delineate a scene that was one continued development of bitter, soul-rending agony—clasping each other in desperate embrace, and then yielding to fits which deprived the females of every sign of animation—cries of despair and lamentations for those who were about to die—it was terrible to hear, but still more terrible to witness.

The hour drew near, and the elder Fitz-Stephen, to whom, in his official capacity, was entrusted the charge of seeing the sentence of the law carried into execution, was apprized that a strong force of the Blues as well as a horde of the wild mountaineers had resolved, in disguise, to attack the scaffold, and to carry off the convict. Several of the Fitz-Stephen family had joined in the conspiracy, and had not the Mayor been informed of the intended assault—could it have been carried into effect without his knowledge, he would, perhaps, have rejoiced had it been successful; but the report which he had received came from indisputable authority. His stern sense of the inviolability of his office prevailed over the tender emotions of the parent, and he determined that the Spaniard, as well as his own nation, should behold the inflexibility of justice, though administered by a father's hand. He ascertained the correctness of the information that had been given him; he might have surrounded the gallows with an armed force, but that would have inevitably led to a collision, and the shedding of more blood. He, therefore, at an early hour in the morning, had the criminal secretly conveyed to his own house, where the ministers of the law's avenging power were, by his command, also in attendance.

The father and the son were now in the same apartment; the one exhorting his guilty child to penitence; the other, in compliance with the entreaties of his parent, kneeling in fervent prayer. Then came the last agonizing embrace; and that over, the father was changed to the unbending chief magistrate, the son to the criminal who was about to suffer. They were in an upper room, and the rope had been affixed to a beam near the open window. A shout arose in the distance, and a messenger hurried in to report that the Mayor's stratagem had been discovered, and a numerous body was then hurrying towards the house. Lynch heard the shouts, and a flush of hope crimsoned his face, but the next moment he was in the hands of the executioner and the halter put round his neck.

"Yet stay, father, stay," implored the young man, "only for a few minutes grace to offer another prayer—oh! I cannot die thus—release your holds you—!" he struggled violently, but the Mayor waved his hand—the body was thrown out at the window, the cracking beam told that it had received its weight, and when the crowd reached the dwelling they beheld the last agonies of the criminal. The body was soon cut down by the leaders of the assassins, but life was utterly extinct—the wretched father laid senseless on the floor.

Phelim also suffered according to his sentence, and he died with firmness, regretting the fate of his foster-brother, and accusing himself as the cause of it.

In two months the hand of the destroyer was again among them—Alleen and Mary expired within a few hours of each other, and were buried side by side in the same grave.

Mogadore, or Suez, as the Moghrebins call it, the port of the town of Morocco, lies on the Atlantic shore, between Cape Cantin and Cape Gher. It was founded in 1700. Mogadore is built on a low shore, consisting of moving sand, which extends from five to fifteen miles inland, where a fertile country begins. It is regularly built, the streets being straight, but somewhat narrow. The Europeans settled here have erected several large buildings in the African style. The town is divided into two parts, one of which is called the Fortress, and contains the Custom-house, the Palace of the Pacha, the other public buildings, and the houses of Europeans; the other part is only inhabited by Jews. The harbour is formed by a small island, lying south-west of the town, and about two miles in circumference. At low tides there are only ten or twelve feet of water in the harbour, and large vessels are compelled to anchor without, at a distance of about two miles. The commerce of this place with

CERITO IN THE REVOLVING PAS.

The revolution of the heavenly bodies is not half so wonderful as that of those "fair celestials" who trip it on this earth so lightly, as even to seemingly scorn her power of gravitation, and float themselves in "mid air" at pleasure. Amongst these ethereals, foremost we must notice Cerito, who, in the pas from the ballet of "Alma," which our illustration presents, not only turns her own head à merveille, but those also of all her beholders. Never was such a feat so marvellously performed. It is quite Circean—a vortex—a maelstrom of beauty, and whirling everybody into its enchantment as surely as ever did any syren's stratagem of old. And yet Fanny Cerito means but to delight, not to ensnare or injure.

THE MARRIAGE SCENE IN "CORRADO DI ALTAMURA."

The music of Ricci is rather cold-blooded to some temperaments who have been accustomed to be carried up to blister by the hot dishes of Donizetti, &c., of the modern school. Each is very good in its way, no doubt, for chacun à son goût, but the healthiest palate is that which can relish moderate and wholesome food. The melodies of Ricci are simple and flowing—more calculated to please than astonish. (From the German of Uhland.)

A life of struggle, grief, and pain,
Fate had appointed thee;
And death, in want, hath snapp'd the chain
Link'd life to misery.

The Muses came—a glorious throng,
Around thy infant bed;
They teach'd the lips with golden song,
But, ah! denied them bread!

Thy mother from thee early died,
And thou dost find it vain,
To hope from any heart beside
For love like her's again.

Round thee the world its treasures spread
In overflow of blessing,
But ever from thy grasp they fled,
For other men's possessing.

Spring with its blossoms made thee blest—
Its flowers were dreams to thee;
But autumn's grapes another press'd—
Another story'd its tree.

And when thou thy thirst hast slaked,
Thy cup with water filled,
White echoes, by thy songs awak'd,
Through halls of listening thrill'd.

Avoid the busy world you walk'd
As though it were not thine,
And to unlistening ears you talk'd
A language too divine.

When home unto thy mortal rest,
How frail thy frame will be!
Lightly thy foot the earth has press'd—
Light be its dust on thee!

LITERARY NOTES OF THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

Among the books sold this week, which formed part of the library of the late Duke of Sussex, were copies of rare books, the notes to which proved that his Royal Highness not only read them, but reflected upon their contents. There were some specimens of the Duke's notes to T. B. Browne's "History of the Laws Enacted Against the Catholics," page 382: "I cannot join in the praises which this historian (Flowerden) bestows on the liberal views of 'this great statesman and excellent governor' (Lord Chesterfield, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), because I feel persuaded that it was fear drove him, as in Mr. Flowerden's own words, is 'drove Great Britain to do justice to Ireland for some months of danger.' " (The Duke thereon remarks—"I fear this to be true." Page 133, in a note on Oates's Plot—"The King, who is supposed to have disbelieved the whole of the plot, never once exercised this glorious prerogative of mercy. 'It is said,' remarks the right hon. gentleman, (Fox, in his history of the reign of James II.) 'that he dared not; his throne, perhaps his life, was at stake; and history does not furnish us with an example of any monarch with whom the lives of innocent or even meritorious subjects ever appeared to be of weight, when put in balance against such considerations.' " (The Duke says—"This is a very severe remark, but I am apt to believe that the idea is formed upon fact, and not merely speculation.") Again, the author observes that when Charles I. "found it necessary to dissolve the sitting of Parliament, he had recourse to that impolitic measure of openly compounding with the Catholics for the penalties to which they were subjected." (The Duke of Sussex observes—"This was certainly a political error; the Sovereign of this country ought never to be a party man.")

THE MORMONITES.

The recent murder, in the United States, of the religious impostor, Joe Smith, the founder of a sect called Mormonites, has directed some attention to the ignorant dupes who formed part of that body, and a few particulars concerning them may therefore be interesting. Joe Smith, an educated mechanic, of an ambitious and fanatical turn, living in the interior of the state of New York, pretended that an angel appeared to him in the year 1827, and told him where he would find a stone box, containing certain gold plates, with a revelation from Heaven inscribed on them. He spent upwards of three years in translating this new revelation, by celestial aid, as he pretended, from the unknown language in which it was written; and having so done, the gold plates were carried to Heaven. The volume professes to be a Supplement to the Bible; it is called "The Book of Mormon," and gives a pretended history of about 1600 years from the time of Zedekiah, King of Judah, to A.D. 426. The Israelites transported from their native land in the days of Zedekiah are traced in divers pilgrimages till their arrival in America, and down to the year 426, when, having peopled and civilized America, the true seed were all destroyed, to the number of 230,000, in a battle with the apostates, at the very spot where the gold plates were found—only one escaping, namely, the prophet Moroni, who wrote the history of his race, and from whose history Joe Smith has translated and abridged "The Book of Mormon." With this new Koran, Smith, in imitation of Mahomet, established a sect, of which he was the heaven-appointed prophet, destined to lead them into a Promised Land, there to build a New Jerusalem. This Promised Land was the state of Missouri, which the Mormonites were to occupy by divine right, and from which they were to expel all unbelievers. They were, however, driven out of the state of Missouri into that of Illinois. Here they settled at a town called Commerce, near Keokuk, on the east bank of the Mississippi, a little above the junction of the river Des Moines; and they gave to the place the name of Nauvoo. Buckingham mentions the number of the new sect at 5000; but Mr. Baird, writing four or five years later, reckons them at 10,000.

INCREASE IN THE SIZE AND POPULATION OF LONDON.

The growth of London and the increase in its population since the accession of the Stuart family, in 1603, have long been matters for marvel and observation. "The growth of London," says David Hume, "has been prodigious. From 1600, it doubled every forty years; consequently, in 1680," he adds, "it contained four times as many inhabitants as at the beginning of the century." In 1684, London was said to contain little more than 130,000 inhabitants. In 1610, the average number of deaths per week was from 300 to 350; the weekly average of deaths for the last five years has been 900. The health of the metropolis has improved, therefore, very materially, for the population of 1843 is twenty times as great again as the population of 1610. At the Restoration, it was calculated by Sir William Petty, that there were about 120,000 families within the walls of London. "The trade and very city of London," says Petty, "removes westward, and the walled city is but one-fifth of the whole population." Before the Restoration," he adds, "the people of Paris were more than those of London and Dublin put together; whereas, now (1687), the people of London are more than those of Paris and Rome, or of Paris and Rouen." From the Restoration to the Revolution, a period of twenty-eight years, the population of London increased, to the infinite amusement of all who took an interest in the progressive history of the English people. No one paid more attention to this subject than Sir William Petty, a very active and able Fellow of the Royal Society, then newly formed. His printed tables differ occasionally, but the result seems to have been, that in 1685, there were about 670,000 souls, both within and without the walls; that in 1685, the burials of London, 23,322; and in 1684, 23,302, or 446 per week. That, in 1686, when contained about 87,000 houses, it was seven times higher than in Queen Anne's time. In the year 1791, the burials within the bills of mortality are 18,760; less than Styrpe's or Petty's estimates. But this fortunately, no fair average of the number of deaths in London; very few died within the limits of London, were buried without the bills of mortality in places like Bunhill-fields and Spa-fields, for which no returns in these very incomplete specimens of political arithmetic.

A NEW AND USEFUL MODE OF NAVIGATION.

Templest has invented a new mode of sailing, which seems to present advantages. He terms his invention the "new rig," and has fitted up a ship, the Problem, by means of which he reached Newcastle-upon-Tyne, back-upon-Tweed, by himself; although he had neither compass, chart, or a pump on board. The Problem is capable of being made to turn round as if on a pivot, without even a sail being altered—attention to the helm when she takes stern way being all that is necessary to the evolution. This manœuvre is well adapted for vessels of war, as after broadside, bow and stern guns, could be discharged without ever ceasing to call a man from his gun to attend to the braces. The vessel can be propelled stern foremost, and tacked or worn in that direction—an manœuvre for backing a vessel clear of dangers suddenly observed, a stern-board can be given to a square-rigged vessel, or they can be tacked, but they cannot be tacked or managed astern the same as the new rig. The fore and aft triangle sails go round without touching a mast. The sails where the principal advantage rests in the rig. Under them a well managed will never miss stays in the heaviest sea, or in the lightest breeze.

SCIENTIFIC MEMORANDA.

crossed the Fifth of March, with the S.W. wind of the 5th instant. A lot of sea-weed had grown upon it, and, being covered with numerous small stones, migrated with the stone to the north shore. Upon being lifted out, the stone weighed 3lb. 11oz., and the material of the plant, 2lb. 3oz. 10lb., a weight nearly of 6lb., which the buoyancy of the air, inclosed in small pods, had safely ferried over. The plant did not seem to be a full floating power; although some of the pods had been injured, enough remained entire to transport the stone; thus suggesting to all makers of floating jackets, chairs, and other contrivances to be creeks, never to inclose the air in one mass, but in a great number of small, each water-tight, and containing each a number of little balls of gas. A slight injury, such as perforation of a pin, may now at Macintosh float fatal.

CHARACTERISTIC ANECDOTE OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.

the following interesting paragraph, relating to his Majesty Louis Philippe, the Voss Gazette, a Swedish journal:—"On the 2d Vice-Consul of the 22d anniversary of his birth-day. On the same day he received from the King of the French, written with his own hand, a gold medal, bearing on one side the profile of his Majesty, and on the following inscription:—'Given by King Louis Philippe to M. C. Carlén, of the hospitality received at Hammarfest, in August, 1795.' The medal was dated at Neuilly, June 6, in these terms:—'It is always a pleasure to find that the traveller Muller has not been forgotten in a neglected simple guise, and unknown; and I always recall with joy to my mind. Among my recollections I give the first place to so frankly and cordially granted me, a stranger, throughout particularly in Norland and Finnmark; and at this moment, when five years since I made this journey into Norway has left me but one thing remaining, it is gratifying to me to be able to express to all, what grateful feelings I still entertain.'"

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1844.

[SIXPENCE.]

THE HARVEST.

AUGUST is drawing towards its end, and we are in the midst of Harvest—that season which, in all ages of the world, and among all races of men, has been one of peculiar interest. The development of commerce—the tendency of which is to render nations less dependent on themselves for their supply of food, by commanding others to sow and reap for them—purchasing the product of their toil by the fabrics of the steam-engine and the loom—may have lessened the interest attached to the word HARVEST—made it less absorbing than it was in a less artificial state of society—but still it appeals to feelings and associations that are among the best of our nature. As long as man shall be a tiller of the soil, directing his skill and strength to that toil by which the "earth is blessed with increase," so long must the recurrence of the season that crowns the year with plenty be hailed with gratitude and welcomed by rejoicing. Hope and fear are passed, and certainty has taken their place—a relief which none can conceive save those whose stake on the chances of the seasons is a heavy one. That period passed, they can look forward to a time of comparative cessation from the never-ending, still-beginning, toils of rural life; while to the trader of the town and the artisan of the crowded city it is of no less vital importance—for on the result of the month, the termination of which is approaching, depends the prosperity of trade, the elasticity of commerce, and the consequent employment and wages on which the very subsistence of such multitudes depends. It is unnecessary to trace the action and reaction of good or bad harvests on the entire system of society, but it is experienced throughout the whole fabric. Every class feels the benefit of plenty, and none can altogether escape the evils of scarcity; they fall of course with the greatest severity on the most destitute, but, good or bad, the results of the HARVEST produce effects that are all-inclusive; each succeeding year is a confirmation of the text that tells us, "The profit of the earth is for all; the King himself is served by the field."

There have been states wholly trading and commercial that depended entirely on the harvests of others, having neither fields nor granaries of their own. Venice was founded on a few islets in the midst of the sea, grew a rich and powerful republic, great in arts, arms, and commerce; she had no fertile plains to till, but she made the ocean her field, and the keels of her merchant ships were the ploughs that made it fruitful of all kinds of wealth to her. Holland, again, was a country almost rescued from the waters, and the people did not attempt that for which their soil was unfavourable; they grew but little grain, and imported it largely from others. But with these exceptions, the nations of Europe have in all times been compelled to engage in agriculture as the great means of procuring human support; the principle by which the division of labour takes place among individuals has not yet been established among nations, or we might, perhaps, see some countries devoted exclusively to the task of raising food for the others engaged wholly in manufactures; but the best condition seems to be produced by a due blending of the two pursuits in every country. Nations exclusively agricultural are often found to possess but a low state of physical comfort. England is an example of the co-existence of agriculture and manufactures to an immense extent, the whole of our population being absorbed by one or other of these pursuits, both making our land a scene of unexampled activity. Here, then, notwithstanding our crowded towns, our "torch-lit mazes, and noisy factories," our thousands who rarely see a green field, and to whom the processes of agriculture are perfect mysteries—who never see corn till it comes to them in the manufactured shape of bread, and who sometimes in that state see far too little of it—we have still among us the feelings of an agricultural people: many of those feelings and associations would be but ill exchanged for those of the life of the manufacturing system, which reduces each individual to a mere portion of the great machine, whirled on with it, with it broken, and with it cast aside.

Harvest and Harvest Home! How many and how beautiful are the associations connected with both! How frequently have they been taken by poetry for their themes! How frequently do we meet with them as illustrations of Divine truths in the pages of Scripture? The ears of corn plucked on the Sabbath gave the occasion for the sublime rebuke to the over-righteousness of the Pharisees. The parable of the sower is connected with one of the most interesting operations of husbandry, and the seed "sowed in corruption" only fully exemplifies the great and glorious truth which the Apostle preached, when it attains the fullness of Harvest! The "lilies of the field," who "toil not, neither do they spin," are cited as things that reprove the vain glory of the world; the tares sown by the enemy among the wheat give another beautiful illustration drawn from the more simple life of the husbandman; the whole story of Joseph and his brethren—the vision of the wheat-sheaves—the dream of the ears of corn—of the fat and lean kine—the seven years of plenty—the store-houses with which the wisdom of the Hebrew youth provided the land of Egypt—the visit of his brethren—the cup found in the mouth of Benjamin's sack—are all portions of a history, the events of which could only have occurred when agriculture was the general occupation of mankind. A land fertile in all good things, a land "flowing with milk and honey," was the reward promised to the Children of Israel. Neither must we forget the touching story of Ruth, who Stood in tears amid the alien corn.

Nor would it be amiss that all should remember the injunctions laid down in Holy Writ upon those whom Heaven has blessed with abundance, not to "muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn," not to deny the labourer his hire, nor to turn back for the sheaf forgotten in the field, but to let it be left for the poor and the needy. At no time should the spirit of charity prompt us more strongly than when the fruits of the earth are gathered in. These precepts are not dead, though they may be sleeping. May some recollection of them be present at many an English HARVEST HOME!

When we reflect on the thousand ills that a bad or insufficient harvest entails on the country, we cannot be too thankful for plenty and abundance. It relieves the labourer from the necessity of expending the greater part of his earnings in food; it keeps at home large masses of capital that must otherwise be sent abroad for the purchase of the food of which the supply is deficient at home; and that capital, employed in a thousand branches of enterprise, gives an elasticity and stimulus to trade and occupation, which would otherwise languish, entailing want and deprivation on thousands. Politicians may differ as they please on modes and theories of Government; but our worst evils are social evils, and of these the one most to be deplored is a bad and deficient HARVEST.

But beyond this there is another thing to be grateful for. Even the blessing of abundance may be marred by unpropitious weather at this critical period. Nothing is so much subjected to the "skiey influences" as the HARVEST. A wet, inclement August has often destroyed the most cherished hopes of the husbandman. Few spectacles can be more desolate or disheartening than to see the produce of the year's labour blackening and rotting beneath continued rains. The present season has not been quite exempt from anxiety of this kind; but for the last few days the weather, though with a tendency to changeableness, has not been unfavourable, and the accounts from all parts of the country are gratifying. Amid the wars and rumours of wars with which the world is at present rife, it is pleasing to be able to turn aside from them to the prospects held out by the pursuits of Peace, who, with a wreath of corn round her temples, and pouring abundance from her horn, is far more agreeable, either in an allegory or in fact, than any warrior of any nation, however great, crowned with the laurels that only spring from blood and tears!

MOGADORE.

MOGADORE.

By the Toulonnais of the 15th instant, containing intelligence from Tanager to the 7th, we learn that the French squadron was to sail positively on the 8th, to bombard Mogadore—hence destined to become the second point by the French in their attack on Morocco.

Mogadore, or Suze, as the Moghrebins call it, the port of the town of Morocco, lies on the Atlantic shore, between Cape Cantin and Cape Gher. It was founded in 1760. Mogadore is built on a low shore, consisting of moving sand, which extends from five to fifteen miles inland, where a fertile country begins. It is regularly built, the streets being straight, but somewhat narrow. The Europeans settled here have erected several large buildings in the African style. The town is divided into two parts, one of which is called the Fortress, and contains the Custom-house, the Palace of the Facha, the other public buildings, and the houses of Europeans; the other part is only inhabited by Jews. The harbour is formed by a small island, lying south-west of the town, and about two miles in circumference. At low tides there are only ten or twelve feet of water in the harbour, and large vessels are compelled to anchor without, at a distance of about two miles. The commerce of this place with London, Amsterdam, Cadiz, Leghorn, Genoa, the Canary Isles, Hamburg, and the United States of America, is considerable; and a great portion of the trade of two or three adjoining places has been transferred to this port. The population is stated at 10,000 to 12,000.

Morocco, or Morocco, the capital of the empire, engraved in our last number, is the residence of the Sultan. It is situated on level ground, four miles south of the river Tensift, and is surrounded by a strong wall, thirty feet high, with square turrets at every fifty paces; the walls being nearly six miles in circuit. The houses are one storied, and have flat roofs and terraces, like those in Spain. Large aqueducts surround the city, and are continued southward towards the Atlas, in some places to a distance of twenty miles. On the south of the town is the Imperial Palace, with its gardens, enclosed by a wall 1,500 yards long, by 600 wide. There are nineteen mosques, two colleges or medreses, and one hospital in the town. The principal mosque has a tower 220 feet high, of masterly architecture. Captain Washington states the population not to exceed 100,000, perhaps not above 80,000, including 5,000 Jews; but it has been much reduced by plague and famine.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The French papers, as may be well imagined, are fully occupied with the feat of the Prince de Joinville before Targier. Of course they consider it as a most extraordinary achievement, and make of it a subject of abundant invocations of the skill, bravery, and seamanship of his Royal Highness. Elsewhere we have given the latest and most authentic particulars of the bombardment, together with the opinions of British naval officers upon the subject. As will be seen, they form a strong contrast with the views of the Parisian journalists in regard to the skill displayed by those engaged in the affair—action it can hardly be called. The Nation it is worthy of remark, does not treat this attack as an achievement of the nation, but speaks of it as the "commencement of the campaign."

The affair at Tahiti seems to be almost forgotten in Paris since the more attractive occurrence of the bombardment of Targier. The anxiety of the Parisians, however, has not yet been gratified by the perusal of any authentic detail upon the subject, the Government not having yet thought fit to publish the Prince de Joinville's despatches. The delay of course excites the displeasure of the Paris journals in a high degree.

The Revue de Paris says, that when the news of the attack on Targier reached Nelly, the King and the royal family could not at first restrain the emotion which the "patriotic enthusiasm" of the Prince de Joinville naturally excited in their breasts. Among the Ministers who concurred in that feeling was M. Villeneuve, whose air and manner excited a marvellous ardour.

According to the Constitutionnel the news reached his Majesty while at dinner. "His Majesty (says that paper) read the despatch, and, telling it up, put it into his pocket, with this brief observation, 'C'est bien.' 'It is well.' 'That is the truth (says a Paris letter) far as it goes; but the King did not confide in it to that extent. His words were, 'C'est bien. Voilà qui fera faire la marine à vapeur.' 'It is well. He did something that will make the work, so much at least.'"

One of the Paris papers contains the following estimate of the force of the Prince de Joinville's squadron:—

- "Le Suffren, 90 guns, one of the finest ships in the French navy.
- "Le Jean-Majet, 100 guns.
- "Le Tigris, 80 guns, which, besides the usual ordnance, contains half a battery of Paish's mortars.
- "La Reine Marie Louise, 64 guns.
- "Guerreille steam corvette, of 120 horse power and 6 guns.
- "Pluton steam corvette, 220 horse power, 6 guns.
- "Amazilli steam corvette, 450 horse power, and 28 guns.
- "Rocin, a steamer of 160 horse power, and 6 guns.
- "Pardier, brig armed of 20 guns.
- "Besides three last five ships," adds the journal in question, "which form part of the naval division, several steamers employed on the service of Algeria are daily detached for its wants. They are the Gringalet, Corpe, Paque, and the Coccy, of 200 horse power. The various ships and vessels of the squadron form a total of 324 pieces of ordnance, not including howitzers and mortars of la Pairie. In these ships and vessels there are altogether 1200 men, not including, however, the engineer and artillery companies. It is rumored that a reinforcement of several ships were to be sent to the Prince de Joinville."

A domestic topic of considerable interest has appeared in the Parisian press—namely the dissolution of the well known Polytechnic School. The explanation of the motives which led to this step is thus given:—Some of the students of the school refused to submit to be examined by a M. Dubuvel, one of the professors, who, they contended, had not been regularly or in conformity with the statutes of the establishment, appointed, inasmuch as he had been irregularly named by the Minister of War, of his own private authority. The first students called before the examiner declined answering his questions, and were instantly expelled. The whole school followed their example, and business was suspended while waiting the decision of the Minister of War. The Minister was in the country, and accordingly an ordinance appeared in the Moniteur, appointing the Minister of Marine (Admiral Mahan), Minister of War of interim. This was followed by another, dissolving the school. Next day, however, appeared another ordinance, appointing Marshal Bugey. The papers state that this strange measure was considered to be a mistake, and characterize it as a buffoonery. In some quarters it was supposed that Marshal Bugey was opposed to the half step of the dissolution of the school. On the other hand, he was appointed to the direction of the War Department is attributed to some motive for increased activity in regard to Morocco.

The Constitutionnel says, that the Academy of Sciences has appointed a secret committee to report on the circumstances connected with the dissolution of the Polytechnic School.

According to accounts from Algiers of the 14th inst., the son of the Emperor of Morocco had arrived on the frontier of Algeria, with a column of troops, and established his camp at Kouad-el-Mouly Abderrachman, within four leagues and a half of the West of Morocco. The same letters state that Abd-el-Kader had retired to the West of Morocco. The last advices from the camp of Marshal Bugey, dated the 12th inst., make no mention of any new engagement. The Marshal was to have come to Egypt on the 10th, to receive a colony of provisions, but he had informed the Governor of Oran that he could not at present leave his camp. The Revue de Paris, dated the 10th, states that the Marshal, having a transport laden with biscuit, Colonel Eynard wrote on the 10th ult. from Breda, that he had penetrated into the territory of the Oued-el-Nahr, four leagues beyond the frontier of Morocco. After a night's march through a broken country, he surprised the enemy at break of day, killed twenty men, took twenty-five prisoners, and captured 2000 head of cattle. The clouds had made overtures of peace, and were treating for their submission, at the date of Colonel Eynard's dispatch.

SPAIN.

Letters from Madrid to the 14th inst., state that a French naval officer, M. de Pons, had arrived from Paris, with despatches for the Duke de Gluckberg, who was to have left in the evening with dispatches for Cadiz. M. de Gluckberg was appointed Chargé d'Affaires at France in Morocco, and had full powers to conclude a treaty of peace with Abderrachman. He was to wait at Cadiz for orders from the Prince de Joinville. The accounts from that city of the 10th, and from Gibraltar of the 9th, and nothing to the intelligence already received. The Constitutionnel of Cadiz says that the Prince still remained before Targier, with the Buffins, but that the remainder of the squadron had sailed for Larache and Mogador, where he would soon join them, with a reinforcement of gunboats and other vessels, then on their way from France. It was the intention of the Prince to effect a landing on a small island which commands Mogador, and to occupy that town. The Spanish squadron had retired to Algiers.

It is said that, as the French require the expulsion of Abd-el-Kader from Morocco, the Emperor also intends on that of Marshal Bugey from Algiers.

The Queen left Barcelona on the 13th inst., and was expected at Madrid on the 23d.

Madrid remains quiet, with the exception of some partial quarrels between the Old Royal Volunteers and the National Guards.

PORTUGAL.

Our letters from Lisbon of the 14th inst. announce the occurrence of a crisis of an important character. Two decrees had been published, signed by the Queen and countersigned by the Ministers, and the promulgation had produced great excitement, not from the character of the decrees themselves, but because the exercise of legislative functions without the sanction of the legislature itself is considered as an unconstitutional act and likely to lead to further measures of despotism.

The first decree states that her Majesty in consideration of the urgent necessity which exists for curtailing the public expenditure, so that it shall not exceed the revenue, prohibits the accumulation of two or more salaries or pensions from the state, in the person of any one individual, with the exception of good service pensions, and gratuities for military commands.

The second decree, however, is the most obnoxious to the people, as it brings the judges, who according to the Charter are independent of the Crown, under its control so far as to subject them to removal from one place to another, and even to the colonies, at the will of the Minister. The state of subjection to which this will reduce them will at once appear, when it is considered that the government, by threatening to remove any judge to Angola or some other place on the coast of Africa, will always have him completely at their command.

The official paper vindicates these decrees, on the ground that the ministers of Great Britain at various times had issued extra constitutional decrees, and had invariably obtained bills of indemnity from Parliament.

The consequence of this, however, is, that according to our accounts from Lisbon, the ferment in the public mind was far beyond the excitement of any former agitation since the days of Don Miguel. The judges of the several orders held meetings on the 13th inst., and appointed committees to prepare protests, and signify their determination to continue in the exercise of their judicial functions, and to continue in their judicial situations till driven from them by physical force. The Duke of Palencia has characterized the decrees as an act of despotism.

It was generally feared at Lisbon that these decrees would lead to disturbances, if not to insurrection, but neither Cabral did not appear to be intimidated, and indeed it was reported that he intended to proceed to the extremity of dissolving the Cortes. To give an idea of the character of the decrees in question, it may not be amiss to state that a former minister, Viscount de Sa de Botelho, gave this description of one of them:—"This decree, abolishing the constitutional charter, places the nation in a similar situation to that in which it stood in 1826, in consequence of the destruction of the fundamental law of the state."

BUCENOS AIRES.

According to the latest news from Buenos Aires, the Dictator Rosas had issued a decree forbidding the Buenos Ayreans, either male or female, to wear any other mourning on the death of their friends than a narrow band of black round the arms. Black dresses of all kinds are strictly prohibited, and as no one who has any regard for his own life will display an insubordinate and unbecoming trait, the usual signs of mourning have disappeared from the republic. Another decree has been issued by Rosas, forbidding any one who is not a Roman Catholic to exercise a profession of a scholastic in the Argentine Republic. This decree will at once close several of the best schools in Buenos Aires.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Dee mail steamer has arrived from the West Indies, bringing accounts to the following dates:—Demerara, Trinidad, and St. Kitt's the 29th, St. Vincent's and Dominica the 20th, Antigua the 23d, Jamaica the 26th, and St. Lucia the 25th ult.

Very little information worthy of notice is supplied from any of these colonies. The sugar duty question was the chief topic of discussion with the Jamaica press. The weather there was rather favorable, although it still exhibited the peculiarity which has prevailed all the season, of rain falling copiously at one place, and none at all at another, within very short distances of each other.

There are no definite accounts from Cuba, but the general impression at Jamaica is that the Governor had proceeded against the alleged conspirators with great severity, and it is still asserted including a number of British subjects. Accounts had just been received from Hayti, stating that Acas had surrendered to the Government of Port au Prince, and was afterwards imprisoned with two of his generals, Augustin and Louis. Nothing had been learned of what had occurred previous to his surrender, but it was presumed that he had either been defeated in action or abandoned by his troops without fighting.

LAND INTELLIGENCE.

THE LINENDRAPHY TRADE.—The Court of Bankruptcy on Tuesday came to a decision in the case of Charles Matman, who had carried on the business of a wheel sale hampster, in Friday-street. The previous examinations, as will be recollected, elicited some strange disclosures relative to the linendraphy trade. Among other points, the bankrupt's accounts had been objected to, in consequence of the small profits which appeared to have been made on transactions to the amount of £38,626, and as no amended balance-sheet, he gave a long statement of his various purchases, showing the manner in which he had disposed of his goods whether at a profit, at a loss, or at cost price. The bankrupt underwent a lengthened examination relative to this profit and loss account, but being quite a matter of figures, the detail would be very uninteresting. One curious fact transpired in the evidence, viz., that in the trade a description of goods called "leading articles," were sold at a small profit, and even sometimes at a loss, to induce purchasers to take other goods, which would yield ten or twelve per cent. Ultimately the bankrupt passed, on the understanding that he immediately apply for his certificate.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

ALLEGED TREASON.—THE CASE OF MR. NEWTON.—At the assizes at Gloucester, on Saturday last, a case was tried—Newton v. Hollett and others. The plaintiff contended his own case in person; the defendants were represented by Mr. Sergeant Telford and Mr. Gowers. It was an action of trespass, brought by Augustus Newton, of Cheltenham, against Robert Stanger Hollett, Esq., the late high sheriff of that county, and four other defendants, officers and assistants of the sheriff, for an alleged trespass in breaking into the plaintiff's house, in order to execute a writ against the defendant under a civil process for debt. The plaintiff did not long linger, brought a similar action at Westminster for the identical transaction, only in a different form, and then recovered £20 damages. The facts of the case must be familiar to our readers. The result was that the jury found a verdict for the defendant, finding that the sum of forty shillings, which had been paid into court, was sufficient to satisfy the damages in the case.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE POISONING CASE AT STEPNEY.

On Wednesday morning, James Cockburn Holley was tried at the Central Criminal Court before Mr. Baron Gurney and Mr. Justice Wigham, for the murder of his wife Rachel Holley at Stepney.

The indictment contained four counts. The first charged him with having, on the 5th of June, at the parish of Saint Dunstan, Stepney, unlawfully administered to Rachel Holley, a large quantity of a deadly poison, called prussic acid, which she then and there took into her body, and from the effects of which she then and there died.

In a second count, the prisoner was charged with the same offence upon Rachel Holley.

The third count varied the form of the charge; and the fourth charged the prisoner with the wilful murder of a woman, whose name was unknown.

The prisoner, who was dressed in black, and appeared perfectly calm and collected, listened attentively to the reading of the indictment, and pleaded Not Guilty in a firm tone.

The Solicitor-General, Mr. Rodkin, and Mr. M. Chambers, conducted the prosecution on behalf of the crown. Mr. Ellis, Q. C., and Mr. Clarkson, defended the prisoner.

The Solicitor-General having stated the case for the prosecution, called witnesses in support of it. As most of the facts will be in the recollection of our readers, the case having created a great sensation when first transpired, it is not necessary to go minutely into the evidence, but we submit a correct outline of it, which comprises every thing essential for a proper understanding of the whole affair.

The first witness was Mrs. Matilda Hegenstall, who was examined by Mr. Rodkin; I live in Green street, Stepney. On the 4th of June last the prisoner came to my house about one o'clock, with Mr. Holman and Mrs. Holman. They took the front and back parlours for one week certain, and came in at half-past four the same afternoon. Mr. Holman died by himself. They took tea together. Captain Clark and Mr. Holman were with them. They went out to the theatre in the evening. Mr. and Mrs. Holman returned home a half after twelve that night. Mrs. Holman seemed quite well. Next morning (Wednesday), a little after seven o'clock, my servant sent to a black draught for Mrs. Holman. I heard Mrs. Holman cry. She stood at home in bed, and appeared to have been sick several times during the day. She got up, and I saw her on the sofa. She appeared poorly. The prisoner went out, and stood out all the afternoon. In the evening Captain Clark and his daughter, Mrs. M. Kachan, came and stood with her. On Thursday morning they went out together, and stood out till five in the evening. I did not see Mrs. Holman. They had some tea with tea. Captain Clark spent the evening with him. Captain Clark and the prisoner went out together to purchase some salmon, and they returned to supper. There was a prisoner in the room. On Friday morning they rose and went out together. Mrs. Holman made no complaint of illness. On Wednesday evening the prisoner told me Mrs. Holman was much better; it was only the fatigue of travelling. They were out the whole afternoon of Friday, until half-past nine. I saw her in the parlour after that hour. She was sitting at the table apparently quite well, and the prisoner was stretched upon the sofa. On Saturday morning, shortly before seven o'clock, I heard both their voices in conversation. About a quarter of twenty minutes to eight I was called by Mr. Reaney. He said, "Mrs. M., come up here; my wife is very ill." I went up immediately. The room door was open, and my servant came there at the same time. The foot of the bed was on the right hand, and a chest of drawers was against the door. The wash-hand stand was in the recess by the chimney, and there was a small table and a chair by the head of the bed. When the servant and I went into the room, I saw Mrs. Holman lying on the bed. The bed-linen were all thrown up against the wall. She had no cap on, and nothing but her night-dress. She was quite motionless, and I said at once, "She is dead, indeed, Sir." Her eyes were closed, her mouth was set, and, having a good deal, and something coming from it like chewed biscuit. I looked her up. The prisoner was standing close by the fireplace. I spoke to him. I said, "I have seen many dies, and my dear girls in many dies; but I never saw a die like this." He said she had many dies before, but not like this; she would not come out of it. I said, "What do you mean? Do you mean she will not come to? Pray do something; pray send for a doctor; pray send for a doctor." He said, "I am a doctor myself; I would have let blood, but she has no pulse." He had a lancet in his hand. I said, "I don't care whether you are a doctor or not, two heads are better than one; pray send for a doctor." I offered to send for one, and he said, "Do send for him." He said it was an affection of the heart, and that her mother died of a similar attack nine months ago. She had no sign of life, but breathing convulsively, with her mouth shut that fact. The force of convulsion was so strong as to throw the foam in my face several times. Mr. Holman placed his hand upon her heart and said there was no beat. Whilst my servant was away Mr. Holman assisted me in putting Mrs. Holman's feet in hot water. After the girl came back he put the pall in the bed and placed her hands in it. I complained of the heat of her head, and he put some of the vinegar on her head. Captain Clark came, and he took a clothes-brush and began to rub her legs. I ordered a mustard poultice. It was brought, and I think Captain Clark put it on her chest. She died in about twenty minutes after I came. She gasped twice after Captain Clark came in. The prisoner was by all the time. Mrs. M. Kachan came, and I sent her for a doctor. She went for Mr. Garrett. When he arrived, death had taken place. I had asked Mr. Holman what she had taken. He said, "Only a little soda." I saw a glass or small tumbler on the table close to the head of the bed. It was one-third full of something clear, white as water. On the other side of the bed there was an empty tumbler, some salts, and a teaspoon. On the chest of drawers there was nothing. There was no broken glass about the room. There was no peculiar smell in the room. Mrs. M. Kachan had a phial of lavender water which Mrs. Holman had given her, and she sprinkled the room with it. I had been in the room that morning soon after she died. I saw a letter folded ready for the post on the table. Another partly written. There was no phial. The phial which had contained the black draught had been removed on the Thursday previously. I saw it on the kitchen dresser. The rooms were small, and the sliding doors were of the usual size.

They were kept closed by the drawers. A person could of course hear anything which passed in one room in the other.

The witness was cross-examined, but nothing material was elicited.

Nath Williams, the servant to Mrs. Hegenstall, was next examined, and deposed what had taken place just as her mistress had done.

Mr. M. Brown Garrett, a surgeon, who had assisted at the post mortem examination with Mr. Vastell and Mr. Culling, said—"We found the organs healthy generally. In the stomach there was a strong odour of prussic acid. The stomach was washed up and sent to the London Hospital. Mr. Holman said on the way with Captain Clark in the evening and inquired what was the cause of death. I said we had not finished our examination. In the evening about ten o'clock, he called again with Captain Clark and Mr. Holman, as before. He then made a statement. He said he had been in the habit of using prussic acid, and on that morning (Saturday) he had broken the bottle in trying to get the stopper with a tooth-brush. He had poured the contents of the bottle into a tumbler, and placed it upon the drawers, intending to preserve it. That he afterwards sat down to write to his friends, and shortly afterwards he heard a scream from the bedroom. He went in, and found his wife convulsed. She said she had taken the burning stuff in the tumbler, and begged to have some cold water. She then became convulsed and insensible. He added that he was so distressed and annoyed he did not wish to mention his negligence, and he was exceedingly sorry he had not done so at the time. I asked what he had done with the bottle, and he said he had thrown it away in some waste place in the neighbourhood. I am of opinion that the deceased died from having taken prussic acid."

Mr. Culling also deposed to the presence of prussic acid, and, on cross-examination, said he had often presented it medicinally.

Dr. Leathbury, a lecturer on chemistry, at the London Hospital, described the proper treatment in cases where prussic acid had been taken. He said that he had heard the evidence, and was of opinion that there was time for hope and recovery so long as there was breath. He could not say what quantity of prussic acid Mrs. Holman had taken.

Dr. Anthony Todd Thompson also gave some scientific explanations as to the effects of prussic acid. He described the effects of the poison much in the same way as Dr. Leathbury.

Dr. Douglass: I am a surgeon in Whitehorse-street, Stepney. I knew the prisoner. He called at my house while I was out, on the 6th June, a day or so on the 10th. He called in the evening about seven o'clock. He then got some prussic acid and acetate of morphine, carbonate of soda, tartaric acid, &c., &c., and some other drugs. He said the prussic acid he had been in the habit of taking about four years ago. That it was too weak, and he wanted some stronger and purer. I promised to procure it for him, and I did procure some of Stoll's solution. He called the next morning and took the prussic acid and the acetate of morphine. The morphine was in a drachm bottle. The prussic acid was in a stoppered phial. On the following Tuesday he came to me, and said that the stopper of the bottle had broken. In consequence, he had poured the contents into a tumbler, and his wife had poured some water into it, and in mistake had drunk it. He wished me to attend the inquest. I did not attend, because I had to attend a case of stabbing.

Cross-examined by Mr. Clarkson: I was aware, when I knew him four years ago, that he was in the habit of using prussic acid.

Dr. Leathbury re-examined: The acetate of morphine would be slow in its effects, and really known. Time would be given by it for removing the contents of the stomach, and applying remedies.

Thomas Long, groomer at the City of London Tower Hamlets Cemetery, examined by the Solicitor-General: The prisoner called on me with two gentlemen on the 5th of June to take a burial place. They called for the Tuesday following. They wanted a brick grave. I said it could not be ready, and then they agreed to have a common grave. The prisoner went and sat down on a grave, with his handkerchief to his eyes, as if crying. Captain Clark said I would hear no more of the burying until the Monday.

Inspector Haynes: I went down to North Sunderland and got these letters from a Mr. Bell, whom I saw there, and these from a cupboard in the prisoner's house.

George Gray Bell: I live at North Sunderland. I was agent to some home works there, in which prisoner was a partner. They are carried on under the firm of Holman and Bell. The prisoner left for London on the 1st of June last. I received a letter from him subsequently, which I gave up to Inspector Haynes. These are them. They are numbered one to six. These two will be, also, I think, in the prisoner's handwriting. I know the copybook property which he had used to the late Mrs. Holley, mother of Mrs. Holman. It was let at £100 a year, but let for more now. It is worth about £200 as all, as purchase. The two were also valuable, worth, probably, £200, including the share of a colliery. I made an estimate of the value of all the property, which was something above £600. I heard Mr. Holman talking of an excursion so long ago as September, 1843, and frequently afterwards, up to the time of their actual departure for London. He spoke of showing London to Mrs. B. and young himself to see some scenery on the Rhine. He kept a number of books. They appeared to live very happily together. I never saw anything but apparent happiness between Mr. and Mrs. Holman. I was put into the position of agent by Mr. Holman. He had full control of the time works, and managed as he pleased. There was a house building on the coast which property for them.

By Mr. Baron Gurney: Mrs. Holman was about 22 years of age, and very comely.

Mr. John Dintling: I am a farmer at Elphard, about a mile and half from North Sunderland. In the month of June last, I found, on my return home on Monday, the 10th, between ten and eleven o'clock, a letter from the prisoner. I destroyed it. I believe it was dated the 6th June, from the Eastern Hotel. I recollect the contents. I think the prisoner stated that he had not been able to get down to Avon races; that I would be sorry to hear that his wife had been very unwell; that he had two doctors attending her; that he had been obliged to remove her to private lodgings, and he feared he would be unable to take her to the Rhine. He was about to take her to his brother's, at Arlington, or keep her in London, as he feared that what had happened before was about to happen again. I understood by that a miscarriage, which I was aware Mrs. Holman had had before.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ellis: Mr. and Mrs. Holman appeared, so far as I saw, to live happily. I never stopped in the house. Never longer than merely while calling. I heard them speak about the excursion to London. Mrs. Holman was anxious to see London, and to go to Arlington.

Pool was then given of the time the letters alluded to had been posted. Mr. George Scott: I am registrar of deaths and births at North Sunderland. I registered the death of Mrs. Holley in July, 1843. I called upon Mr. Holman for the particulars, he having called upon me to register. When I asked him the cause of death he stammered and said, "Well, you may say bilious fever." He then signed the book. [The entry was put in and read.]

The wife were here put in and read. They were dated 15th May. One he questioned all the property of James Cockburn Holley to his wife Rachel Holley, and the other bequeathed all the property of Rachel Holley to her husband James Cockburn Holley.

Six letters were then read by Mr. Sirright, and several others written subsequently to the inquest.

The letters were all published some time since, but it may be as well to mention the most material parts of them, and their supposed bearing upon the charge made against the prisoner.

The first was a letter dated from the Eastern Hotel on the 5th of June, and addressed to Mr. Bell, the agent at Sunderland, in which the prisoner said that he and his wife had arrived safe in London, and that Mrs. Holman was unwell from the fatigue of the journey, but expressing a hope that she would soon be better.

The next letter was addressed to the same person, and bore the same date, and in this letter the prisoner represented that his wife was very ill, and that she had been attended by two medical gentlemen, who had expressed their opinion that she would miscarry, there being no foundation for this statement.

The third letter was dated the 8th June, at which time the deceased was dead. In it he represented the prisoner represented that his wife continued very ill, and had been attended by a medical gentleman, who expressed his opinion that she was suffering from disease of the heart, and that he himself feared it was the case.

In another letter, dated June 9, the prisoner represented that "the worst had come to pass;" his beloved Rachel was no more, and that, in consequence of her dying so suddenly, and among strangers, it had been resolved to take a coroner's inquest upon her, and that a post-mortem examination was to take place, adding that as he could not make any objection to such a course.

In another letter, written to Mr. Bell, the prisoner, after describing himself to be almost in a state of frenzy, gave an account of the manner in which the deceased had met her death, and represented that he had passed some medicine, that he was in the habit of taking, on the drawers in the bedroom, and while he was in the adjoining room, the deceased had got up, and being taken sick, had poured out a water in the glass, not perceiving the medicine, and had drunk a portion of it, the result of which was that she died in a few minutes. The letter went on to say, that immediate assistance was rendered, but it was of no avail, and he accounted for not having at once told this story by saying that he was in such a state of mind that he did not know what he was about.

Several other letters of a similar character written by the prisoner to various friends, were also read. In one of them the prisoner represented that he had accidentally broken the neck of the bottle which contained the poison, and that he poured a portion of it into a tumbler, which the deceased had accidentally drunk.

The Solicitor-General said this was the case for the prosecution.

Mr. Ellis then addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner. He commenced by entreating them to dismiss from their minds all they had heard upon the subject of the charge against the prisoner out of doors, and proceeded to state that there would be no difficulty as to the cause of death, which was clearly occasioned by prussic acid, and the only question for the jury was whether the prisoner had wilfully administered that poison to his wife and with the intent to murder her, and this was the point which the jury had to decide. He then proceeded to remark that the evidence showed the prisoner to be a man of respectability. He had contracted what appeared to be a happy marriage. There was no imputation of any real affection, and yet, without any apparent motive whatever, the jury were called upon to say that he had committed the most enormous crime that could possibly be committed by any human being. He begged the jury to remember that it was impossible that there could be any pecuniary motive for this act, for it was proved that from the moment of his marriage the whole of the property had been placed in his uncontrolled possession. The copybook property was handed over to him, and he might have done what he pleased with it, therefore there could not have been any pecuniary motive to induce him to commit the murder. The will that had been referred to gave the prisoner to more power over the property than he possessed before; for by his death the property became his, and if his wife had died first, the whole would have devolved upon him. With regard to the letters being dated from the Kingston Hotel, the prisoner and his wife had left that establishment, it is thought, he is answered, he very easily accounted for by the fact that the prisoner had been at no time in the house in which they were living in a small apartment, but desired to have it thought that they were at a stylish place like the Kingston Hotel. It should also be recollected that the place where the prisoner did take up his abode was of all others the only part of London where he had any friends, and he would ask that it was likely that he would have chosen such a spot for the commission of a cold and deliberate murder. The learned counsel then proceeded to remark upon the other facts of the case, and he said it certainly appeared that the prisoner's statement that two medical men were in attendance upon his wife was not true, but the prisoner's explanation was that if the illness of Mrs. Bellamy had continued, it was his intention to have called in medical assistance. As to the possession of the poisonous articles, he should be in a position most satisfactorily to account for this circumstance, that the prisoner had for several years laboured under dyspepsia, and the only means of relief was the administration of strong acids. He then remarked upon the effect on which, it was proved, existed between the prisoner and his wife, and this kind manner in which he had ministered to her comfort, and asked the jury whether they could reconcile such conduct with the belief that the prisoner all along intended to carry out a deliberate plan of murdering his unoffending victim. He contended that the prisoner's story, as to the manner in which the poison had been taken by the deceased, was most probable, and that it was borne out by all the circumstances spoken to by the witnesses. It certainly was a most mysterious case, and he begged the jury to recollect that they were inquiring into the intention of their fellow-men—an intention which could only be known to God; and he therefore implored them, if they possessed that single doubt, to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt, and acquit him.

At the conclusion of the address of the learned counsel, the Court adjourned until Thursday morning.

SECOND DAY—ACQUITTALES OF THE PRISONER.
The trial was resumed and concluded on Thursday. The prisoner looked more calm than on the preceding day.

The first witness called by the counsel for the prisoner was Mr. Robert Kitchener; he was examined by Mr. Kite, and stated—I am a surgeon residing at Kabletown, Northumberland, and know the prisoner, Mr. J. C. Bellamy. He consulted me on the state of his health; he thought he was suffering from disease of the heart, and told me he also suffered from dyspepsia. I recommended him to take a bitter infusion with a few drops of prussic acid, and an alternate pill; I also advised him to take morphia, which was a preparation of opium. I had opportunities of seeing the prisoner after his marriage; he appeared to treat his wife with unvarying kindness, and she appeared to entertain reciprocal feelings towards him. His general conduct was, as far as my knowledge extends, that of an unassuming kindred.

Mrs. Bellamy, who had been examined with Mrs. Kelly (the deceased) for many years before her marriage, deposed that Mr. Bellamy's conduct to her was very affectionate. A Mrs. Wilson gave similar testimony.

Mr. Frederick Robert Bellamy, brother of the prisoner, examined by Mr. Kite: Had visited his brother and his wife, and had opportunities of seeing that they lived very happily and affectionately together, while I was with them in Northumberland. I had some conversation about his making his will. On two occasions I jumped out of the carriage when he was driving. He drove very carefully, and sometimes let the reins fall from his hand upon the horse's heels. On my return I mentioned it to his wife, and she told me of several accidents that he had had. I then said that a person who ran such risks ought to make his will. He was some time in great pain by being laid down to the sea to get his face wet.

Several witnesses deposed to the affectionate conduct of Mr. Bellamy to his wife.

Captain William Denew Clarke, examined by Mr. Kite: I live at 7, King-street, Mile-end Old Town, and am a master mariner. I was present when Mrs. Bellamy was dying. The prisoner appeared in a very distressed state of mind. He had a lancet in his hand. The first observation he made was, that he would never recover. He exclaimed, "My God, this is entirely through my own neglect," and, "I am the cause of all this through my gross neglect." I did not put any question as to the making of this. I had conversed with him the day previously, for taking her down into the Tyne in the state in which she then was; I had also told him that he ought not to have brought her so long a journey; and when I heard his exclamation in the manner described, I thought he referred to his having done so. After the melancholy event, they were all agreed on the expediency of holding an inquest, and the prisoner offered objection. A woman came to lay out the body, and was going to take away the clothes of the deceased, at which the prisoner was very indignant, and said, he would rather give her money than that she should take away the last things which his poor wife had had on. I never had the least idea that there was anything strange or unfair in the death of Mrs. Bellamy. I walked with the prisoner on Monday evening, when he returned to the subject of "his neglect." He stopped in the street, and said abruptly, and said, "Oh, my God, Mr. Clarke, I am the sole cause of my wife's death!" I began to think this strange, and said, "What do you mean, doctor?" He said, "Why, my wife has taken poison—prussic acid." I replied, "Good God! what have you given your wife prussic acid?" He answered, "No; thank God, I have not that to charge myself with," and then told the story about the glass having been left on the drawers.

Cross-examined by Mr. Bodkin: He said she would not recover, and added, that her poor mother had died in the same manner, of a diseased heart.

Peter M. Ardy, examined by Mr. Bodkin: When I took the prisoner into custody he was rather in an excited state. Down stairs, when he was taking leave of his brother, he was very much so. When I told him what he was charged with, he exclaimed, "Oh, God!" and sank down in the chair. Afterwards said to his brother, "Now was one of you, Oh, Ardy, Ardy, why do you take on so?" and subsequently he said, in an under tone—"Oh, my angel, my angel, I have caused this; I am a murderer!"

Mrs. King, assistant to Mrs. Roberts, who keeps a bonnet-shop in the Mile-end road, proved that the prisoner behaved in a most affectionate manner to the deceased, when they came to purchase a bonnet. She made a remark to some other person in consequence of seeing this conduct.

Mr. Selvin, of Milton Spring, Yorkshire, knew Mr. Bellamy, and had visited him for the purpose of banking. He had had opportunities of witnessing his conduct towards his wife, which was remarkable for humanity and kindness. Knew him when he was in prison. He was a person of very careless habits; his medicines were very much thrown about.

The evidence being concluded, Mr. Bodkin replied on the part of the prosecution. The learned counsel explained that the Government had undertaken the prosecution because some of the friends of the deceased lady had intimated the main ground on which he understood the defence to be founded was the inadequacy of the test by which it would accuse the prisoner of the commission of this heinous crime. He said it would be to deliberate from the legitimate force of that argument, or from the effect of the character which the prisoner had received, but he feared that the smiles of courts of justice contemplated the position that a crime was never committed without an adequate motive, and it would be a most dangerous doctrine to lay down to make the morality of the crime itself an excuse for its commission. He then called the attention of the jury to the marriage of the 8th of June, and the account which the prisoner gave of the circumstances attending his wife's death. He had stated that he was in the adjoining room. Now, could that be true; or was it not the fact that he was in the room at the time his wife swallowed the poison? He says he placed the poison on the drawers, and then it was suggested that having taken the salts, she poured water into the glass containing prussic acid, and drank it, and also ate some biscuits to put the taste out of her mouth. Now the probability was that whoever gave her the salts gave her the prussic acid. It was a part of the case on which the learned counsel for the defence had not touched. No attempt had been made to impeach the accuracy of the medical evidence, according to which it appeared that in all cases of this nature all power of volition ended with the throat, which was a convulsive action of the respiratory organs, and yet they were asked to believe that the deceased had gone to the drawers, swallowed the poison, and afterwards walked back to her bed, and spoken to the prisoner and told him what had happened. If the medical testimony was to be believed, such an occurrence was impossible. The learned counsel, after commenting upon the other features of the evidence, said, if the jury could entertain any doubt as to the prisoner's guilt, it would be intermeddled for to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt; but if they could entertain no such doubt, it would be their duty—and however painful that duty might be, he was convinced they would not shrink from its performance—then, he repeated, it would be their painful duty to pronounce him guilty.

Mr. Baron Gurney then summed up the evidence. The crime charged against the prisoner was that of the most odious nature—the crime of murder; and the person whom he was charged with murdering was a one whom he was bound to protect and to cherish, for she was his wife; she was young, and beautiful, and beautiful. The case differed from most other cases that had come under his observation, for the doubt in other cases generally arose as to the person who committed, and the means by which the crime was committed. Here there was no doubt of that kind, for it was perfectly clear that the prisoner was the person who purchased the poison, and that that poison was the means of the death of his wife. If the jury were of opinion that he had administered the poison himself, or had left it in her way, knowing she would take it, they would find the prisoner guilty; but if he had not administered it himself, or had not left it in her way with a guilty intent, the prisoner was not guilty of any crime whatever, however blameworthy his want of caution might be.

After they retired to consider their verdict.

After an absence of about an hour, they returned with a verdict of—NOT GUILTY.

Mr. Bellamy was released from Newgate immediately after the verdict of Not Guilty was returned.

THE TECHNICALITIES OF LAW.—Edward Brown, a young man of respectable appearance, was tried on Monday, on an indictment for obtaining £250, the moneys of Edward Arden, by false pretences. The circumstances under which the charge was made against the prisoner were these:—It appeared that the prisoner is a solicitor in Gray's Inn-square, and in March last the defendant was introduced to him, and some communications took place between them. The defendant eventually procured a bill of exchange for £250 10s., which purported to bear very respectable endorsements, and requested the prisoner to advance him money upon it, and on the representations made by him the prisoner did advance, in two sums, the amount of £250; but when the bill became due it was dishonoured, and upon that taking place the present charge was instituted against the defendant. Upon the cross-examination of the prisoner he stated that he had not been bound over by the magistrates, or held in recognisances to prosecute the present charge. The Solicitor General took two technical objections to the proceedings: the first being that the offence was said to have been committed in London, when, in point of fact, it appeared to have taken place in Middlesex; and, secondly, that the Act of Parliament constituting the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court required that, as far as the county of Middlesex was concerned, it was necessary that parties should be bound in recognisances to prosecute. The Recorder held the objections to be valid, and under his direction the Jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty."

POLICE.

A SERIES OF ROBBERIES BY THE SON OF A CARRIAGEMAN.—Last week we gave a report of the examination of Terence Clarke, a young man of inferior education, and mixing in a respectable sphere, on a charge of robbing a gentleman named Lewis, at Hoxton, under singular circumstances. The prisoner was examined at Worship-street on Tuesday, when several robberies of a similar character were proved against him. Sergeant Rogers, of the Division of police, who apprehended the prisoner on the 28th inst. in Queen-street, Newgate, and obtained possession of nine pawnbrokers' duplicates, brought forward several gentlemen, owners of portions of the property found in pawn.—Mr. Richard King Pierce, a young surgeon living in chambers in Child's place, in the Temple, stated that he became acquainted with the prisoner about two years ago, and on the 18th of last month received a note from him expressing an intention to pay him a visit. He accordingly came and passed the evening with him, and on the 19th of last month he called again, and asked permission to remain there and smoke a pipe. Witness told him to remain there as long as he pleased, and appointed to meet him there at four in the afternoon, but he was never seen again until the present time, and the witness missed his case of instruments, a silver watch case, a number of coins pocketed and strung upon a string and other articles.—Mr. Thomas William Dukes, a solicitor, stated that he occupied the same chambers as Mr. Pierce, and the prisoner passed the evening of the 10th of July with them. The next evening, when witness returned home, and informed Mr. Pierce of what had occurred, he examined his belongings, and missed three gold rings, a gold pin, a razor case, pearl-handled knife, and silver tobacco stopper. The three gold rings, two gold pins, the case of instruments, razor case, and silver tobacco stopper were now produced by two pawnbrokers, in Holborn, with whom the prisoner had pledged them on the 11th of July, and they were identified by the respective owners. John Bennett, footman to Captain Chappell of 17, Queen-street, Marylebone, stated that on the 5th instant, the prisoner, who had formerly been a visitor at his master's, met him at a public house, in Queen-street, and put nine pawnbrokers' tickets into his hand to take care of for him while he went to see his mother, in Essex. Witness kept them for an hour or two, and then gave them up to Sergeant Rogers, who took the prisoner into custody.—The next charge was made by Mr. Alexander Stewart, a nurseryman and seedman at Salt-hill, near Windsor. He stated that he had known the prisoner for many years and knew his connections to be highly respectable, but had lost sight of him for a considerable time, until about the 15th of last March, when the prisoner called upon him at Salt-hill, and having reminded him that they had been schoolfellows, proceeded to state that he had become captain and part owner of the Hains brig; that he was bound for Constantinople, and had been commissioned by the Sultan to select and take out with him a large quantity of seeds. He remained at the house of the complainant until the 21st of March, and in the meantime the seeds were selected and packed in wooden boxes, the prisoner stating that he was to get the money for them, and for other purposes, from his mother's lawyer, a gentleman named Sawyer, in Lincoln's Inn. They then came to town together by the Great Western Railway, and the boxes of seeds were taken in a cab to a public-house, called the Royal Serpentine, in Charles-street, Westminster. They were about together for two or three days, and the prisoner several times borrowed complainant's watch, to enable him to be punctual to his appointments. On the morning of the 3rd of April he borrowed it again, and they then walked about until they came to Carey-street, London's town, where the prisoner left him, upon pretext of going to his mother's solicitor for the money, and promised to return to him in an hour. He did not return, however, and complainant, proceeding to the Royal Serpentine, found that the boxes of seeds had been taken away. His watch, he said, was worth 40s. or 45s., and the value of the seeds was 200s. He never saw the prisoner again until the previous day. The depositions in these cases having been taken, Mr. Pritchard, bound to the prosecution the letter which the prisoner had addressed to him before the last charge was brought forward. The following is a copy of the letter:—"Clarkson's Prison, Aug. 20, 1844.—Sir,—I am writing you this letter to inform you of the liberty of addressing three lines to you being anxious to communicate with my friends and feeling convinced that I cannot do so through a better channel than your worship. I stand before you charged with three distinct crimes, two of which I own myself guilty, namely the first and the last, but with regard to the third I stand before you as innocent. The animal was lent to me; while in my hands it fell sick, and I thought it best for all parties to kill it. I did wrong it was merely an error of judgment. The gentleman of whom I borrowed the horse is one of my aunt's friends. I felt perfectly safe in doing so, feeling certain that my mother would have no difficulty in arranging so trifling an affair with her own lawyer. My object in writing this letter to you is to explain to my friends my motives for such extraordinary conduct. I had not the slightest intention that they should live on in a state of anxiety, but was too fond of my horse to let it be committed to some desperate thief, my relations (who have so long deserted me) would come forward and give me assistance which I have been so long much in need of. Your worship will perceive that my old compulsion are the only people that have suffered from my premeditated attacks. My reason for writing them was, that I hoped, when I explained so to my object, they would readily believe, from their knowledge of my liberal character, that the crime was not connected with any mercenary point of view or wicked intention. But, on having once gained the confidence of my relations, I should have been enabled to give to each person that which belonged to him, and I had just returned from France with the determination not to leave my mother until she had given me sufficient means to carry this into effect, when the police took me into custody that day at the door where I had been standing for many hours. The only course now left me to pursue is to throw myself on the mercy of the court. Your obedient and humble servant, O. H. Clarke." The prisoner was fully committed for trial, on indictments charging him with the above robberies, and, having pleaded guilty, was sentenced to be transported for ten years.

LOAN FRANKFORT AND THE ITALIAN ORGAN PLAYERS AGAIN.—At Marybone office, on Monday, a poor Italian, who gave his name Louis Marzetti, was charged at the instance of Viscount Frankfort, No. 17, South-west-coast, Hyde-park-square, with having refused to consent to his playing his organ when required to do so. It will be remembered that his lordship has for years past evinced a most decided antipathy to street music, particularly that of the organ; he decried it as "Mr. Basil's music," Lord Frankfort's butler, what "reasons" he gave?—He said that Lord Frankfort does not like noise, sir.—Mr. Marzetti's defence was that he had been told that he should go there in purpose to annoy him, I believe. Is it this or that?—It is, sir; there can be no doubt of it.—Mr. Marzetti: Then it is very scandalous conduct.—The prisoner, in answer to the charge, stated in Italian that he was not aware of having done anything wrong, and that he was merely playing in the street as usual for his livelihood, when he was laid hold of by the constable. He was discharged.

THE LATE POST-OFFICE ROBBERY.—At Bow-street, on Monday, Patrick Larkin, the letter carrier, charged with stealing two letters, containing £200, the property of the Postmaster-General, was re-examined. Some additional evidence was produced, and the prisoner was fully committed for trial.—[Larkin was tried yesterday at the Central Criminal Court, and, having been convicted, was sentenced by Baron Gurney to fifteen years' transportation.]

COUNTRY NEWS.

NARROW ESCAPE FOR TOM THUMB.—"General Tom Thumb" was taking a ride near Clifton on Sunday afternoon, in an open carriage, accompanied by his father, his guardian, and his preceptor, Mr. Sherman. The General and the latter were on the driver's box, and on descending a steep hill, the horse took fright, ran at the top of his speed, and dashed against a high stone wall with such force as to break his neck, and shiver the shafts and a portion of the carriage to atoms! The two inside gentlemen escaped with a few slight bruises. Mr. Sherman had seen the approaching danger, and held the General firmly in his arms, and the moment the concussion occurred he cleared the horse and wall, the latter nearly nine feet in height, and landed safely in the adjoining field, preserving his charge unhurt.

EXECUTION AT STAFFORD.—Confession of the culprit.—Last Saturday morning the extreme sentence of the law was carried into effect, at the Stafford county goal, on William Bead, who was found guilty at the late assizes of the murder of Elizabeth Griffiths. After his condemnation, he for a time declared his utter innocence of the offence for which he was doomed to die; at last, through the powerful exertions of the rev. ordinary of the prison, he was induced to make a full confession. He stated that he called on Mr. Crowther, in whose employ the unfortunate woman was as a domestic servant, for the purpose of obtaining work, when he interrogated him very sharply as to what he wanted from her master. He informed her that he wanted some sewing work; to which she replied, "You know that he is not at home; that is not what you have come for." He asked her how she knew that? when she answered, "You had better be off." She then returned into the house, and on crossing the yard with a pail of water, she remarked to him "that he had better be off, or she would throw the hot water over him." He then became greatly excited, and while she was stopping and putting the pail down upon a ledge or shelf near the oven in the brew-house, and raising herself up again, he took up a carpenter's hammer which was lying on the step of the brew-house door, and struck her with it on the head, just above the ear. She fell against the oven, screamed out twice, and instantly fell to the ground. He could not scruple with him. He then thought of leaving, and was on the eve of going out at the door, when he returned, in order to take her. He went up into Mr. Crowther's bed-room, and took a waistcoat and pair of trousers out of a chest of drawers. He then opened three boxes in the servant's room, and took a handkerchief. On coming down stairs into the kitchen, he took up a small black-handled knife out of the table-drawer, and cut her throat. After he had done so, and when she was quite dead, he put his hand into her pocket, and took out three half-pence pieces, after which he went into the parlour, and ate part of a fruit pie that was left. He then went into the kitchen again, and obtained possession of three silver table spoons from a cupboard, and decamped. He considered that she would have lived if he had not used the knife. Nobody else but himself had a hand in the murder, and he solemnly declared that when he went to Mr. Crowther's for work he had no thought of injuring his servant, but that it came into his head all at once to do what he had done, for he was vexed with her for speaking to him as she had. Just before the drop fell he was heard by one of the officers of the prison to say, with much earnestness, "I hope the Lord Jesus Christ will have mercy upon my soul." At the moment he fell, a suppressed murmur escaped from the crowd. It is supposed that 5000 people were present.

RAILWAY COLLISION.—A collision took place on Thursday week on the Dundee Railway, in consequence of a carter, named Alexander Smith, attempting to cross the line with his charge, when the mail train was in sight, and by which the horses were killed, and the cart destroyed. The accident has also proved fatal to Smith, he having died the same evening. Smith was rather an eccentric character. A few years ago, when leading sand, a large quantity of it came down and nearly covered his horse and cart, but being driven under the cart, he himself was not much hurt. When dug out, which was done instantly, he very coolly inquired for his whip, offered his prisoner a snuff for his trouble, and drove off.

CONSECRATION OF AN ABBEY IN LEICESTERSHIRE.—The consecration of a monastery dedicated to St. Bernard, and intended for the use of a number of Clermont monks who have hitherto inhabited temporary buildings in Charnwood Forest, took place on Tuesday last, the ceremony being performed by Dr. Wiseman, styled himself "Bishop of Melipotamus," Dr. Walsh ("Bishop of Candelopolis"), and Dr. Morris ("Bishop of Eryx"). This is the first abbey the Romish sect have completed in England.

SUDEN REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.—On Wednesday Mr. Chalk Price, General of York, arrived at Edinburgh, with a warrant issued by Thomas Price, Esq., one of the magistrates of York, for the apprehension of Joseph Stadman Madison, superintendent of Police at Dundee, on a charge of larceny. Mr. Madison, who was appointed on the 28th inst., and had only commenced the duties of his new office on Wednesday, was taken into custody the same night, and conveyed to Edinburgh the next day. The charges against Mr. Madison have reference to money transactions in connection with the situation formerly held by him in York.

CLOSE OF THE PITMEN'S STRIKE.—The strike of the pitmen in the counties of Northumberland and Durham is now at an end, the whole of the collieries, with very unimportant exceptions, having engaged all the workmen they require on the terms and conditions offered by the employers previous to the 15th of April, when the strike commenced. After the men had signed the monthly bond, orders were immediately given by the colliery agents to replace their families in the houses they had previously occupied.

LANCASTERSHIP COACH ACCIDENT.—Last Saturday a serious accident happened to the mail-coach which runs between Whitehaven and Carlisle. On passing the street of Carlisle, the coach came in contact with an old building in the market place, called the Main Guard, and one of the gentlemen on the outside had the bones of one of his thighs so dreadfully lacerated and broken, that the limb was instantly amputated considerably above the middle of the thigh, and the injury was so great that he died some hours afterwards. The gentleman and his lady (who was an invalid passenger) came from Rushmore, were lately married, and had been spending the honeymoon among the beauties of the Cumberland and Westmorland lakes. The lady continues in a fragile state, and requires every consolation. Mr. Wm. Hullock, of the village of Carlisle, near Penrith, and his wife, were also outside passengers, and had a very narrow escape. In the act of leaving Mrs. Hullock laid hold of another gentleman, an outside passenger, round the neck, and thus saved herself without injuring the gentleman. The inside passengers received no essential injury, although the side of the coach which struck against the building was smashed to pieces.

STABBING IN SOMERSETSHIRE.—Another of those offences, unhappily but too common of late, in which the knife is resorted to as a means of vengeance, occurred late on Saturday night in the parish of Norton St. Philips, Somerset, and a young man, named Charles Francis, has been cut off in the prime of life. The deceased and his murderer were both labouring men, and a quarrel having arisen at a public house relative to their breaking up a cup and glass, a scuffle ensued, in the course of which the prisoner was knocked down several times. Upon gaining his feet, some of the by-standers observed that he had a knife in his hand, and it was taken from him, but he immediately snatched it back again, and after some few minutes plunged it several times into the body of the deceased, causing his death in a few minutes, one of the wounds dividing the femoral artery. The prisoner was immediately secured, and when charged with the crime merely said, he knew he had done it, and would do it again. He was George Hillier, and he has been committed by the Coroner on a charge of Manslaughter.

CURIOUS SUICIDE AT CIRENCESTER.—On Saturday a chance boy at Cirencester, in the employ of Mr. Soames of the Ram Hotel, went into a stable belonging to his master, and cut his throat with a razor. He cut the windpipe quite through and walked to his home, at least 300 yards. One of the neighbours met him in the yard, and asked him what was the matter with him. He said he had cut his throat with a razor, and she then took him and seated him on a chair, and at his request fetched him some water, which he drank, some of it running out of the wound. He died within five minutes after the time he had first entered his house. He was 65 years of age, and had a wife and eight children.

ANOTHER COAL-PIT ACCIDENT.—A dreadful coal-pit accident, attended with loss of life, occurred at the pit belonging to Messrs. Orle and Dargison, at Dewham, near Margate, on Sunday morning last. Two men and three boys, who were in the act of descending, were not more than three feet from the top when the rope broke, and the whole were precipitated to the bottom of the shaft, a depth of fifty yards. Two of the unfortunate sufferers breathed once or twice after they were taken up, but the others died instantaneously. The verdict at the inquest was "Accidental Death."

CHARGE OF ATTEMPTING TO DROWN A VESSEL.—Anthony Day, late captain of the brig Earl Vane, of Sunderland, has been examined before the magistrates of that port, charged with attempting to scuttle that vessel by boring holes in the hull, near the North Cape. Several persons were examined, but the principal witness was George Mann, the mate. He spoke to several conversations, in which the captain confessed having committed the crime. In one of these Mr. Day stated, that when off the wharves, and having sight of land, the thought of sinking the vessel, by boring holes in her bottom, first came into his mind, and he never could get it out of his mind until he "completed the job." The defence was, that the prisoner was labouring under temporary insanity at the time of the commission of the offence, but the magistrates determined to send the prisoner for trial at the assizes. Bail in the sum of £400 was, however, taken for his appearance.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT THE MAIDENHEAD STATION—THREE HORSES BURNED TO DEATH.—A destructive fire broke out in a stage of standing, within the yard of the Great Western Railway station at Maidenhead, in the middle of the day, on Tuesday last, which it is strongly feared was occasioned by merely accidental means. The flames, when first discovered, bore with uncontrollable rapidity, and within less than an hour afterwards the whole building, which was composed of wood, covered with slate, was a heap of burning ruins. There were eleven horses in the stable at the time, eight of which were fortunately rescued, after considerable difficulty, as lost containing any damage. The stable and horses were the property of Mr. Lovetree, the proprietor of the Bear Inn, at Maidenhead.

IRELAND.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The exhibition altogether was considered a very satisfactory one. Immense numbers visited the show-yard. A few words of Prince Albert excited considerable attention, and a silver medal was awarded. At the banquet which took place after the show, an incident happened which deserves notice. The Vice-Chairman (Lord Kint) in the course of a long speech took occasion to say that great improvements had recently been effected in the condition of the tenant classes in Ireland. By whom were they effected but by the landlords? By what other agency could they be effected? surely it was not the large sums of money which were collected from year to year, from month to month, and from week to week, that could have done this? [This allusion to the collection of the rent excited a great sensation. There were risings and groans, and Mr. Smith O'Brien and Mr. Nicholas Maher, immediately got up and walked on.] The occurrence led to a correspondence. Mr. S. O'Brien addressed a letter to the council deprecating political allusions at the meetings of the association. The council met and passed a resolution in favour of abstinence from politics, and Lord Kint expressed his regret that he should have made remarks of a political tendency. With this explanation Mr. S. O'Brien expressed his satisfaction.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the weekly meeting of the Repeal Association, held on Monday, Mr. R. Dillon Browne, M.P., was called to the chair, and addressed the assembly at considerable length. He said that he had come over from England, armed with what he deemed to be unassailable arguments for continuing to demand a restoration of the National Parliament. He has struggled in vain, and almost alone, in the House of Commons, to preserve justice for his country, and to prevent an invasion being made by England on the spiritualities of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. He alluded to the desperate bill on the subject of charitable bequests, in reference to which he had several interviews with Lord Kint, and he was bound to state that he did not believe it to have been the intention of Government to have forced the measure on the Irish people, and thus increase their own difficulties, only that they were sanctioned by the Irish Roman Catholic representatives in the House of Commons. A letter was read from Mr. T. Wyse, M.P., addressed to the secretary of the Association, returning his acknowledgments for the honour conferred on him and his fellow-members who supported his motion for an inquiry into the facts connected with the formation of the jury at the late state trials in Ireland by the vote of thanks unanimously passed to them at a late meeting of the Association. Mr. McNeill brought forward a report of the parliamentary committee on the subject of hurrying bills through Parliament. Mr. McNeill having severely commented on the course pursued towards Ireland, adverted to the Belgic revolution, which he said was effected by the middle classes, such as those which were now engaged in working for the Repeal. He concluded with a significant warning to the aristocracy of this country to beware how they appear for a limited period, namely, until the Repeal of the Union. Mr. O'Connell had consulted Father Mathew, who approved of the limited plan for those who would not take the pledge for life. The amount of the rent for the week was asked to be £4135.

RECENT PENCILINGS IN MOROCCO.

From the sketch-book of an artist who has recently visited this very interesting country, we are enabled to present to our readers the annexed glimpses of the costumes of the Moors of Morocco which are replete with picturesqueness and graceful variety.

Three of these portrait sketches are from the harem, that favourite and almost sole seat of oriental luxury, which is generally inaccessible, and can only, by some particular chance, be seen by Europeans. One of these sketches shows a lady at her toilette, which is performed in a very elaborate manner, employs several hours, and demands the service of a number of slaves. Each of the latter has a separate office: one to perfume the hair, another to arrange the eyebrows, a third to paint them, and so on. The blackening of the latter by a preparation of antimony, the forming of the hair into a particular shape, and the filling of the hair with powdered cloves, perfumes, and scented waters, are the most favourite modes of female adornment. The European captives in the harem, appear to be its chief ornament, both as to personal and mental accomplishment; the Moorish ladies are enormously fat, stupid, and ignorant. Of course, there are many slaves employed in the harem, for the gratification of its inmates; such as the singing woman, portrayed at the foot of this column, and in that adjoining, a slave playing the for, a kind of tambourine.

Mr. J. H. Drummond Hay was fortunate enough to obtain access to the harem, at Morocco, and he thus describes one of its inmates—a Mauritanian Venus:—

This was a delicate-looking girl; her age, I thought, was sweet fifteen—the prime of womanhood in this precocious country; for their beauty seems to fade with the years. Her complexion was very fair, her eyes dark hazel, to which the black border of "Kohol" (antimony) gave a languid expression. She had a coral-tipped mouth, round as a ring, as the Moorish ode describes the feature. Her black hair, braided with silver cords, waved in profusion over her shoulders. Her sylph-like figure was clothed in a pale green caftan, embroidered on the bosom and skirt in silver thread. This garment reached a little below her knees, and over it she wore an outer robe of light gauze, confined around the waist by a red zone of Fex silk. The sleeves of her caftan were wide and open near the wrist; showing at every turn an arm like alabaster, which was encircled by a plain massive bracelet of Soudan gold; and her uncovered legs were seen from below the caftan clasped with chased silver; her feet were also bare, for in her sally with the rest she had forgotten her slippers; her feet, as well as her hands, were dyed with henna of a bright orange colour. Over her head she had thrown a light muslin kerchief; but in this sudden tumult her curiosity got the better of her national caution, and she stood before me quite unveiled.

The next engraving shows the common costume of the people, worn by the fellahs, or peasants.

MOROCCO JEWESS WITH THE VEIL.

Next are women wearing a singular head-dress, or bonnet, made of copper, with flowers engraved upon it.

The fifth illustration is a Jewess of Morocco wearing the veil: the Jewesses only wear black or yellow slippers, and boots are prohibited.

The children of the Moors are dressed exactly like their parents, the little girls wearing veils, and the boys turbans.

Altogether, in Morocco, the women of the better class dress magnificently, wearing a silk shirt of many colours in stripes, highly embroidered waistcoat, silk trousers, and a large silk wrapper of gaudy colour, so put on as to form a petticoat, and hang over the head and shoulders, showing only one eye; a cap of cloth of gold is worn, with many rich ornaments, on the head; the eyelids are stained with antimony; much rouge is used; and the ear-rings, anklets, and bracelets, of gold and silver, are very massive. The boots, shoes, and slippers are of yellow morocco leather, the staple manufacture of the country.

HOMAGE TO SHAKESPEARE.—Stimulated by the recent demonstration in honour of Robert Burns on the banks of the Doon, preparations have already been announced to celebrate, next year, on the 23d of April, his natal day, the memory of Shakespeare, on the spot where his sacred ashes are entombed, at Stratford-on-Avon.

RUNNING REIN AND THE PRINCESS.—We have just received from Moore, of West-street, St. Martin's-lane, a coloured proof of the portraits of these two racers. The likenesses are to the very life, and the colouring is decidedly good: there is great breadth and effect in the engraving, and the execution, altogether, is highly creditable to Mr. Shayer, the artist, and also to Mr. Charles Hunt, who engraved the plate.

METROPOLIS IMPROVEMENTS.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have issued their plans for the new street leading from Leicester-square to Long-acre, which will be called "Cranbourne-street," and will be of a width from house to house of between fifty-three and fifty-four feet. In a few days the Commissioners will lease the ground for building the houses. The whole of the buildings are to be rendered fit for habitation before Christmas, 1845, under penalty in each case of forfeiture of the lease.

A dinner was given by the Junior United Service Club, at their house in Charles-street, St. James's, on Monday evening, to the hero of Jellalabad, Sir Robert Sale. Sir Wm. Nott was also invited, but we regret to say was unable to attend from indisposition.

CONFLAGRATION AT RICHMOND.

On Tuesday morning last, a most destructive fire broke out at the Cricketers' Tavern, Greenside, Richmond, which was totally destroyed. The family escaped, but with some difficulty, from the upper part and over the backs of the neighbouring premises. Shortly after the flames burst forth from the windows. The fire communicated to the house 25, Richmond-green, and to No. 27; the first being wholly and the next partially destroyed, with a great portion of property that was not burnt being materially injured by water and removing. The houses on the other side of the Cricketers, Nos. 23 and 24, were also partially destroyed, and were, together with their furniture, considerably damaged by the water, while the furniture was also injured by removal, in which respect the whole of the inhabitants of the row of houses (in number about thirty) have suffered. The total loss, it is expected, will be nearly £4000.

By the latest inquiries it appears, that Mr. Vellam and his servant, the only persons in the house at the time the fire broke out, retired to rest about eleven o'clock on Monday night, everything appearing safe. About ten minutes or a quarter past two, the policeman on duty, whilst going past the Cricketers, observed smoke issuing through the crevices of the shutters. He raised an alarm; and, on the door being forced open, the whole of the bar was found to be in flames. The engines soon arrived, but the flames had got such a hold of the building, that they were of very little use. Mr. Vellam escaped by the back, by lowering himself on to an outhouse; but unfortunately, the servant, in trying to do the same, fell on to the roof, and was much injured by the fall.

FIRE AT RICHMOND.

From a careful examination of the ruins, it is evident that the fire commenced in the lower part of the Cricketers, but how it was caused cannot at present be ascertained.

Several small tenements in the rear, occupied by poor families, were more or less injured. The damage is estimated to exceed the insurance considerably.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XLVII.

ST. DUNSTON'S IN THE EAST.

This beautiful church, by Wren, is situated between Idoll-lane and St. Dunstan's-hill, Tower-street, the latter of which is carried from the south side of the lofty tower and spire of the church southward into Thames-street, opposite the eastern wing of the Custom-house. The church is dedicated to St. Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, after whom it is called; and its addition is in reference to its situation, and to distinguish it from its namesake in Fleet-street, which is for a similar reason, called St. Dunstan's in the West.

ST. DUNSTON'S-IN-THE-EAST.

The ancient church was damaged by the great fire of 1666, and was shortly after repaired; but the elegant spire and tower were not finished till 1680. They are masterpieces of design and construction. At each angle of the tower is an enriched pinnacle, and from its base springs a bold arch; the four uniting to support a spire of peculiar grace and elegance.

Mr. Elmes considers it to be not too much to say of this spire that "it stands unequalled for elegance, beauty, and science. When Wren designed it he had, no doubt, the steeples of the High Church, Edinburgh, and of St. Nicholas, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in his mind's eye; but he has surpassed both in every essential quality of such a work." The elevation may be seen engraved in Mr. Elmes's "Life of Sir Christopher Wren," engraved by Wilson Lowry, after a geometrical drawing by Joseph Gwilt, Esq., F.S.A., for which he received the silver medal of the Royal Academy. Wren was proud of his work: on coming into his study one morning, he was told that the hurricane of the previous night had greatly damaged some of the church steeples of the metropolis. "Not my spire of St. Dunstan's," was the confident reply.

The body of the church having been only repaired by Wren, and having fallen much into decay, it was taken down and re-built in 1821, under the direction of Mr. David Laing, the architect of the Custom-house. It has been re-built in truly handsome style, and possesses one of the most embellished interiors in the metropolis.

The living is a rectory, and one of the thirteen peculiarities of the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. The parish have many excellent charities under their care.

OPENING OF THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL AT NEW-CROSS.—This handsome building, engraved in No. 37 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, was opened on Tuesday, for the reception of 250 boys. The head-master, the Rev. Mr. Chambers, after a solemn and appropriate prayer, supplicated the Divine protection for this valuable institution, than which we cannot imagine any more calculated to engage the sympathy and command the support of the public, when we call to mind that its purpose is to furnish, at a moderate expense, an education of the first class, for the children of officers of that glorious service which has been Britain's best protector in her days of peril, and has increased her power and enhanced her glory in every quarter of the globe.

DR. WOLFF AT BOKHARA.

Anxiety is now at end
On part of relative or friend—
The dreadful truth has come at last,
And Hope her latest barrier pass'd;
Beyond it sits sad Certainty
Leaning on weeping Memory,
A melancholy sight as e'er
Was gaud on with a calm Despair!
But—

Now that the fate of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly has been confirmed, the public interest is naturally transferred to the generous missionary in their behalf—Dr. Wolff. Some obstacle to his emancipation from the hands of the Ameer of Bokhara has occurred, as already reported in our journal. The facts stated indicate no personal hostility to Dr. Wolff; and he is too powerfully accredited at Bokhara, by all those likely to have any influence with its

DR. WOLFF.

Prince, to be the probable subject of any fresh outrage. "Nevertheless," it is observed in the Athenaeum, "we shall not be sorry to hear that he is clear of Bokhara—a city which had a very poetical place in English imaginations, not long ago, but presents itself to them just at present in some such idea as the 'City of the Ogre.'"

Meanwhile, Captain Grover has addressed to the Times a letter on the subject, of which the following is the substance:—

"In the letter which Dr. Wolff was forced to write at Bokhara, and which you had the goodness to insert at my request, the King of Bokhara proclaims to the world that he put to death Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly in the month of Saratan, 1259. The Christian date is not given in Dr. Wolff's letter, but for the information of the public I inserted within brackets what I had calculated as the English date. I was wrong; the correct date should be July (Cancer), 1843. It therefore appears that at the time I proposed to her Majesty's Government to proceed at my own cost and on my own responsibility to Bokhara to attempt the release of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, those wretched men were actually alive."

The annexed sketch of Dr. Wolff is from a drawing obligingly forwarded to us by a correspondent. It represents the reverend Doctor in his ordinary dress: his playfulness as well as his spirits, may be characterised even as occasionally boyish; but his general manner breathes a consciousness of that powerful energy of mind, which has enabled him to preach fluently in ten different languages, and converse in fourteen; and to surmount, single-handed, difficulties and dangers in his travels, which might well have overcome an expedition. His voice is deep, most emphatic, and sonorous in its tone; and his enthusiasm bursts out in most brilliant flashes of dramatic and poetic fancy and feeling: "he is," adds our correspondent, "a lineal descendant, I understand, of Moses himself."

The following conclusion to a letter written by the Doctor at Tcheran, to his friends and late parishioners at Clayton West, near Huddersfield, is very characteristic:—

Now, my dear friends, I have given you a sketch of my proceedings. I have now to make one request to you:—1st. That you may pray that the Lord may preserve alive my wife and child. 2nd. That the Lord may give success to my mission. 3rd. Should either my wife or child come to you, be kind to them. And lastly and fourthly, should it be the Lord's will that I should have at Bokhara the fate of Conolly and Stoddart, that I may be enabled to look up to my Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, with faith and confidence; and may be enabled, if Stoddart and Conolly should be dead, to follow them to the grave trusting and believing in, and openly confessing, the ever blessed name of our Lord Jesus Christ, God blessed for ever, who will come, and shall come, and shall not tarry.

Our second Illustration represents a Bokhara chief giving audience.

COUNT NESSELRODE.

Count Nesselrode, the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, is, by birth, a Livonian; his family, however, was originally Hanoverian, though it had been settled in Livonia for a long period. His father was Minister Plenipotentiary of the Emperor Catherine, to the Courts of the Dukes of Wirtemberg, and he was entrusted by the Czarina with the task of negotiating the marriage of the Grand Duke Paul, afterwards the crazy Emperor, with a Grand Duke of the House of Württemberg. The Livonians, though Russian subjects, are more Germans than Muscovites; and as the Czar rather mistrusts the old Russian nobility, among whom the greatest amount of discontent exists, the Germans, or Livonians, enjoy much more of the patronage of the Court of St. Petersburg; hence the easy entrance into office of Count Nesselrode. He was born in 1770; at least the weight of evidence seems to fix that year as the most probable; but nothing is so difficult in Russia as to ascertain the age of any human being. An ukase (what a happy country!) can increase or diminish the age of a man, woman, or child, at discretion. It is a well-known fact that the Empress Catherine was two years older than the Russian Almanac made her. A lively French writer thus explains the process:—"Comme Catherine fut française plus âgée que Pierre III., l'Impératrice Elizabeth lui offrit deux ans gratuitement, en la faisant venir en Russie. How is one to deal with ages in a country such as this? We reply, do exactly as we have done—give the best accessible authorities, which are these—two biographical sketches of the Count published in the Revue du Nord, about ten years ago state the year of his birth to be 1771, and another life published in Paris in 1837, states it to be 1770. The truth, as Norrie says, may be between, but 1770 is also given as the correct date in the German 'Conversations Lexikon,' and fourteen years ago an eminent political authority, says he looked quite sixty; from all which we conclude he is now of the venerable age of seventy-four. On entering public life he did not at first devote himself to diplomacy. After receiving his education in the college of the Guards Nobles of St. Petersburg, he was presented with a commission in the Russian Guards, and was soon made one of the aides-de-camp of the Emperor Paul, who had, at that time, been just inflicted on the Russians as a ruler. The military calling did not, however, suit him; he had in him more of the statesman than the warrior. A few years passed away, and the Emperor, becoming smitten with a violent admiration of Napoleon, concluded peace with him. The young Nesselrode, thinking it would be of long duration, forsook the army, and attached himself to diplomacy, being sent to Paris as an attaché of the Russian Embassy. He had previously had some experience of business in the Chancellerie of foreign affairs at St. Petersburg, and with his application and aptitude for the details of business, he had not been long in Paris before he was made conseiller d'ambassade; he afterwards became the soul of the bureau, his chiefs, Murew and Bechardow, being men of inferior capacity. It was Nesselrode who conducted the negotiations which brought about the armed neutrality of the northern powers, which provoked the anger of England, and caused the battle of Copenhagen. But Paul died, and Alexander, his son, reigned in his stead; then ensued a total change of policy; the intimacy between France and Russia suddenly abated, and Nesselrode and the whole of the Russian embassy were recalled from Paris. On his return from Paris he was attached to the private bureau of the Emperor, who soon discovered something in his young secretary above the usual range of the herd of red tapists. He found in him much acquired knowledge both of men and things, aptitude for labour, suppleness, intelligence, and a seriousness and gravity which are often found more useful than more brilliant qualities. He accompanied Alexander in the campaign of 1805, and was present at Erfurt in 1807. He was mixed up with all the negotiations of the years that followed, and he was the Minister of Russia at the Congress of Vienna in 1814, where he helped to create the German Confederation, demanded the partition of Poland, and the cession of Saxony to Prussia. He was one of the plenipotentiaries who, in December, 1814, signed the famous declaration which placed Napoleon under the ban of Europe; but it was Nesselrode also who joined the Duke of Wellington in restraining the fury of Prussia when the Allied armies were in possession of Paris, and Blücher was talking of sacking the city, and dividing the realm so as to recover for Prussia her old rights in Alsatia on the French side of the Rhine. He is mixed up with all the great negotiations of the present century,—but it is an instrument only; as a statesman, he cannot rank with Kaunitz, or Metternich, or Hardenbergh, or Talleyrand. This is partly owing to his position as the servant of a despotic master—for Nicholas is more imperious than Alexander, and he has been as usual fit, and as much employed by Nicholas, as by his predecessor. He is the mere head clerk of the Russian Ministry for Foreign Affairs, without one spark of genius, or any other talent than the talent of keeping his place and standing placidly on. Prudent, and determined, and industrious, he undoubtedly is, and has much knowledge of Russia, but there are his chief merits. There has been much speculation as to what has brought him to England; but, from his real life, and his being his residence at Brighton, for the benefit of sea-bathing, it is probable he comes for that which is equally valuable to prime minister and peasant—the simple but valuable blessing of health.

THE TELEPHONE; A TELEGRAPHIC ALARM.

Amongst the many valuable inventions recently laid before the Lords of the Admiralty, that of the "Telephone or Marine Alarm and Signal Trumpet," by Captain J. N. Taylor, R.N., is, perhaps, one of the most important; its objects being to convey sound signals in vessels at sea, or in harbours, to transmit orders to and from boats and ships; to prevent collisions at sea, or on railroads; to transmit orders on the field of battle, from position to position, as an auxiliary to the duties of the aide-de-camp, or orderly, who frequently rides with important despatches in the face of an enemy in great haste and imminent risk; to inform engine stations in case of fire; for alarms in dock-yards, &c.; and as a means of communication between the palaces and halls of the nobility and gentry, &c.

The principle of the Telephone is, one of musical accord, composed of four alternate notes, given out separately, played like those of the cornet, and prolonged whilst the finger remains on the note. The instrument is formed of a chamber, into which air is compressed through three or more alternate pumps, which are moved by a corresponding hand or of cranks, set in motion by a wheel; and of a set of piston-keys, with valve apertures, giving free egress to the compressed air, which, in its passage, sets upon a series of musical springs, and produces the required sounds through four pipes or trumpets.

THE INDICATOR.

The Indicator, or Signal Tell-Tale, to be placed on the Telephone Drum, to denote the signals made, is composed of 16 tales, in four parallel lines, and numbered at the top 1, 2, 3, 4. The first number made is to be indicated by a peg, placed under the required figure, in the first horizontal column, colored red; the second number in the white; the third in the blue; and the fourth in the yellow line, observing that only one peg is to be placed in the same horizontal row of 4 tales. The Telephone gamut notes are arranged for number either by the public or private key. The alternate notes of the gamut C, E, G, C, being denoted by 1, 2, 3, 4.

ALTERNATE NOTES
ALTERNATE LETTERS

THE TELEPHONE GAMUT.

The Telephone No. 1, will convey signals four or five miles; and as a short sailing in three columns will not extend over more than three miles, it will be sufficient for the guidance of the whole fleet, in foggy weather, by night or day. For fixed stations, light-vessels, light-houses, preventive ports, &c. it is made the size of a large drum, with trumpet in accordance, and will convey signals in foggy weather six or eight miles; or by answering the trumpet, and applying a portable phonic reflector to it, the sound will be conveyed to a much greater distance.

Ships or steamers passing each other, by giving the signals for "Helm to port," &c., &c., would prevent those dreadful collisions and loss of life which frequently occur, either from indecision, the thickness of the fog, or other causes.

As an alarm instrument, to be used on light-vessels, light-houses, dangerous headlands, &c., the Telephone is most important, as it will be the means of preventing the great sacrifice of life and property, which so frequently takes place in foggy weather, from the lights being invisible. Vessels would also be directed by it to the port or harbour, and the height of the tide for entering conveyed to them in the offing. On railroads, too, it is of great importance, as an instant signal for stopping the train, increasing the speed, or of the approach of another engine, may be given from the guard to the engine.

Another advantage of the above instrument is, that it can be employed with a secret key, so that two persons in correspondence will understand the communication, while it remains unintelligible to others.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. W. L." Bristol, should see the article on the Post Office, in our last volume.
"Inspector" is rich.
"A Loner of the Fine Arts," Manchester.—The drawings of Dr. Dalton's funeral were by a Manchester artist.
"J. J. W." Margate, states that there is nothing new in Mr. Dempster's Rig, described in our last number; and that the patent revolving masts answer every purpose for which the new invention is intended. The patentee, Lieutenant Shandham, our correspondent states, resides in or near Bury, and has a boat rigged with triangular sails, without masts.
"Pioneer" should inquire at some office in the neighbourhood.
"X. X."—The competition is very fair, but we have not room for its insertion.
"A Constant Reader" Yorkshire.—The office is at 18, Cornhill.
"J. E. P." is thanked for the sketch, but the subject is scarcely of sufficient interest for engraving.
"Edgar."—The portrait shall appear next week.
"W. H." Durham.—Beetle wafers may be purchased of any wicker manufacturer.
"The Streeting a Joy," by J. B. S., will not suit.
An able writer article has appeared in the "Leamington Spa Courier," advocating a commemoration of Shakespeare on a plan similar to that of the recent Burns' festival of Apr.
"W. C."—Inquiry as to the comet has been referred to our astronomical correspondent.
"T. S." Newcastle, should write again.
"Dilapidated" sends the following inquiries:—1. Whether any entire English translation exists of the Works of the Emperor Julian? 2. What translations of them, either whole or in part, are extant in English or in any Continental language? 3. Where are any authentic MSS. of the same author, either in this country or abroad?
"W. R."—Linnæus grave.—We think not.
"Scotus"—Our authority for stating the Highland costume to be modern, is Mr. Flanagan's excellent work on British costume. In No. 22 will be found an excellent record of opinions on the subject, still much disputed.
"X. Y. Z."—Qui tam denotes "as well," and is applied to actions brought in the name of the Queen, and of the informant, for the purpose of securing part of the penalty to the latter.
"A. Z."—The last remark is not correct, as well as previous ones. The words "or order," are requisite in a promissory note, to render it legally transferable. We wish the Government would take the management of the roads and abolish tolls.
"The Rev. A. B. C."—Under consideration.
"Veritas"—Barrow Castle will probably send the proffered sketch.
"J. D. P."—should have paid the postage of his inquiry.
"G. C." Cifs.—The pictures engraved were in the British Institution during the past season.
"E. M."—want further substantiate his communication before we can print it.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1844.

THE great topic of conversation during the past week has been the Bombardment of Tangier by the Prince de Joinville; the intelligence took every one by surprise, for the previous accounts spoke of a probability of an accommodation. There is some suspicion, indeed, that the telegraphic despatches received by the French Government were tampered with, and some important particulars suppressed till the event occurred.

By the details which have since been published, it appears that the English vessels and those of other neutral powers which were on the spot, were quite as much taken by surprise as the public here. Everything promised peace, till the French ships and steamers were put in motion, and took up their position before the town. Despatches, it is said, were received at the last moment from the French army, which left the Prince no alternative; but, as they have not been published, there are no means of judging of the truth of the assertion. As several English vessels of war were present, and spectators of the scene, we are in possession of the opinions of able critics, grounded on observation, not a little sharpened by the consciousness that the skill or want of skill displayed by the French might have to be met at some time or other by themselves. The reports of these naval officers are unfavourable to French tact and skill, both in taking up their position, and in serving their guns. Though every ship was towed to her station by a steamer, many of them contrived to expose themselves to a raking fire, by presenting their stems or sterns to the forts—an advantage to the enemy of which it is a matter of wonder the Moors did not avail themselves. The garrison, however, seem to have been taken by surprise, like the spectators, which may account for a little indiscretion at the outset. When the intentions of the French became apparent, however, the Moors showed no lack of activity and courage, and a greater amount of skill than was expected from them. De Joinville's ship was severely handled; and the delay in bombarding the other towns on the coast, is attributed to the necessity he was under of repairing. The fortifications were in bad order, and in no condition effectually to resist even so badly-directed a fire as that of the French is stated to have been—which was, moreover, continued long after the Moorish guns had been silenced. But, after all, at the end of the day, though the walls had been injured, the garrison do not seem to have been driven from their guns, the Moorish flag still waved on the ramparts, and the French did not venture to attempt a landing.

Even allowing for a little national disposition to underrate the prowess of an old enemy, there are several circumstances that prove the French did not at all come off with déclat. Two of their ships were severely handled; the numbers of the killed and wounded on board of them have not been given, nor have the details of the action been published officially. It is not defeat, certainly; but is just as far from being success; the Prince should have done more or not attempted so much. It is a good commentary on his pamphlet, however; it proves the French navy is not equal to that of England—situated St. Sebastian and St. Jean d'Acre. They had better rest satisfied with the lesson they have got at Tangier; should they venture an experiment on ourselves, their experience may be somewhat more dearly purchased.

So that, after all, except the expenditure of so much powder and shot, and the great glorification of the Paris press on the achievement of De Joinville, it is difficult to say what the French Government has gained by this act of aggression. The war in the interior cannot be affected by the destruction of a few perches of stone wall at one or even several of the towns on the coast. Property has not suffered, and very few lives have been lost; and as the alarm is now given, we apprehend the property of the merchants in the other sea-side towns will, ere the French arrive, be removed beyond the reach of danger. If these bombardments rendered it necessary to weaken the Moorish army for the defence of the coast, so as to enable the troops of the French to act more effectually by land, while the ships co-operated with them, we could understand the advantage, in a military point of view, of these bombardments. But with a strong force in possession of the forts, and outside the town (enough to prevent any attempt at taking possession), the army in the interior having to contend with the same enemy, the same numbers, and the same difficulties of soil and climate as before, we confess the mere sailing of a squadron along the coast, battering down walls, and dismounting a few guns, does not appear of much utility, as far as the settlement of the matter in dispute is concerned. At the very time the Prince de Joinville was pouring in his broadsides, the son of the Emperor was engaged more actively than ever in concerting measures of offence and defence with Abd-el-Kader. It remains to be seen whether the bombardment will produce much effect on them; as the place is not occupied, we incline to think it will not. Should the French make the attempt to seize it, it will immediately become a question whether England must not interfere; the greater part of the supplies of Gibraltar are derived from Tangier and the surrounding country, and it is needless to say how much we might find ourselves embarrassed by that district being in the hands of a power so jealous of our influence, our arms, and our commerce, as France undoubtedly is; she would immediately exclude our manufactures from it by excessive duties, as she has already done at Algiers.

The rest of the foreign intelligence is not important: Paris is the great centre of European politics, and there the affairs of Morocco absorb all other topics; the Tahitian dispute is almost pushed by them out of sight, being now entirely in the hands of the two Governments. The press has abandoned it for something more exciting.

Count Nesselrode is at present among us, taking a little relaxation from the toils of diplomacy, along whose indirect and crooked ways he has long been a pilgrim. His arrival has given rise to a violent controversy as to the place he is entitled to hold among the intellectually great of those men who influence the affairs of the world. By one party he is ranked with the highest, and placed among the political "Titans" of the modern world. We cannot see what he has done to merit this inordinate admiration. Nothing is easier than, from a want of examination, to mistake men in high stations for powers, when in fact they are but instruments of a power which may either be the despotic will of one man, or the public opinion of a people. This power they may either serve blindly, without in any degree controlling it; or they may control and direct it; or again (the task of spirits truly great), they may both create it and govern it. Nesselrode belongs to the lower order of statesmen; he has always been the industrious, untiring, but passive servant of a despotic master, who has more self-will and more ability to direct it than all the other Sovereigns of Europe put together. We all know what sort of instruments a clever despot chooses to do his work with:—

I will converse with iron-witted fools
And unresponsive boys; none are for me
Who look into me with inquiring eyes.

There is here a little of the exaggeration of the poet, as "fools" cannot be safely employed at all; but the quality of mind described as "iron-witted," when coupled with an intellect equal to, or rather above, the average, is just the one suited to the purposes of an astute tyrant; and it moreover aptly describes the character of Nesselrode. He is a hard, cold, steady, unscrupulous, decisive man of routine, who would execute the most complicated orders with accuracy and despatch. But, if required to frame and carry out an original line of policy, such a one as would stamp him a statesman, he has never exhibited the power of doing it; as the Minister of such a country as Russia, and as the servant of such a man as Nicholas, he would never have the opportunity of doing so; and history only judges a man by what he has done, not by what he might be supposed capable of doing under altered circumstances. There is a great deal of delusion and nonsense about the vast—the "gigantic" abilities of these Ministers of despotic powers. We are pre-occupied to maintain that it requires more varied talents, and a rarer combination of intellectual qualities, to be the leader of a large and a powerful party under representative systems of Government like those of France and England. The greatest and wisest projects of a Minister of Russia, Prussia, or Austria, may be defeated by a word from their rulers, and the most splendid abilities may be neutralised by the caprice of a bigotted imbecile like the late Emperor of Austria. There are difficulties enough in the way of a Minister in free countries—or in those which imagine they are free; but, at any rate, they do not arise from the self-will of an individual, who may be wise or worthless just as it happens. What has been done for Russia in the last twenty years that proves any marvellous wisdom on the part of her rulers? She has a reputation abroad for skill in diplomacy, gained by enlisting the services of foreigners like Pozzo di Borgo, but the internal state of Russia and the physical and moral condition of the people is just what it was half a century ago. The descriptions of the Marquis de Custine, or any modern traveller, are exactly the same as those of Dr. Clarke; every other country of Europe has progressed and improved more or less since the close of the last long war; Russia has remained stationary; why her statesmen then should be chosen forth as the objects of fulsome flattery it is difficult to conceive. Metternich is far more deserving of admiration than Nesselrode. He is of a higher order of mind; he was and is the real ruler of the Austrian empire, for the late Emperor was incapable of governing, and the present one, if capable, is not disposed to interfere much with the policy that Metternich has been enabled to consolidate into a system. He crushes all freedom of thought and speech it is true, but he provides for the physical well-being of the people, and probably the earth does not present a more contented or well-fed people than the Austrians. He has also done much for the financial and commercial prosperity of the Italian States, which are, in these respects, a contrast to those of the Papal Government; the jealousy of any taint of free principles creeping in, being about equal in each of them. But, under the Russian Government there is nothing to redeem the miserable thralldom in which the people are held; they are physically depressed as well as morally degraded; where this state of things has existed for ages, where the monarchs have had unlimited power, and where so little has been done by either monarchs or ministers, for bettering the condition of the mass, it is unjust to lavish on them praise so unequalled, that it would scarcely be merited by a Sully, a Colbert, or an Alfred!

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY AND THE ROYAL PRINCE.

We are highly gratified at being able to announce that her Majesty is improving daily in health and strength, and the most satisfactory accounts are given also of the royal infant. The Queen has so far progressed towards recovery, that Dr. Locock has been able to leave the Castle for the Continent. The following is the letter of our Windsor correspondent, dated Thursday evening:

Her Majesty and the infant Prince are in the enjoyment of good health. Indeed, her Majesty is so well in the course of a day or two the Queen will be enabled to leave her chamber in the August Tower, for a contiguous room at the royal residence. His Royal Highness Prince Albert walked across the Home-park this morning, and visited the Queen's kennel and the royal aviary. The Prince was attended by Lieut.-Colonel Wyke, Esquire in Waiting to his Royal Highness. The Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken for their usual drive, both this morning and in the afternoon, in the Home Park. The Duchess of York, Lady Lytton, and the Princess of Cambridge, who rode out on her favourite horse, the grey, by Colonel Wyke. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty this afternoon. Her Royal Highness will dine with the Prince Consort at the Castle this evening. A public dinner, in honour of the birthday of the Duchess of Kent, took place this afternoon, at the Hope Inn, Frogmore. A splendid supply of viands, which was dressed at Frogmore House, was presented to the worthy host, Mr. Miles, by her Royal Highness. The auspicious event was celebrated by the attendance of upwards of fifty of the principal inhabitants of Old and New Windsor. The chair was taken, and shily filled, by John Clode, jun., Esq., one of the town councilors of the borough of New Windsor. The usual 121 toasts were proposed and responded to in the best style, and everything passed off harmoniously and right merrily. The birthday of His Royal Highness Prince Albert, on Monday next, on which occasion the various will be presented by her Majesty's illustrious consort. The splendid back, the gift of the Prince, was shown by his Royal Highness himself, in the Great Park, on Monday last. On the same evening the town will be illuminated; and a splendid display of fireworks will take place in the east terrace of the Castle, under the direction of Mr. Fenwick, of Vauxhall, who received the necessary instructions from Mr. G. E. Anson, Police Officer's private secretary, on Monday last. Several sets of pieces will be exhibited, emblematical of the auspicious occasion, interspersed with immense discharges of rockets, maroons, &c.

On Saturday last Prince Albert left the Castle at two o'clock, to visit the Duchess of Kent. On the return of the Duchess of Kent to Frogmore her Royal Highness received congratulatory visits on the occasion of her birthday, from her Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge.

SUNDAY.—This morning Prince Albert, the Court, and the domestics of the royal household attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. The Duchess of Kent attended divine service in Windsor Church. Prince Albert walked in the clove and pleasure grounds of the Castle in the forenoon, and the royal children were taken out for an airing.

MONDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert inspected the Scots Fusilier Guards in garrison in the Great Park. Colonel Bouvier, Esquire in Waiting, attended his Royal Highness. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at the Castle in the evening from her residence, Frogmore Lodge, and dined with Prince Albert.

TUESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out early this morning deer shooting. In the afternoon his Royal Highness drove out in a carriage. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Alice were taken out in a carriage in the forenoon; and her Royal Highness the Princess Royal went out on a pony. The royal family were again taken airings in the afternoon.

WEDNESDAY.—Prince Albert left the Castle soon this morning, to inspect the Scots Fusilier Guards in the Great Park. In the forenoon the Prince walked out, attended by Mr. G. E. Anson. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were taken for a carriage drive this morning. Her Royal Highness the Princess Royal took equestrian exercise. In the afternoon the royal family were taken airings.

LOUIS PHILIPPE'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.—The French says everything has been finally arranged for the visit of the King of the French to England, but that his absence will not exceed a week. Active preparations are on foot in Paris for the intended journey. M. de Montalivet, the Minister of the Civil List, was said to have drawn a sum of 3,000,000*fr.* to defray the expenses of his Majesty.

The Duke of Wellington arrived in town on Wednesday afternoon from Nuneham Park, the seat of his Grace the Archbishop of York. We are glad to learn that his Grace has suffered no inconvenience from the fatigue he has recently undergone in accompanying the Prince of Prussia on his tour through England.

BIRTH DAY OF THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—Her Royal Highness completed her 38th year on Saturday last. Her Royal Highness received congratulatory visits in the course of the day from several members of the Royal Family on the occasion, and the event was celebrated in the metropolis by illuminations at the various churches, most of the principal tradesmen to the Royal Duchess testifying their loyalty in a similar manner.

DEATH OF THE GRAND DUCHESS ALEXANDRA.—Last week some of our correspondents gave an account of the death of the Princess, but knowing from authentic sources, that the report was premature, we did not notice it. We regret, however, to learn that official accounts have since been received from St. Petersburg of the decease of her Imperial Highness. She was third daughter of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and consort of his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, her presumptive to the Danish throne, and heir apparent to the electorate of Hesse Cassel. This melancholy and lamentable event has been expected for some time, and the fatal malady of his favourite daughter was the principal reason of the Emperor's shortening his visit to England. Her Imperial Highness was born June 24th, 1825, and was married on the 23rd of January last to Prince Frederick of Hesse.

MARRIAGE OF THE EARL OF MULDRAW TO MISS RUSSELL.—On Saturday last, the Earl of Mulgrave was married at Harrogate, near Leeds, to Miss Laura Russell, the niece of the Duchess Dowager of Cleveland.

Lord and Lady Palmerston have been to Belgium. At Brussels they visited the theatre, and also paid several diplomatic visits. Lord and Lady Palmerston left Brussels on Sunday for Prussia. On Saturday they dined with the King and Queen of the Belgians, who paid marked attention to them during the whole of their stay.

Prince Liechtenstein and suite have arrived in this country.

MARRIAGE OF CAPTAIN BERNAL AND MISS OSBORNE.—The marriage of Captain B. Bernal, M.P. for Wycombe, and Miss Catherine Isabella Osborne, daughter of Lady Osborne, was solemnized on Tuesday, at St. George's Church, Hanover-square.

DEATH OF THE BARONESS ROSEMORE.—We regret to announce the death of the Baroness Rosemore, which took place at the Dell, near Windsor, on Tuesday morning.

Lady Brougham left town on Wednesday for Westmoreland. Her ladyship is, we regret to learn, in a delicate state of health.

THE PRINCE ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.

Last Saturday evening the Duke of Wellington gave a magnificent entertainment at Aspley House to his Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia.

The Prince has since been on a tour of visits in the country. On Monday his Royal Highness went to Portsmouth. After inspecting various departments of the Dock-yard, his Royal Highness visited the Prince, the Duke of Wellington, with a numerous suite of naval and military officers, embarked on board the Comet steamer, for the purpose of going to Bournemouth to visit the Countess.

On Tuesday the Prince went to Oxford, and his visit, in company with the Noble Chancellor (the Duke of Wellington) excited great interest.

The royal carriage entered the gates of St. John's College at ten minutes after one o'clock, where, upon alighting, the Prince was received by the Vice-Chancellor of the University, Dr. Wytter, who, it will be recollected, is also President of St. John's College. The Duke of Wellington introduced Dr. Wytter to his Royal Highness, and the illustrious party then proceeded to the principal saloon of the Vice-Chancellor's residence, where refreshment was served. The royal party subsequently proceeded to the dining-room, where the gallant duke stood himself in his undress robes as Chamberlain.

The Prince, who received his degree as a Doctor of Civil Law, upon the occasion of his visit to the University of Oxford with his late father, in 1814, wore the scarlet robe and black velvet cap as the order. The Earl of Westmoreland was also similarly attired.

An appropriate address was subsequently presented to the Prince by the Duke of Wellington, as Chancellor of the University, to which a suitable reply was given.

In one part of the address there was this passage:—"The mutual respect and good-will which have happily long existed between Prussia and Great Britain have been refreshed and strengthened by the recent visit of the reigning Monarch to our beloved country."

In reference to the Prince said, in his answer, "I am thankful that the peace of Europe—the happy re-establishment of which brought me to this country in my first youth—has been preserved during these 20 years, and that the mutual regard and friendship between the two countries has been maintained without interruption, and strengthened."

"I am sure the King, my father, will learn with the greatest satisfaction the continuance of feelings which he so fully appreciated, and which he warmly returns."

The Prince, after seeing all the curiosities of Oxford, went to Nuneham, to dine with the Archbishop of York.

Amongst the guests honoured with invitations to meet his Royal Highness were Viscount de Bunsen, the Countess of Essex, Miss Johnson, and Mr. Samuel Rogers. Dinner was served in the banquetting-room, at eight o'clock, in the most excellent style.

After leaving Nuneham his Royal Highness went to Sozow, and from thence to Berlin.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE POST OFFICE SYSTEM.—Within the last few days some facts have been disclosed which prove that the system of espionage, sanctioned by Sir James Graham, has been adopted by some of the letter-carriers. It appears that these individuals have been for some time in the habit of opening letters directed to noblemen, gentlemen, and others connected with the sporting world, with the view of disposing of such information, for some pecuniary consideration, or bettering themselves upon the strength of it. From what has already been ascertained, there can be no question but that this illegal and most reprehensible practice has been carried on for a length of time, and that letters both inward and outward, have been thus treated, and their contents copied, the letters being afterwards duly delivered, or forwarded, as the case might be. The discovery was made in this way:—Two letters, open, were found upon the seat occupied by a letter-carrier named Tappin, directed to well-known sporting characters, but with which he had no business, as the parties did not live upon his district, or walk. Upon being closely questioned, Tappin admitted that such letters had frequently come into his hands, and eventually he gave so much information concerning the opening of the letters, the use made of their contents, and the parties connected with the extraordinary affair, that six other letter-carriers and one subscriber were at once brought up for examination. The six men, implicated by Tappin, have all admitted having received their information, as to the state of the odds and other racing particulars, from the opening of letters directed to, or received from Lord George Westmoreland, Mr. Tattersall, Mr. Lee, and other celebrated sporting characters. By means of these communications, several parties connected with the turf have inured the earliest information of what it was proposed to do in the case of a favourite horse. These letter-carriers, it appears also, have been in the habit of betting themselves, to a large amount, at the races at Epsom, Goodwood, and other meetings of importance, as well as upon the Leger at Doncaster during the current week. The matter is still under inquiry.

THE ANTIQUARIAN WELLS IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—The Fountains in Trafalgar-square are in a state of forwardness, and the engine house in Hemmings-row, at the rear of the National Gallery, has been surmounted by an iron tank, capable of holding about 30,000 gallons of water. To this building there is attached a tower, at the top of which another iron reservoir will be erected. The boring for water has made great progress, having been carried down to a depth of upwards of 200 feet, and a plentiful supply of water is now obtained, rising to about 60 feet above the surface. Another boring is also being made in Trafalgar-square, adjacent to the National Gallery, connected by a tunnel with the former, which is intended to convey the water. The water obtained from these wells is intended not only for the supply of the fountains, but for the House of Parliament, and the various Government offices in the vicinity, and will be applicable in cases of fire.

THE NORMAN TOWER, HACKNEY.—This once popular resort will soon be numbered among the "things that were." It is now in course of destruction, and in its place an office for transacting the manorial business of the parish will be erected. The only memento of the tower will be its assembly-room, which, it is said, will be approached by a spacious passage.

SUPPOSED FOUNDATIONS OF A ROMAN TEMPLE.—On Monday, while some men were excavating the ground in Broad-street, south of Woking-street, they discovered a Roman brick pavement (the bricks one inch square), which was several feet in length, and at a depth of eight feet from the surface. On Saturday last some Roman pavement of a similar character, and parallel with the former, was dug up in Friday-street. It is supposed that this pavement extends under the houses from street to street. A few days ago a Roman sewer was met with at the bottom of Friday-street, adjoining Great Fish-street, the first that has been seen in London. It was at about eighteen feet below the surface, and composed of Kentish flags, bricks, and lime. The width of it was about two feet. Very extensive excavations have been made in this neighbourhood, for the formation of a sewer, in the course of which numerous Roman walls impeded the progress of the workmen.

ALARMING EXPLOSION OF FOUL AIR.—On Monday morning an explosion took place in the sewer in White-street, St. George's, Southwark, which has been under repair for some days past. It appears that the men, 15 in number, descended for the purpose of cleaning it out, taking with them a lighted candle in a lantern, when the foul air suddenly took fire, and exploded with a loud report, forcing up several iron gratings, and injuring five of the workmen to such an extent, that they were obliged to be removed to Guy's Hospital. One man named James Stewart, was so much injured that apprehensions are entertained of his recovery.

THE NEW POLICE COURT.—The new police court which has lately been erected at St. Pancras, Borough, in lieu of Union-hall, has just been completed. The new court will be opened for business at Michaelmas. The new court at Kensington will be completed at the same time.

CANAL FAIR.—The reports of this popular fair commenced on Monday morning, and a busy day for the amusement of the holiday keepers was never seen. The shows were numerous and of first-rate order, embracing every natural and artificial curiosity between the Torrid and Frigid zones. "Original Tom Thumbs" and "Unquestionable Ojibways in fine preservation" were in great abundance. The visitors were very numerous, and the best order prevailed.

IMPROVEMENTS IN WHITECHURCH.—The new street, which is to connect Spitalfields with the London Docks, and to form part of an extended line of communication with the Eastern Railway, is in a state of great forwardness. With very few exceptions, the whole of the houses between White-hall and Spitalfields Church are removed, and with these the most notorious dens of infamy and crime. These removals include the worst part of Wentworth-street, the site of which is to be appropriated to the erection of a new district church, with East-street and Rose Lane. In the first street the Catherine Wheel public-house, noted as a former rendezvous of Dick Turpin and his comrades, from whence they sallied forth, and kept Epping-forest and the Essex roads to sea, was also a celebrated public-house, known familiarly by the name of the "Black Bull," where Harris, a notorious east-end prize-fighter and thief, was apprehended about twenty years since, for a murder committed at Hackney having been concealed in the house three weeks.

FIELD-DAY IN HYDE PARK.—On Wednesday the Coldstream Guards (Colonel Balfour's) of the Duke of Cambridge had a field day in Hyde Park. The movements were given the watch with great effect, and in a manner that reflected much credit on the commanding officers and men. After forming into line, the troops carried arms giving a military salute.

STEAM BOAT REGULATIONS FOR THE RIVER THAMES.—At a full Committee of Aldermen, a long discussion took place a day or two ago upon the subject of the proposed regulations for the steamers. Some conversation took place upon the third clause, which went to regulate that the space given to every person should be four feet. The objection to the clause had suggested three feet instead of four. By this clause the Ruby, Graveland boat, which had been known to carry 1000 or 1100 passengers, would be limited to 674, and that number the committee considered to be quite large enough, and adopted the regulation. The other steam-vessels will, of course, be regulated in proportion to that criterion. The regulations will be reported to the Court of Aldermen on the next court day.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.—A Commission of Lunacy has been held at St. Luke's workhouse, Chelsea, to inquire into the state of mind of Brent Spencer, the natural son of the late General Sir Arthur Brent Spencer. The alleged lunatic was the person whose case excited so much public interest in May last, when Mrs. Eleanor Pelham, his mother, was taken before the magistrates at Queen-square Police-court, and charged with having kept him confined in a room in a most filthy state. Mr. Thomas, who appeared as counsel for the authorities of the parish, stated that Sir Brent Spencer, the father of the lunatic, died in 1829, leaving him a £6000, and to his mother, Mrs. Pelham, £3000, which, upon her death, would fall to her son. They would not have to inquire into the motives for the man's confinement, but it would appear that his insanity commenced in 1839, or before, when he was disappointed in a love match. He then took to drinking, and about the above time he became of unsound mind, and was confined by his mother. Witnesses were examined who deposed to various strange acts on the part of the individual in question. When he was several paces off money taking, he said, pointing to a half-crown, "Oh, that's a good deal," and when asked which he would rather have, he pointed to the half crown. Once, when a witness asked what he was, he said he was "Will Wether, the bald smugger." He was very dirty in his eating, not using either knife or fork, and directly he got his dinner, he was in the habit of throwing it about, but when it was picked up would eat it. He would eat it after it had been thrown on the fire, and would then laugh. Sometimes he would ask for brandy, and bottles of cherry or raspberry jam. He is a stout-built man, and appeared to be in the most perfect health. His large red mustaches and whiskers, together with the vacant expression of his eye, gave him the appearance of a lunatic. When the names of "Tom Spring" and "Dutch Sam" were mentioned he said he knew them both. In fact, he appeared hardly conscious of what was said to him. The jury returned a verdict, "That Brent Spencer was of unsound mind, and that he had been so and incapable of managing his affairs since the 3rd of July, 1839."

The steam-ship Great Western, Captain Matthews, sailed from Liverpool, for New York, at noon, on Saturday last, with 132 passengers, and the largest amount of freight she has ever taken out.

DEATH OF DR. SYNTAX.—An eccentric individual, named Sherriff, but better known to the literary world as Dr. Syntax, died last week at Edinburgh. Poor Syntax's hairless eccentricities were notorious throughout Edinburgh, but he chiefly loved to display them among the students of the University, in the Parliament House, and in our city churches. Dressed with the most scrupulous care and cleanliness, in an antiquated costume of a semi-military cast, he was to be seen every Sunday strolling through the streets at a rapid pace, with the stick over his shoulder, and was sure to plant himself in the principal seat of the front gallery of one of the city churches, where he made himself most conspicuous by standing up while psalms were sung, and occasionally sketching the portrait of the preacher, while the rest of the congregation were comfortably attending to the service. He claimed the merit of having been the means of introducing many improvements into the practice of church music. He was also a regular attendant at the meetings of the General Assembly, where he employed himself in taking sketches of the principal characters there, and often drew around him groups of the clergy to inspect his portraits.

POSTSCRIPT.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO IRELAND.—It is stated on good authority that her Majesty intends to visit Ireland during the present autumn, soon after the month of October. Should the weather prove favourable, the Queen will also take a short aquatic excursion next month.

THE GRAND DUCHESS ALEXANDRA.—We learn that the death of the Grand Duchess Alexandra of Russia, announced in another part of our paper, took place at St. Petersburg, on the 15th inst., in childbirth. The royal infant died on the same day.

THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.—His Majesty King Leopold is shortly expected to visit England.

THE O'CONNELL CASE.—The Judges are expected to assemble on Monday to consider their opinions in the case of the Queen v. O'Connell and others. The judgment, as has been already announced, will be delivered on the Monday following, September 2nd. A report is in circulation that in the event of the judgment against O'Connell and the other State prisoners being affirmed by the House of Lords, an act of Royal grace in their favour is contemplated, and that the remaining term of their imprisonment will be remitted.

FIRE AT ISLINGTON.—Yesterday a fire broke out in a newly-finished house in Downham-road, near the Rosemary Branch, Islington, and the building was completely gutted in half an hour. The house was insured in the Phoenix Fire Office.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE THAMES.—At an early hour yesterday morning a lamentable occurrence took place near Wilford Reach. Four gentlemen—Mr. John and Thomas Hayes, of West Wilford; Mr. J. Staines, of Sutton; and Mr. William Peters, of the Hyde Farm—proceeded to a game in the Thames. The two latter gentlemen occupied a punt. Mr. Peters, fishing with ground tackle, whilst Mr. Staines commenced trolling. While in the act of throwing his line, Mr. Staines, who is somewhat tall, caused the punt to incline suddenly, and the action threw Mr. Peters from his seat into the water, and before assistance could reach him he was drowned.

SHOCKING SUICIDE FROM DISTRESS.—Yesterday an inquest was held before Mr. C. J. Gifford, at the Emory Arms, Deptford, on the body of Ellen Kendall, aged 19 years, whose body was found in the water of the Grand Surrey Canal, near Black Horse-bridge, Lower road, Deptford. It appeared from the evidence, that Mary Ann Kendall, a sister of the deceased, had attempted to drown herself at the same time, but was saved by a waterman. Jane Kendall deposed that she was sister of the deceased. Could not say what motive she supposed the deceased did all be could for them. There were at least four persons on the boat. The shop they worked for paid 14*d.* to 2*d.* each for shortmaking. It required four hours hard work to make one at 3*d.* At that price they must be well made. Could not say how long it took to make one at 1*d.* Could make three in sixteen hours. Deceased had plied her shuttle some time previously to her death. They had been redeemed. Deceased and family were not in particular want of food at the time. They had breakfast on tinned meat. It was not a usual thing for them to have dinner. They did not look for it. Could not tell what her father earned. He was a ship stowage. Deceased had no work the last week. They eluded their earnings together for food. Deceased had been for days together without working her last. They all had. Did not think that caused her to commit the act. She had had food regularly for several days previous to death. In consequence of the absence of several witnesses, and the very weak state of body and mind of the surviving sister, Mary Ann Kendall, the coroner adjourned the inquiry to Monday morning next.

MURDER OF A WIFE AT RICHMOND.—Yesterday morning information was received at the different police stations, that a man named William New, a shoemaker, residing in the Marsh-gate-road, Richmond, had murdered his wife on the previous night, by stabbing her in the side with a carving knife. He afterwards made his escape, leaving his victim who was found by the police, quite dead. He is about 27 years of age, light complexion, about 5 feet 7 inches high. A man answering his description was seen by a policeman at Nottigham.

It is computed that there were no fewer than 100,000 visitors in Glasgow last week, to witness the proceedings of the Highland Agricultural Society.

A melancholy instance of sudden death occurred last week at Havre, at the distribution of prizes at the Ursuline Convent. Madame Monnier, the wife of the proprietor of the Café des Animateurs, proceeded to the ceremony in full expectation of enjoying the gratification of finding her niece amongst the successful pupils. Not being very well placed for seeing what was going on, she inquired of those around her of the name of her niece and been mentioned, and on receiving a reply in the negative, the disappointment gave her so great a shock that she suddenly fell down senseless. Medical aid was immediately afforded, but life had fled. The deceased was an exceedingly strong, healthy woman, of about thirty years of age.

STEAM-POWER.—It appears from an official return just published, that the horse power of the Government steam-vessels, between April 1839, and August, 1841, was 4495, the number of vessels 18, and the tonnage 16,531. The horse-power, from September 1841, to July, 1844, was 31,361, the number of vessels 39, and the tonnage 26,894, being a considerable increase on the other return. A vessel is now being built, to be called the Terrible, which will possess greater power than any previous steam vessel for war.

THE ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—Lord Brougham has written a long letter to the editor of the Herald in explanation of his measure for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt where the amount does not exceed £20. The noble and learned Lord insists that an attorney at law is not necessary to witness the petition, but may be any person to act as agent for the insolvent. Mr. Commissioner Fitcham, however, has decided to direct opposite to Lord Brougham, and insists that the signature to the schedule must be witnessed by an attorney. Lord Brougham, in his letter, hints at the conduct of certain legal practitioners who endeavour to interrupt the justice and the mercy of the Legislature, and warns insolvents not to throw away their money in obtaining their release. We see by the country papers that the promoters in various parts of the kingdom have taken the necessary steps under the new act to obtain their liberation, and the gaols have been emptied of debtors. The same thing has taken place in the prisons of the metropolis.

THE ORIGINATOR OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

(To the Editor.)

I have been much interested by your illustrations and descriptions of the New Royal Exchange; but, I think it ought to be generally known that the nation is indebted to the original building to a Whigman. I am sure you will agree in thinking it but justice that this fact should be published. The truth of this may be seen at once, by a reference to "Pecknam's History of North Wales," and also a more recently published work, "Bosdon's History of Sir T. Graham." While the name of this latter merchant is loaded to the skies, and his memory held in reverence by all connected with the trade of London, the name of the real projector is scarcely known. It was Sir Richard Clough, Knight, the friend and partner of Sir T. Graham, and who resided at Antwerp, observing the great convenience experienced by the merchants of that city, by their successful buildings, he sent over to his partner, the plan, &c., for the Royal Exchange, which plans we are indebted and part of the funds supplied by him. Sir R. Clough was born in Drubgh, in which he afterwards had an estate and built two mansions; he was succeeded by the high esteem of Queen Elizabeth, and was bestowed on him in marriage her cousin, the Lady Katherine Tudor. In a "list of his acts to the post of ye parish of Bergh," the name of Sir R. Clough frequently occurs; he is there styled "father to ye Queen." I hope when you recur to the Royal Exchange again, as I think you promised to do, you will take some notice of these facts, which, for the honour of my country, I wish to be known; and our English brethren occupying so many nooks in the temple of fame as they do, will not grudge an humble work to them for "a Tally."

Carmarvon, Your well-wisher, CADWALADER.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

"There is no place in the town which I so much love to frequent as the Royal Exchange."—ADDISON.

If we were called upon to point out that portion of the metropolis which has undergone the greatest number of changes, within the latest years, we should point to the locality shown, under various aspects, in the accompanying engraving. O'er her districts, it is true, may present instances of more general change; but, in the scene before us, the individual instances of transition have been truly extraordinary, and this within the short period of our life, or somewhat more than sixty years!

One of the ancientest pair of engravings shows the buildings on the site of the splendid Exchange just completed, as they appeared in the 5th or 17th; copied by Mrs. Whitlock, from a drawing by the celebrated Paul Sandby. The block of houses in the centre of the foreground, is that known as Bank-buildings, recently taken down; the equatorial status of the Duke of Wellington, now occupying the site of the old house. In the distance is seen the Royal Exchange, as it was rebuilt, within three years of its destruction in the great fire, nearly upon its former plan. It is stated by Wren, with a tower by Harewood. To the left are seen two churches, both of which have been removed. Between them is seen the Bank of England, first built in 1793; it consisted then of what is now only the centre of the present building, but the proprietors soon after began to acquire ground and premises both east and west. Eastward they quickly bought the property up to Bartholomew-lane; but, westward, they were stopped by the church of St. Christopher-le-Stocks, which stood until after the fire in 1790; when, from a conviction of the danger of a lofty tower looking over the Bank, an act of parliament was obtained for taking it down; and, soon after that time, all the principal front of the Bank was arranged and completed by Sir Robert Taylor, up to the corner of Prince's-street, then a crooked and narrow street leading to Coleman-street. Bank Buildings, just taken down, were built by the Bank, under the advice of the same architect, in the place of a mass of old houses, which had occupied the site from the fire of London. At this time, though Cornhill was a broad street, the houses on the above site came to a point; and Threadneedle street is marked in Gwynne's plan as only 14*d.* wide.

Referring to the church of St. Christopher-le-Stocks, both this edifice and the new buildings of the Bank were exposed to great danger during the riots of 1790. On the morning of Wednesday, the 7th of June, the leaders of the mob made no secret of their intention to attack the Bank of England at night, and the clerks of the Bank, and a few of the citizens, formed themselves into a party for its defence, headed by the celebrated John Wilkes, who gave the rioters their first check. Dr. Johnson, in one of his letters to Mrs. Thrale, declares that if the mob had attacked the Bank on Tuesday, in the height of the panic, by obtaining possession of St. Christopher's Church, which, like the Bank-buildings, was entirely undefended, "they might have carried irrevocably away whatever they had found."

St. Christopher's was a very ancient foundation, and was so extensively damaged in the Great Fire, that nearly the whole of the body of the church was taken down, and rebuilt by Wren, the original tower alone remaining. The architecture of the church was of a very unpretending character: the roof of the chancel was so near the height of that of the Bank, that, in all probability, had the rioters once obtained access to the church, they could easily have passed from one roof to the other, and thus become possessed of the Bank treasure. After the riots the church was taken down, as we have already stated.

The church seen in the distance, is that of St. Bartholomew-the-Little by the Exchange, so called to distinguish it from St. Bartholomew-the-Less, in Smithfield. The tower was ancient, and in the upper story resembled a dismantled ruin; the body of the church was destroyed in the great fire, but rebuilt by Wren. The entire fabric was taken down in the year 1839, and nearly upon its site were erected the highly embellished premises of the Sun Fire Office.

Thus, reader, you perceive how great has been the architectural change in this portion of the City, within somewhat more than 65 years. The extensive front of the buildings of the Bank of England, has altogether been changed; and

Sir Robert Taylor's embellished façade has given way to the still more ornate creations of Sir John Soane, in unity of design, and exquisiteness of detail, presenting a truly classic pile. In place of the unpicturesque block of houses, and the old Exchange, in the centre we have a truly magnificent palace-home—a superb temple of commerce for the assembling of our merchants. This, however, is but the nucleus of a grand scheme of embellishment; whence diverse streets of classic architecture, which have scarcely a parallel in any other European capital. Nor ought we to pass by, even for the present, the fine effect of the Exchange portico—the most magnificent in the metropolis, in juxtaposition with that of the Mansion House—a massive Palladian pile of extraordinary grandeur, and occasional beauty of detail. In each of these palatial edifices, the spectator will scarcely fail to be struck with the richness of the Corinthian order, so prominent in their decorative details. In the area between these noble structures, is placed the statue of the greatest hero of the age, an admirable work of art, and a fitting tribute for this focus of commercial ascendancy, to which the illustrious original has, by his conquests, so gloriously contributed.

It is expected that, during the ensuing month, the New Exchange will be opened with becoming splendour. Meanwhile, it may be interesting to report the finishing of the sculptural decorations, and the works remaining for completion.

On the outside the sculpture on the pediment has been finished, and is considered on the whole to be a work of considerable merit. On the stone base supporting the Statue of Commerce, which forms the centre and principal figure of the group, is the very appropriate inscription from the Psalms—"The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof." On the frieze of the portico a Latin inscription is partly cut, recording the very curious fact of the founding of the Exchange in the reign of one Queen, viz., Elizabeth, and its rebuilding in the reign of another, her present Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. In the centre of the south front, over the three openings, the arms of Sir Thomas Gresham, of the Mercers' Company, and of the city of London, are introduced on the key stones, and, with the architectural accompaniments of festoons and other decorations, give great beauty to this most important entrance.

The various offices and shops are in a remarkable state of forwardness, particularly the great rooms on the one pair floor, intended for Lloyd's establishment. In these rooms the scaffolding have been removed, and they are to be the finest apartments in the city. One of them is 100 feet in length. Over the great western entrance is a coat of the royal arms, with supporters in alto relievo, carved in a style of amazing boldness and effect, by Mr. Carew. The fixing of it will be completed in the course of the ensuing week. Mr. Carew is finishing a splendid statue of Whittington for one of the principal niches of the edifice.

The decoration of the interior is proceeding pari passu: it will present some fine specimens of fresco, encaustic, and other beautiful styles of mural embellishment; whilst the pavements will be triumphs of ingenuity both in hitherto-considered "lost art," and the ingenuity of our own age.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

THE WAR IN MOROCCO.

FRENCH FLEET OFF TANGIER.

BOMBARDMENT OF TANGIER.

We have been favoured with the sketches, whence the annexed engravings have been executed, by an officer on board her Majesty's ship Warspite, accompanied by the following:—

Warspite, Tangier Bay, August 1, 1844.

Dear Sir,—I send you by packet, thinking it may be useful for your valuable journal, a view of Tangier Bay, with the French ships taking up a position in the Bay, preparatory to their bombarding the town.

The French force here now consists of three line-of-battle ships, one frigate, and six steamers. Prince de Joinville has his flag flying on board the Suffren, of 99 guns. They have on board about 2000 soldiers.

The town certainly has the name of being fortified, but it is in a dilapidated state, and a frigate would take the place easily, though the French are making a formidable appearance. Tangier is now being pillaged by the different tribes coming from the country, and, altogether, the town is in a wretched state, the Pacha not being able to keep them down. The different Consuls are now all living on board their respective men-of-war.

I hope my drawings may be useful.

Yours, &c. &c.,

A CORRESPONDENT.*

P.S.—We have no communication with the shore, consequently, I have not much intelligence.

In our last publication we gave the important announcement of the bombardment of Tangier by the vessels under the command of the Prince de Joinville, and we now collect from various sources all the particulars which have transpired of the attack.

At daylight, on the 5th of August, an unusual stir and activity was apparent in the French squadron, the whole of the steam force getting up their steam, the other ships shortening-in cable, and altogether there were unequivocal indications of a general movement. It was supposed at first that the French were about to depart, but universal surprise was created at seeing, shortly after 7 a.m., the steamers with the ships in tow, and arranging them in hostile position before the town of Tangier, and also various other forts in the bay! Although the Moors were at their guns, both in the citadel and various defences, still they did not offer any interruption to their opponents in taking up their position for attack, which also the French did in a very leisurely manner. Had the Moors opened fire whilst in the above predicament, there seems but little doubt that the guns from the batteries would have been most destructive upon the ships; more particularly as the ships lay for a considerable time in a raking position. At the very outset, therefore, in this early stage of the proceeding, the Prince was loudly censured for evincing so much want of judgment.

At forty minutes past eight, a.m., the French ships, being in position, simultaneously, by signal, opened fire upon the fortifications of the town and other adjacent batteries, castle, &c. The Suffren and Gemannes were occupied till two p.m., in silencing the citadel and batteries of the town; and it must not be forgotten that those formidable liners received during the latter part of the above period the able assistance of the Belle Poule, whilst the other armed vessels were engaging the various detached forts in other parts of the bay. At the first onset the Moors smartly replied to their antagonists, but did not maintain the opposition much more than half an hour, excepting from one gun at the castle, and another solitary gun lower down. This latter was vigorously plied till near noon. Although the Moors soon relinquished their guns, yet these two guns afforded an obstinate resistance, which caused the French to continue a protracted cannonade, which was remarked to have been very irregular and desultory, and without precision. Indeed, at the termination of the above attack, from a distant observation, it did not appear that either the castle or batteries generally had sustained very material damage. Very few guns are disabled. The walls, from being in a weak and decayed condition, are of course greatly shattered in a few places; but, if those very batteries were in the possession of skilful artillerists, they are, notwithstanding, in their present state, still capable of a formidable defence against such opponents.

According to another account, some shells and rockets were in the first instance discharged from the steamers; but being found to fall short, or from some other cause, the attack was afterwards by cannonade from the large ships and the Belle Poule, and directed towards the batteries only. The Suffren, on board of which the Prince was, having been the closest in, received the most damage. A gentleman who had been at Cadix with the French squadron lately, has written to say that that vessel received twenty-one shots; forty had been previously stated. The Belle Poule was said to have been greatly injured, but the mischief to her has been but trifling as far as can be ascertained. From the distance at which the squadron was obliged by circumstances to take up their anchorage, or from some other cause, the six hours' firing was certainly followed by results very different from what might have been expected. The loss of lives on shore, including wretched Jews, has not exceeded seven or eight. We do not know with any certainty how far the French may have lost men or officers, these matters being always so vaguely stated. The Prince has admitted that the Moorish garrison behaved very well. Honour be to the gallant General (Ben-Ahmed Abd-el-Melach) who behaved so well, in preventing the Kabyles from entering the town and causing total destruction. The Moors stood to their guns to the last moment. It does not seem to have been a question of making a breach, for the parapets are not seriously damaged at any point in particular, and the landing of the 3000 men "de débarquement," stated by the Debate as being on board, could not naturally not have been ventured upon in the face of the many thousand Kabyles close at hand.

The Herald of Wednesday, gives the following report of the Prince de Joinville's proceedings:—

"Tangier has been bombarded, and the Prince de Joinville is preparing to attack Mogador and the other ports on the coast of Morocco. The cause of so unexpected an act, and of such hostile demonstrations, remains a mystery, which neither the papers nor letters from Gibraltar unfold."

Then follow some details about the bombardment, which concludes by stating, that "the result was the almost total destruction of the Moorish batteries, with the loss of 35 men killed and wounded on the side of the French, and some slight damage to the French vessels, and particularly to the Argus steamer. The loss of the Moors was considerable, according to a letter dated on board a Spanish vessel in the bay."

"The vessels of different other nations lying in the bay remained passive spectators of the fight, and on the evening of the 6th the French fleet sailed for Cadix, where they arrived on the 7th, in order to repair all damages."

"If ere the Prince again sailed from Cadix he did not receive satisfactory intelligence he would proceed to bombard Mogador, Salé, and Larache, but without effecting a landing or taking possession of any point on the coast."

The Montrose steamer, which brought the Lisbon mails, furnishes a few interesting facts respecting the bombardment. Prince de Joinville alone discharged 3900 shots. The Moors returned the fire with a rapidity which astonished their enemies. The Suffren received 40 shots in her side. The Moors fought their guns as long as they were serviceable.

Her Majesty's steamers Hecle and Vesuvius were quietly looking on the whole of the action, as well as the American frigate Columbia.

The town itself has not suffered. The Portuguese Consul's house having been abandoned by the persons in charge, is the only one which has been injured. The destruction of the works is not so complete as had been represented; many of the guns have been found still serviceable.

There are 25,000 troops at Rabat, and 1500 cavalry at Tangier.

The free communication with Tangier, since the Prince left, is re-established. A correspondent of the Times, a Naval officer, who dates from on board the Warspite, Bay of Tangier, Aug. 7, after giving a version of the attack, says, "that upon the whole it appeared the universal impression that the Prince, with his two brothers and his wife, had not displayed a good exhibition in gentry; and, in two particular instances that occurred during the day, the impression as to the total deficiency of the French in the art of gunnery received most remarkable confirmation.

It is correspondent proceeds to allude to the case of the Triton, 82 guns, and the Belle Poule a heavy new gun frigate, as illustrative of this insufficiency with respect to gunnery.

Another Naval officer writes in the same spirit, and states his opinion of the Prince de Joinville's fleet in these terms:—"According to the opinion of sailors the French went rather a ludicrous way to work and I may say rather a cowardly one too; the steamers being all under weigh, they took a position outside the ships amongst us that were remaining neutral."

"At fifty minutes past eight, the French line-of-battle ships opened on the sea with three broadsides, with a very bad direction, which we were rather surprised at, considering they had all the morning to consider, and that they were only 800 yards off. The forts returned the salute with spirit, and the bombardment then became general. As the smoke cleared away, we saw the poor unfortunate Moorish forts crumbling into dust. As they were in a dilapidated state before the action commenced, it was impossible that they should stand against the broadsides of the French line-of-battle ships; but still, though the firing was great, every now and then you would see the smoke heaving from the embrasures of the fort, and seeing the Frenchman. One fort, on a hill, annoyed them very much, but after a little time, when the French knew they had nothing to fear from the enemy's fire, their direction became very good, and soon silenced the fort. The signal was made from the Suffren, with the flag of the Prince de Joinville, to cease firing, which was instantly obeyed; but then the forts would not give in, and fired a few shots which, of course, made the Frenchmen open fire again, and did not have on the Moorish town, and, no doubt, slaughtered a great mass of the inhabitants."

"At ten o'clock there was a very unusual firing, the forts having ceased. I understood they have not much ammunition. I am confident that a frigate could take the place, and they are quite ignorant of the present destructive warfare of European nations. So the French have not had much to contend with, and have only enjoyed a little target practice at the expense of the unfortunate Moors. There are a few ships along shore which annoy the atamers (though they keep close to all the ships that are neutral on the coast). The Prince has sent the Belle Poule to chase them, but she has been in vain. I forgot to mention the steamers fired a few rockets, which had very little effect."

The following letter has been received at Lloyd's:—

"Gibraltar, August 8.
The fire on the part of the French appears to have been chiefly directed to the fortifications, as the town has not suffered much. Our regiments, Mr. Hay, returned to Tangier on Sunday on the 5th instant, in the V. de France, from his mission to the Emperor, at Fez, and had the mortification to find that his mediation had been abandoned by the premature commencement of hostilities four hours previously. Tertian has been spared, and likely to continue as, owing to the low-lying and distance from the sea. The French squadron, it is said, intend to leave Tangier Bay; and, from a source which I consider worthy of credit, I believe the admiral intends to batter down and destroy all the defenceless sea-port towns on the western coast of Morocco as far as Mogador inclusive, by which measure private property alone will suffer. Some of the British subjects here trading to that part of the coast have applied to Admiral Owen for the protection of their interests in that quarter, and which his Excellency will endeavour to comply with as far as possible, though the means at his command are extremely limited, being only one or two small steamers, and no small sailing vessels at all suitable for that service. I believe Commodore Lockyer, of her Majesty's ship Albion, at Tangier, will be instructed to send the Hecate steamer to pick up the British Consuls and subjects along the west coast of Morocco."

"P. S.—Aug. 11.—The occupation of Morocco by the French will give a severe blow to British commerce, already completely excluded from Algeria, in consequence of the heavy duties imposed by the French Government on articles of our own manufacture. I have also to bring to your notice the assembling of a Spanish army, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, of about 10,000 men, in our immediate neighbourhood and Coats, destined for an attack on the Moors in concert (as reported) with the French forces. I believe this is to be increased to 20,000 men."

A Gibraltar letter thus describes the attack:—
"Most of the Moorish soldiers fell at their guns. The national flag remained flying over the town the entire day."

"During these operations the Suffren, being annoyed by a flocking bee from a battery called the Brengade's battery, which fired the Triton, 80 guns, which had hitherto been in reserve, and a few minutes afterwards that ship was towed within a pistol shot of the Brengade's battery, which she soon silenced."

"As yet I have not seen the French list of casualties, but I hear they amount to between thirty and forty killed and wounded."

"The Suffren and Argus suffered most, owing to their proximity to the heavy armed batteries, which fired nothing but grape shot. These two vessels were considerably cut up in their rigging and sails. The Prince de Joinville had a narrow escape, a muskman and a sailor being wounded close to him."

"During the chase, a steamer attempted to take the Brengade's battery with Congreve, but this was decidedly the worst part of the day's performance, most of the rockets exploding in the air before they reached their destination."

The following letter was written by a gentleman who accompanied Mr. Drummond Hay on his mission, and it will no doubt be read with interest:—

"You may, perhaps, be already aware that I accompanied Mr. Drummond Hay on his mission to the Sultan of Morocco. After remaining seventeen days at Morocco, we left it on the 19th ult., with every hope that the mission had succeeded, and on the 5th of August we had a personal interview with the Sultan at Rabat. He received us with the greatest kindness, seemed really grateful for Mr. Hay's intervention in the French and Spanish affairs, and asked by consulting every point in question, both by France and Spain. We were, therefore, surprised to find a heavy cannonade next morning, when about fifteen miles from Tangier, and on coming into the bay about eleven o'clock, found the Prince de Joinville, with three line of battle ships, six frigates, two brigs, and nine steamers bombarding the town. Besides the English ships Albion, Warspite, and Hecate, there were also in the bay the Spanish squadron, and an American, a Swedish, a Sardinian, and a Danish frigate, and a Danish steamer."

"On the night of the 5th the Prince was on board the Albion, stated his intention of leaving for Cadiz, and hopes that all would be permanently settled; but declared that he knew nothing whatever of Hay's mission, and that if necessary to proceed to hostilities, he could not wait for his return."

"The French fired very badly. They began the affair with three broadsides. They have twenty men killed and wounded, and the Suffren has forty shot in her hull. The Moors fought very gallantly. After six hours' firing the French ships were towed off by their steamers, the forts firing on them, and not a flag struck. I have been on shore at Tangier. The town is severely damaged at all the defences about the water port a good deal, but no breach anywhere. The Moors had one man killed, and one wounded (once dead); two children killed by fall of a house. There are but 300 regular soldiers in the town, and they have defended it faithfully against the King's army, who are in great numbers outside, and wish to pillage and burn it."

The recent bombardment of Tangier by the French, is not the first time that place has been exposed to destruction of its outworks and defences. Now that destruction has been effected by an enemy, but in the reign of Charles the Second, a devoted devotion was perpetrated by the friendly English. When the Merry Monarch married Catherine of Portugal, he received (in addition to a wife) a son-in-law, together with the two fortresses of Tangier, in Africa, and Bombay, in the East Indies. In 1661 the King adopted various schemes of economy for alleviating the necessities under which he then laboured. Among them was the abandonment and demolition of Tangier, though it had cost great sums of money; the mole being entirely destroyed, and the Garrison, being brought over to this country, served to augment the small army which the Monarch relied on as the solid basis of his authority. Thus, Tangier, not being the deemed worth the expense of keeping it in the hands of the English, was given up by them, the whole of the works having previously been blown up."

The city of Tangier is very strong by its position and the number of its batteries, which are well armed. It is a well fortified city, and flanked with round and square towers, are perhaps capable of a greater resistance than their appearance indicates. Several bastioned towers have been required, and put into a state of defence within the last few years. The city itself is of little importance; it is poor, and has little trade. Tangier has no interest but from its being the residence of the European Consuls, for its population only amounts to from 8000 to 10000, and its commerce is inferior to that of some other ports, notwithstanding its proximity to the European coast. The towers of the Consuls form the only ornament of the town. It is situated on the declivity of a calmous mountain, part of which is not built upon, and presents a naked and unpleasant appearance. The town, like all other places in Morocco, is surrounded by a wall flanked by round and square towers; this wall is enclosed by a ditch, 2000 metres in extent, but which has no counter wall; it is protected by a Moorish kasbah (fortress) of imposing appearance, and by a fort of Portuguese construction bastioned in the modern style, but half in ruins. The kasbah is mounted by twelve pieces of cannon, which command the Straits of Gibraltar. The ditches round the city are filled with trees, and cultivated as known gardens, the letting of which belongs to the governor, and who would take good care not to sacrifice the revenues he enjoys from them by putting the ditch in a proper state of defence. The rampart opposite the sea is remarkable for having two tiers of embankments with embankments, mounted by guns. On the right side the city is defended by steep rocks which prevent the approach of a landing force. The principal defences have been moved in front of the landing place near the marine gate. They consist of two batteries, mounting 60 pieces of heavy calibres, and 8 mortars, all training on the port. The gunnery of the batteries is very bad, the parapets are of masonry, but only three feet in thickness, and the embrasures are not far enough apart, which tends to diminish the accuracy of the battery. The landing place is flanked on either side by two batteries. Besides these defences of the port, the bay of Tangier is defended by six batteries in masonry, one built on Cape Malabata, and the others on the ruins of the old Tangier (the Fez of the Romans). They mount together 40 guns. The two batteries which flank the roadstead at its two extremities are raised on small hills, and at 1200 ft above the level of the sea, the others are at the water's edge. To attack the place by sea, it would be necessary first to destroy those batteries as well as those in front of the port, but in order to get into the town some embankments must be forced, each having a very strong gate hard with iron. To do this cannon must be landed, or else a mine or the petard be had recourse to, but during this operation the assaults would be exposed to a murderous fire of the batteries, if the inhabitants should be resolved to defend their city. By and the point of attack would be on the sea, and the low hills to the south, between the Fez road and the sea, after effecting a landing on the beach of Old Tangier, and of most of the sea batteries. Once established on these points, the plateau on which the market is situated would be secured. On this plateau there is space enough to form an entrenched camp, to serve as a point of support for the troops acting against the town. The western rampart being only of earth, might readily be demolished. The last attack against Tangier was in 1591, when it was besieged by the Spaniards. The inhabitants abandoned the place with all their effects, and peace was soon after concluded. The English draw their supply of beef, mutton, fruits, and vegetables from Tangier and Tetuan. Tangier is distant seventy leagues from Fez and Mequinez, and 150 from Morocco, these being the three imperial cities at which the Sultan usually resides. From Tangier to Fez, and from Morocco to Tangier, and get an answer, from Tangier to Fez, and from Morocco to Tangier, from forty-five to fifty days.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Bishop of Peterborough has appointed the Rev. M. Varasour, M.A., vicar of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, to be one of his rural deans in Leicestershire, in room of the Rev. M. Robinson, M.A., resigned.

The Rev. John Thompson, formerly minister and missionary at Tanjore, Southern India, has been licensed by the Lord Bishop of Salisbury to the respective curacies of Woodstock and Tisbury, Dorset.

The Rev. H. Raikes, M.A., chancellor of the diocese, and the Rev. C. A. T. Milner, M.A., rector of the Higher Rectory, Malpas, have been appointed Honorary Canon of Chester Cathedral.

The Lord Bishop of London has instituted the Rev. W. W. Hawker, M.A., Rector of Trinity College, Cambridge, to the rectory of Rockland, in the county of Hertford, on the presentation of the college.

The Rev. T. R. Hicks, M.A., Fellow of the same college, to the rectory of Kilsall, in the county of Hertford, on the presentation of the Bishop of Ely.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager has sent a donation of £25 to the subscription fund for the enlargement of St. Paul's Church, Worcester.

By the death of the Rev. James Horsman, late Fellow of Magdalen College, the rectory of Middle, near Shrewsbury, has become vacant, value £1000 per annum, in the gift of the Countess of Bridgewater.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER'S CHARGE.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol commenced his pastoral visitation at Newnham, on Monday, and delivered his charge to a numerous body of the clergy of the diocese. His Lordship, after advertising to the state of the church, commenced on the efforts which the Dissenters and Infidels, and sceptics, and latitudinarians, had made to overthrow the Establishment, but in which effort they had signally failed. He then proceeded as follows:—"Being desirous of avoiding topics of an irritating nature, I might probably have abstained from all allusion to our own internal dissensions, but there has been a danger that, from my silence, a wrong inference may be drawn. Having three years ago deemed it my duty to deliver my condemnation of certain recent publications coming from the reputed leaders of a section in the church, I have now to state that my sentiments have undergone no change whatever since. On the contrary, everything has tended to confirm my opinion that the tendency of those writings is to Romanism. After a short account of the rise of the party, his Lordship proceeded to say:—"As to ceremonies, I cannot do better than recommend you to attentively peruse the preface to the Prayer Book. It was thought with a Christian spirit that it can hardly fail to procure the assent of all candid minds, to whatever party they may incline."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A CHILD KILLED BY LEAP FROG.—On Tuesday Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Prince's Head, Princes-street, Westminster, on the body of Richard Stevens, aged seven and a half years. The mother of deceased said he first complained of illness on Tuesday evening—sick last, and said he had been hurt by a leap frog on his back whilst playing at leap frog. Becoming worse, she took him to the Westminster Hospital on the following day. Mr. Treby, a surgeon, said that when deceased was admitted he was suffering from partial inability to move the lower limbs and numbness of them. Paralysis supervened, and on Friday deceased had convulsions, and died the next morning. A post-mortem examination showed that the cause of death was effusion of blood on the spinal cord, produced by external injury to the back bone. A number of boys who had been playing with deceased were examined, but their evidence was very confused. It was gathered from them that the game they were playing at is what is called "Spanish Flies," a species of leap frog, with the addition of kicking the boy down as the jumper passes over him. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

DEATH FROM AN INJURY TO THE FINGER.—On Tuesday afternoon Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Prince's Head, Princes-street, Westminster, on the body of James Fricker, aged 29, a porter. On Saturday fortnight deceased hurt the little finger of his right hand, by getting it jammed between two ale casks. The injury not getting better, he became an outdoor surgeon's patient of Westminster Hospital. On Tuesday he could not swallow, and next day he was admitted into the hospital as a pharyngeal patient. It was then found that he was labouring under a severe attack of bronchitis, from having got wet through a week previously. He died on Sunday, having been attacked by lock jaw a few hours before his death. Mr. T. Hay, the surgeon, said deceased must have died in a day or two of inflammation of the lungs, even had he not been attacked by lock jaw. Either disease would have proved fatal. Verdict, "Died of disease of the chest, accelerated by lock-jaw."

A GIRL BURNED TO DEATH.—Mr. Baker on Tuesday evening held an inquest at the Islington Infirmary, Islington-street, S.E. Luke's, on the body of Maria Kishit, aged eight years, daughter of the landlady of the above house. It appeared that early on Friday morning deceased went away from the nursery with a younger brother, and going into a room in which there was a fire, she began melting lead in a tobacco pipe. Whilst so engaged her bedgown came in contact with the fire, and she was speedily wrapped in flames. Her cries brought her father to her assistance, and though he promptly extinguished the fire, and had immediate medical aid, the burns were so extensive that the deceased died on the following day. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

PRESUMPTIONS BY DECEASED.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest at the Carpenter's Arms, Brompton, on the body of Robert Houghton Metcalf, aged four months, the infant son of a cab proprietor. From the evidence of the first witness it appeared that the deceased was suddenly attacked with illness on Saturday week, when its mother applied to a druggist, who ordered a mixture for the child. It appeared to have quite recovered, until last Wednesday, when it was again attacked, and died in convulsions at one o'clock the same day. Mr. Wakley: Did the druggist prescribe for the child without seeing it?—Witness: Yes, sir. Mr. Wakley commented upon the conduct of the druggist for prescribing for the child without seeing it, and charged generally upon the laxity of the law relating to medical practice. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural Death."

ROBBERY OF £730 IN BANK NOTES.—On Saturday night at No. 10, Edmond's-place, Abchurch-lane, a gentleman residing at No. 10, Edmond's-place, Abchurch-lane, was returning home, between London bridge and Chancery, his pocket was picked of a black leather pocket-book, containing Bank of England notes for £720, £50, and £3, to the amount of £730.

EXTRAORDINARY ACCIDENT.—Mr. Wakley, M.P., on Wednesday, held an inquest at the Albion, King's-cross, on the body of Abraham Hawes Goulding, aged 25, a workman employed at the Imperial Gas-works, in the vicinity. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased was what is termed a pattern-maker, or maker of pupes for the Company. On Monday last he was in the retort-house of the factory, with four other workmen, employed in insulating a pipe in a lathe ten feet long. He had a large iron gauge in his hand at the time, when suddenly the pipe flew, and some portion of it striking the deceased, knocked him down, and in his descent the unfortunate deceased fell with his left breast on the edge of the gauge, which passed through his left breast and penetrated his heart to the depth of several inches. He was heard to exclaim—"Oh, I am bleeding, I am bleeding," but before any of his companions could get near him he had ceased to exist. The deceased had fasted the pipe in the lathe himself, and the whole arrangements respecting it were under his immediate control. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

SUICIDE FROM FALSE PRIDE.—Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest on Wednesday at the Crown, Maiden-lane, on the late Mr. Charles Edwards, aged 53, of 7, Clarendon-place, Maiden-lane, a wealthy retired carriage builder. From the evidence, it appeared that he and another had been executors to some property, and that a quarrel having taken place between him and his co-executor, the latter filed a bill and obtained an injunction against his recovering the property, which he had his pride and pressed upon his mind, that he became extremely melancholy. Two days after the obtaining the injunction, he dressed himself and went out shortly after breakfast, as if to take a walk, but he was found in two hours afterwards, with his throat cut in his own house, and the razor with which he committed the rash deed lying close by. All the witnesses were of opinion that he committed the rash deed in consequence of the Chancery suit having been decided against him. Verdict, "Insanity."

ACCIDENT TO MR. KEVIN LANDREY.—On Sunday afternoon this distinguished artist, whilst riding up Portchester-terrace, was thrown with great violence from his horse, in consequence of the animal suddenly stumbling. He fell on his head, which was severely cut and bruised. He is still suffering from the effects of the accident, but we are happy to hear that no serious consequences are apprehended from it.

MELANCHOLY SUDDEN DEATH OF A CLEVERMAN.—On Sunday morning last during divine service at Emanuel Church, Canterbury, and whilst earnestly joining with the congregation in singing the last verse of the 131st Psalm, the Rev. J. T. P. Wyeke, M.A., curate of Cranford, Beds, was laid with a fit of apoplexy. He was immediately taken to the porch of the church, and there lay, and subsequently conveyed to the residence of his father, where soon afterwards he expired in the 37th year of his age. The only words he uttered were "Wyeke Grove hill," sufficient affliction." It is remarkable that this gentleman married only two years since, and his lady (aged 25) died on the 14th inst. Their only child died about three months since.

An Englishman named Snow, accompanied by four guides, effected the passage of the Col de Gaset on the 6th. He left Montmartre at two in the morning, and, after having crossed the Mer de Glace, the Glacier du Tacul (which was found the most difficult part of the undertaking), and the Grand, arrived at Courmayeur at six in the evening.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S DESTRUCTIVE AGENT.

The merits of the invention of Captain Warner are still contested, and various reports have been circulated on the subject, but, in fact, nothing positive is known about it. Captain Warner has distinctly denied the statement that he had offered his invention to a foreign Government. With a view to dispose of the other rumors which prevail, the patent captain has made the following offer to the Government. We venture to assume that it is a fact and straightforward proposition:—"If the Government will anchor a line of battle ship at the back of the Goodwin Sand, out of the ship track, so that no harm may happen to passing vessels, I will from on board another ship destroy her at a distance of five miles. I am willing to take on board the vessel in which I operate, General Sir George Murray, Captain Viscount Innes, R.N., Captain Dickinson, R.N., and Captain Henderson, R.N., who shall have every opportunity of inspecting my mode of operation, and satisfying themselves that on this occasion I use a juster. The kind liberality of my friends enables me to exhibit this experiment at such a short notice to the Government for a sailing towards it. If I fail, I am to receive nothing but indulgence which I have received enough to satisfy any reasonable man already. But, previously, I require, a guarantee from her Majesty's Government for its purchase of my secret for £250,000. In the event of my destroying the ship, and satisfying the four above-named officers of the feasibility and practicability of my plan. Lastly, I invite Mr. Howard Douglas, Sir Isaac Martin, Sir George Cockburn, Colonel Chalmers, R.A., and Commander Collin, R.N., to attend in another vessel and watch proceedings."

A RABBINICAL TRADITION.

There is a rabbinical tradition related by Fabricius that, when Noah planted the vine, Satan attended, and sacrificed a sheep, a lion, an ape, and a sow. These animals were to symbolize the gradations of evil. When a man begins to drink, he is a mark and ignorant as the lion, then becomes belated as the lion, his courage is soon transformed into the fool's shrews in the ape, and at last he wallows in the mire like the sow.—Warton's Guide to Knowledge.

POLITICAL CONTROVERSY IN AMERICA.

One of the American papers observes of Mr. Wentworth, the member of Congress for the district of Illinois, who, it appears, is of "pretty considerable" stature, that "he is so tall that when he addresses the people, instead of mounting a stump, as is usual in the west, they have to dig a hole for him to stand in." Another paper, which gives the whole ticket against Mr. Wentworth, politely observes, "That they dig a hole for him, not because he is tall, but because he never feels at home except when he is up to his chin in dirt."

INFLUENCE OF WEALTH AND POVERTY ON MORTALITY.

The time-honored opinion, that poverty is conducive to longevity—that the rich are less favoured with the blessing of health than the poor—finds no confirmation in statistical investigations. That the hardy and contented poor man is exempt from the diseases of the wealthy and luxurious, is but a poetic fiction. Irrefragable evidence of this truth is contained in every document by which the rate of mortality among large numbers can be ascertained. Hence, taking the whole population of a country, wealth may be assumed as a true measure of happiness, and consequently of health; and indigence as the measure of unhappiness, and consequently of disease.—New York Journal of Medicine.

ADULTERATION OF OLIVE OIL WITH LARD.

The American papers notice some experiments made there, with a view to detect the frauds practised by the adulteration of olive oil with lard. A professor made a chemical analysis of lard and olive oil, for the purpose of ascertaining the results of their admixture. The specific gravity of both oils was about the same, but to discover the adulterations he dissolved six parts of mercury in seven and a half parts of nitric acid, and mixed two parts of the solution with ninety-six parts of the oil, and agitated the mixture every twenty minutes. The pure oil in seven hours assumed the form of a thick magma, and in twenty-four hours became quite hard. The admixture of olive and lard oils by this combination with nitric acid of mercury becomes thick, but not solid with the pure oil. The mixture of animal and vegetable oils by this test separates in five hours, and the maximum of the vegetable oil swims on the surface, and may be decanted off. Pure olive oil is without any smell, but the adulterated article has a strong animal odour, and spoils a good salad at any time.

ADDISON'S CAT.

When Pope brought Addison the prelude to "Cato," which is properly acknowledged to the play, there were these words, "Brimons arise" be worth like this appeared," meaning nothing more than Britons! exert and exert yourselves to the approbation of public virtue. Addison was frightened, but he should be thought a promoter of instruction, and the line was altered to "Brimons, attend!" &c.—Johnson's Lives.

INGENUOUS EXCUSES OF JURORS.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, several odd excuses were set up by different parties to avoid serving on the Petty Jury. One of the party summoned and he had lost his right arm, and therefore he could not take the book in his right hand to be sworn. The Recorder said, that under such circumstances, the left hand would do just as well, and he was directed, amid much laughter, to go into the jury-box. Another person assured the Court that he was very deaf, and that it was impossible for him to hear the witnesses. Alderman Gibbs, in a very low tone of voice, asked the individual how long he had been deaf. He immediately replied, "Several years." This caused a roar of laughter. The Recorder then said that his hearing did not appear to be so bad as he would represent. The person said, he could not hear distinctly, but he guessed at what the alderman had said. The Recorder, after putting some other questions, and receiving prompt answers, repeated that the party appeared to hear very well; but if he declared, as an honest man, that he was incapable of performing the duty properly, the Court must excuse him. The person having done so, he was excused.

A NEW YORK GIANT.

A New York paper says, "They are growing a giant at Coseskie, in this state, who promises to outstep all competition in this country or Europe. His name is Nathan Lampanon, and he is sixteen years old, weighing 125 pounds, stands at this time seven feet one inch in height, and growing 'like mad.' He is described by Dr. Smith, as 'a great tall awkward good-natured sixteen-year-old boy.' He is believed already to have the longest legs on the continent, and has actually grown nine inches in the last year. He is an ambitious youth, and has great desire to outgrow all creation—an aspiration quite likely to be reached, for he has good health and good habits. The doctor thinks he will reach at least another foot, and, on the whole, we have a very good prospect of raising an 'empire' giant."

A FEMALE ORANG-OUTANG.

The Soleil Gazette mentions the arrival at that port of a female orang-outang, coming in a ship from Africa. In the course of the voyage she had greatly amused the sailors by her tricks. On one occasion, having seen one of the crew employed in painting, she watched her opportunity and ran aloft with the paint pot and brushes, and, deeming it to display her powers on canvas, she dashed upon one of the sails a series of figures, such as, it may be said, and we never are used by any human artist. She is fond of the unwholesome amusement of smoking cigars, and she pulls away at the weed greedily to the delight of her Yankee visitors.

THE PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Lord Mahon gives the following description of the privileges of the House of Commons in former times:—"During the reign of George the Second the privileges of the House of Commons flourished in the rank of luxuries. On one occasion it was voted a breach of privilege to have 'killed a great number of rabbits' from the warren of Lord Malway, a member. Another time, the Earl of Mordaunt was concerned with a like august protection. The same never-failing shield of privilege was thrown before the face of Mr. Burgh, the Earl of Mordaunt, and the Earl of Mordaunt. The persons of one member's porter and of another member's footman were held to be as sacred and inviolable as the persons of the members themselves. It would be neither a brief nor yet a pleasing task to narrate all the cases of the kind which in that reign the journals of the House of Commons display. So long as men in authority are enabled to go beyond the law, on the plea of their own dignity and power, the only limit to their encroachments will be that of the public endurance."

THE NEW COMET.

A scientific individual who has been watching the comet, states that he had a sight of it on Sunday last, when it appeared near the star  $\epsilon$  in the right arm of Perseus. It was distinctly visible to the naked eye, and may be easily distinguished from a fixed star by its cloudy and rather elongated appearance. At that time it was in the N.E., nearly half-way between the horizon and the zenith. As its position is among the constellation stars, it will be visible during the whole of the night. At 9 P.M. it may be seen about N.E. by N., at an elevation of 30 degrees (the zenith being 50° above the horizon). At midnight it will be in the N.E. by E. at an altitude of 50 degrees, and at midnight it will appear nearly in the zenith.

IMMENSE STRAWBERRY.

The Calcutta Mercury states that a strawberry was pulled on Saturday week from the garden of Mr. David Thomson, Bread-stone Cottage, Ceres, measuring nearly eight inches in circumference. Several others, measuring six and seven inches, have also been raised on the same ground.

house, tied on a cart-horse; and accompanied by a fife and a fiddle, and a host of children, who greet the oblations to the Saint with shrill huzzas. The good old folks haste into the street to shake hands with the founder of their town; and the proprietors of the effigy (sometimes a "wick Wilfray," as the children style him), retire at dusk to divide the proceeds, and wind up with a "jollification."

Then the feast commences in earnest. The cathedral bells ring out merrily on the Sunday morning following; the Mayor and Corporation proceed in gowned solemnity to service at the minster; the city is crowded with strangers, and those natives, from a distance, who come to visit friends and relatives; there is a gathering in the sylvan glades of Studley Park; and the ivy-grown, venerable walls of the "mighty carcass" of the abbey of fountains echoes with the music of glad voices, and smiles blandly in the glorious sunshine on the merry pilgrims gathered around.

The races date as far back as 1713, for, on the 2nd of February in that year, an order was issued by the Mayor and Corporation of Ripon to level the High Common, "fitting for a horse course." The support they received from the Corporation was considerable; aided by the munificent donations of John Aislaby, Esq., of Studley Royal, Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1718-20. In those days, the horses in one of the most important races were ridden by women; and on such occasions Mrs. Aislaby contributed the plate, or the money for the prize. In 1826, these ancient races were put a stop to by the enclosure of the High Common; but, in 1836, Mr. Haygarth, a publican, got up some races on a small scale, in his own fields, which roused the old sporting spirit of the town, and induced several respectable individuals to form themselves into a committee, when the present ground—a pleasant spot on the north banks of the Ure, and a good mile from the city—was selected, and here they have been carried on ever since.

The races came off on Monday and Tuesday, with great spirit. On Monday the Two-year-old Stake of 10 sovs. each, with 20 sovs. added, was won by half a length, by Mr. Shepherd's Alaric; the Selling Stake of 5 sovs. each, with 15 sovs. added, was won easily, by a length, by Mr. T. Walker's Master Thomas; the £50 given by the Town Members, was won, first heat by half a neck, and third by a length, by Mr. J. Osborne's Boniface; and second heat, by a length, by Mr. Banks's Strathmore. On Tuesday, the Great St. Wilfrid Handicap was won easily by Mr. Millbank's Robinson; and the Corporation £50, by Mr. J. Osborne's Boniface.

CHARLES WATERTON, ESQ.

A second volume of "Essays on Natural History," from the pen of this true "field naturalist," has been issued from the press, and presents a favourable opportunity for engraving a "portraiture" of the humane author, from a sketch by a correspondent.

This celebrated naturalist was born at Walton-hall, near Wakefield, in the county of York, about sixty-two years ago. On his father's side he is descended in a direct line (through his grandmother) from Sir Thomas More. On his mother's side he is akin to the Bedingfelds of Orkney, to the Charltons of Hasle-side, and to the Swinburnes of Chapperton.

The Watertons emigrated into Yorkshire, some centuries ago, from their family seat, bearing their own name, in the island of Axholme, in Lincolnshire. The Watertons fought at Cressy and Agincourt, and at Marston Moor. They were preferred, in the Catholic times, to places of great honour and trust; but since the Reformation they have experienced opposite fortune.

Walton-hall was gallantly defended against Oliver Cromwell's troops. It stands on an island in a lake, and was, at that time, provided with a draw bridge, the remains of which are standing, mantled with ivy, to this day. The land rises gently from the water on all sides, and is crowned with fine timber; the whole park being enclosed by a formidable stone wall. But, to return to the subject of our sketch.

Charles Waterton received his education at Stonyhurst, the celebrated college of the Jesuits, in Lancashire, where he remained until nearly twenty years of age. Here he became an elegant Latin scholar, and renounced for ever the use of wine and spirituous liquors. His love of natural history often led him into playing truant, but eventually his instructors gave him further liberty to pursue his favourite study. Soon after leaving Stonyhurst, the young squire made a tour into Spain. Here he met with many strange adventures—fever, earthquakes, &c., and was seized with sickness on his return home.

In 1804 he went out to superintend his uncle's estates in Demerara. In 1812, his father and uncle being dead, he delivered up his trust, and all subsequent visits which he paid to South America were undertaken with no other object in view than the pursuit of natural history. "The Wanderings" bear testimony to the wonderful adventures of Mr. Waterton during these visits. The vivacity with which these narratives abound, render them the most charming productions of the kind in the English language. In 1819 Mr. Waterton married a Miss Edmonstone, but their felicity was of short duration; she died within a year, leaving him a son. He has since made frequent journeys to Belgium and Italy. His "Essays on Natural History" have been collected from "London's most amusing autobiography." This work is as racy as "The Wanderings," and full of interesting and acute observation. We cannot resist closing this brief sketch by quoting Mr. Waterton's portrait of himself—

"I stand," says he, "six feet high, all but half an inch. On looking at myself in the glass, I can see at once that my face is anything but comely; continued exposure to the sun, and to the rays of the tropics, has furrowed it in places, and given it a tint which neither Rowland's Kaydor nor all the cosmetics on Belinda's toilette, would ever be able to remove. My hair, which I wear very short, was once of a shade between brown and black; it has now the appearance as if it had passed the night exposed to a November hoar frost. I cannot boast of any great strength of arm, but my legs—probably by much walking, and by frequently ascending trees—have acquired vast muscular power; so that, on taking a view of me from top to toe, you would say that the upper part of Titmouse has been placed on the lower part of Ajax; or, to speak zoologically, were I exhibited for show at a horse fair, some learned jockey would exclaim, 'he is half Rosinante, half Nucuphalus.'"

In closing this brief sketch of Mr. Waterton, we must not omit to mention that he is the first bird-stuffer in the world, and one of the most kind-hearted of landlords, and a zealous and conscientious Catholic. A highly recommandatory feature of his writings is that they uniformly enjoin tender treatment of animals, and a generous sympathy with their persecutions.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

SOUTH WINFIELD MANOR-HOUSE, DERBYSHIRE.

Few counties possess nobler, or more numerous specimens of the old baronial mansion than Derbyshire. In what other nook or corner of old England shall we find such a genuine relic of the elden time as Haddon? or where revive such vivid remembrances of England's golden age, the palmy days of "good Queen Bess," as at Hardwick; these two alone would render Derbyshire attractive enough to the artist or the antiquary, but there are yet others which are scarcely less interesting, and comparatively unknown. Of these, Winfield Manor-house has manifold claims upon the attention of every lover of the picturesque. This once princely pile is situated in a village on the line of the North Midland railway, which renders it easily accessible to the tourist; it was built in the reign of Henry VI., by the Lord Treasurer Cromwell, founder of Tattershall, and lord of many a noble house besides, and who, as if to carry to all posterity the fame of his wealth and liberality, adopted as his badge the open purse, which may yet be seen carved in stone over his once hospitable gates.

The mansion is beautifully situated on a commanding eminence, rising from deep valleys, again surrounded on every side with richly-wooded hills; its tall grey towers and battlemented turrets, mantled with ivy, rising proudly above the noble oaks and walnuts in which it is embosomed. The mansion is quite dismantled, and much of it destroyed; but the remains, which are still very extensive, bespeak it to have been very similar in plan to Haddon Hall, but much larger. It consists of long ranges of buildings, surrounding two large court-yards, with numerous towers and turrets, the loftiest of which rises eighty or ninety feet from the ground; tall chimney shafts, richly tracery windows, and graceful arches, with the beautifully-wrought masonry, giving to it a rich elaborate effect which we do not find in the more severe and simple Haddon. There are several fine circular staircases in some of the towers; but the finest feature is the magnificent crypt, which has suffered but little from the vicissitudes of time and violence: it is upwards of ninety feet long, by about thirty-five wide, beautifully grained with clean-hewn ashlar, having rich fan-tracery bosses at the intersections of the moulded ribs, which spring from two rows of octagonal columns. But, it is not alone the intrinsic beauty or picturesque of the structure that renders Winfield so peculiarly interesting; there are historical recollections attached to it, which give it a still greater charm; here it was that Mary Queen of Scots was, for some time, imprisoned in the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom the estate had passed from the Cromwell family, and here a daring attempt was made by some of her devoted adherents to set her at liberty. In after time, Winfield stood as one of the bulwarks of loyalty in the great rebellion, having undergone two sieges, palpable marks of which are yet visible on every side; it was at first occupied by the Parliament's forces, but was taken after a siege of four days, by the royalists, who put a strong garrison into the place; they were, in turn, soon besieged by the republican forces, under Sir John Gell, of Hopton, who, in vain, attempted to reduce the place, until the main army, commanded by the Earl of Manchester, with a train of heavy battering cannon, came to his assistance, when, after a severe bombardment, the place was taken by storm; though not without a desperate resistance on the part of the besieged, who, aided by the natural strength of the place, had held out against a greatly superior force, for nearly four months. The governor, Captain Dalby, was killed in the assault; and it is traditionally said that he was shot by a common soldier through a loophole in the entrance gateway, which is still shown.

The whole of one side of the building is covered with the marks of cannon shot, which have, in many instances, penetrated to the depth of two or three feet in the outer ashlar casing, leaving a circular cavity where the ball has lodged in the interior rubble: the people who reside at an adjacent farm-house also show several cannon-balls, which have from time to time been dug up.

In short, there is at Winfield abundant material to repay either the artist, the antiquary, or the simple lover of the olden time, for a visit to South Winfield.

MANCHESTER REGATTA—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. HAYES.

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD REGATTA.
The annual meeting of the Manchester and Salford Regatta Club (being the third regatta held on the river Irwell, near this town) took place on Monday and Tuesday, the 19th and 20th of August, under distinguished patronage, including Lords Skelmersdale and de Tabley, and Lord Francis Egerton, M.P.; Sir Benjamin Heywood, William Entwistle, Esq., M.P., the Mayor of Manchester, and a number of gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood. The president of the club this year is James Heywood, Esq., F.R.S.; the stewards, Messrs. Gale and Rymer; and the appointed judge, Elias Chadwick, Esq., of Swinton Hall, in whose absence, we believe, Mr. Chew acted as adjudicator.

N. KYNASTON, ESQ.

This meeting excited great interest, and there was a numerous collection of booths for refreshments in the neighbourhood of the Grand Stand, and in other fields nearer the town. On Monday the morning was delightfully fine, and the concourse of people on both sides of the river was very large. Towards noon, however, the clouds lowered, and a small drizzling rain fell, with but few intervals, during the remainder of the day. The fine military band of the 5th Dragoon Guards attended, by permission of the Hon. Colonel J. Yorke Scarlett, and performed a variety of music in the first style of excellence.

The sports of this day consisted of four races—the Stanhill Hall Stakes, for four-oar pleasure-boats, value £10, won by Mr. Jones's Fearless; the Ordsall Stakes, for two-oar boats, won by Mr. Beardsall's Mystery; and the Swinton Hall Cup, value £10, won by Mr. Walker's Sons of the Dee, a Chester boat, by half a length—the Britannia, a Manchester boat, with a young crew, struggled manfully for the Cup, and the honour of the town. The Irwell Stakes of £12, won by Mystery—Forester second.

On Tuesday the weather was exceedingly fine, and the company very fashionable. The races were well contested. The Plate, value £20, was won by a Chester boat, the "Echo." The sports terminated, at a late hour, with a very brilliant display of fireworks. The meeting this year has given great satisfaction; and though the principal prizes have been carried off by boats from Chester, &c., it is no discredit to the members of the club, who have had to strive against the picked men of Chester and Warrington.

GRAND CRICKET MATCH AT BRIGHTON.

SUSSEX V. THE MARYLEBONE CLUB AND GROUND, WITH PILCH AND MARTINGELL.

The return match between these two elevens (Pilch and Martingell having been substituted for Wenman, in consequence of the growing strength of the Sussex players,) commenced on Monday in Box's Ground, in the presence of upwards of 2000 spectators. Fortunately, the weather was fine, not a drop of rain falling during the match. Sussex went in first with Dean and G. Picknell, Hillyer and Martingell bowling. Dean made a score of 21, when his wicket was lowered by Hillyer. Bushby then went in. G. Picknell was bowled by Hillyer, after scoring 13 runs. Box then came, and Bushby soon after lost his wicket.

After dinner, Hawkins went to the wicket, and was bowled out by Hillyer at the second ball. Mr. Taylor succeeded him, and was bowled by Hayley. Hammond was next, and in the first over he was bowled by Hillyer. Mr. Napper succeeded him, and struck the second ball to the wall for 4; but his stumps were lowered by Hayley at the next ball. Sopp next went to the wicket, and with Box, succeeded in adding materially to the score. At length, Sopp struck the ball in the air, when Sewall caught him out very cleverly. H. Picknell then took the bat, but at the second ball from Hayley, his stumps were scattered. Hodson, the last of the Sussex, then went in, and got 4 first stroke. Dorrington, after playing three-quarters of an hour, was stumped by Box. A few more runs were then got between them, when Hodson was caught by Sewall.—Box carrying out his bat, after scoring in a splendid manner no less than 60 runs.

At twenty-five minutes to six, the Marylebone Club commenced their first innings by placing Martingell and Dorrington at the wickets; Dean and Mr. Taylor bowlers. Sewall was next, and got four and three in quick succession, Martingell following suit. After some very fine play, Sewall struck a ball towards Dean, and he was neatly caught out, retiring with a score of 41. Hillyer filled the vacant place, but the stumps were directly drawn for the day.

The game was resumed on Tuesday morning at 10 minutes past 10, with Martingell and Hillyer at the wickets; the former of whom was caught by Hawkins, without adding to the score. Pilch then went to the wicket, and was bowled by G. Picknell for 13 runs. Mr. Kynaston had scored only 4, when Dean lowered his wicket. Mr. Hartopp came next, but was immediately run out. Mr. Hayley followed, but was bowled by G. Picknell without scoring, and Good was served in the same manner. Mr. Dewing, who succeeded him, began to score very fast, and with Hillyer ran it up to 150, when Mr. Dewing was bowled by Hodson. Lord

Glamis was the last to go to the wicket. Hillyer after making 25 by some fine play, was caught at the point by Dean, Lord Glamis carrying out his bat. The innings amounted to 155, being 18 less than their opponents. It being now nearly two o'clock, the players went to dinner, after which Sussex commenced their second innings by placing the two Picknells at the wickets. Roberts' wicket was soon lowered by Hillyer; and Dean, who succeeded him, was caught (by Dorrington, the wicket-keeper, without

PRINCE ALBERT'S APIARY.—SHOLL'S NEW BEE-HIVE.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, as we stated in No. 117 of our journal, has lately taken much interest in the management of bees; and Mr. Sholl has had the honour of presenting to the Prince two of his newly-constructed hives, for the apiary just completed on the royal farm near Windsor. We are happy to record his Royal Highness's gracious acceptance of the present; since it will have the effect of drawing attention to what appears to us to be a very humane and ingenious improvement; for this new bee-hive, by its improved arrangement, is calculated materially to contribute to the healthful economy of bees, to cause them to produce a larger quantity of honey than hitherto, as well as to supersede the barbarous practice of killing these wonderful creatures to obtain the produce of their industry.

The details of this interesting ruro-economical invention have been communicated by Mr. Sholl to the Magazine of Science, No. 265, to which popular work we are indebted for the annexed illustrations and descriptive details.

Mr. Sholl's cottage-hive may be thus described:—The stand is of wood, consisting of five pieces, which are so arranged that they may be taken to pieces readily, if required, and put away in the hive, if necessary to send it to a distance. A common American four-barrel forms the outworks of the hive. The pavilion is formed of wood, and may be either square or circular, and is placed at the bottom of the barrel. It is furnished with a wire-gauze door, fixed in the bottom, which answers the purpose of a ventilator: two cross bars are fixed at the top of the pavilion, to which the inhabitants attach the comb. The entrance to the pavilion is circular, and towards the top a metal tube is carried through the wall of the house or barrel, and is furnished with a sliding shield, also of metal, to keep them in when necessary. This slide is perforated so as to assist the ventilation. The pavilion, which can be removed from the house or barrel at pleasure, stands upon four legs, for the purpose of fully ventilating the space between the outer walls of the house, or barrel, and the pavilion; towards the bottom of the barrel is another aperture, furnished with wire-gauze, for the sake of ventilation. On the top of the pavilion is a folding partition by which it is covered: this partition contains six, or any greater number of apertures that may be required, to each of which is a plug of wood, with a tin cover: each plug is attached to a string, which is secured to the side of the barrel, so that when the plugs are removed from the apertures they may not be lost. The use of these apertures is to admit the bees when necessary from the pavilion into the surplus cases above. A small window is fixed in the partition, to ascertain the state of the bees at any time. These cases, six or more in number, are also constructed of wood, nearly fitting the sides of the barrel or house: each case is of a segmental form, and open at bottom to admit the bees, and further, is lighted by a small window in the top. When the bees have filled the pavilion with honey as far as possible, admission is afforded to them to one or more of the surplus cases, or additional apartments, in which they deposit new comb. The pavilion remains undisturbed so far as removing honey is concerned, the additional apartments being supplied for that purpose. When a case is ascertained to be filled with honey, it is removed to a distance from the barrel, carefully turned on one side, and the bees returning to the pavilion, the apartment may be cleared of the honey accumulated, and another case may be immediately inserted in its place. It is readily ascertained which surplus apartment is occupied by the bees, as the admission plug from the pavilion will be found placed on the top of it. The cover or roof of the bee-house or barrel is hung with common hinges, and secured either by a common lock or padlock.

THE WELSH HARP.

[We have received the following communication from a correspondent, whose authority on the subject is beyond all doubt. It will be found interesting to all lovers of national music.]

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Sir,—I was much pleased with the sketch which appeared lately in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the venerable Richard Roberts, the blind minstrel of Carnarvon, who, besides being the best harper in the principality, is a very well informed man. The following anecdote of him, will, I trust, prove interesting to your readers. At an Eisteddfod, or congress of bards and minstrels, held at Denbigh, in North Wales, in 1828, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex was present, when the contest took place for the golden harp, which was awarded to Roberts, who, on being invested with the badge of honour by his Royal Highness, delivered himself in the following simple, but poetical manner:—"I have never had the honour of performing before any of the Royal Family before—I never saw the blessed sun—but I never regretted the loss of sight so much as I do at this moment, that I might behold the hand which confers on me such honour. God bless your Royal Highness." "And God bless you," responded the Duke most fervently. The Welsh Harp has three rows of strings; the outer rows are tuned in unison, and the middle one contains the semitones; so, when an accidental flat or sharp occurs, the performer inserts his finger between two of the outer strings, and touches it. For instance, supposing the key to be G with one sharp; should C sharp be required, it will be found between C natural and D; and so on with any casual notes. The harp is always tuned in the key in which the composition is written.

Pennillion Singing (epigrammatic stanzas), with the Welsh harp, is extremely curious, and is by no means so easily accomplished as may be imagined. The singer is obliged to follow the harper, who may change the air, or perform variations of it, while the vocalist must keep time, and end precisely with the strain. The singer does not commence with the tune, but he takes it up at the second or third bar, as may best suit the metre of the pennillion (stanza) he intends to sing; and this is constantly done by the presentists in North Wales, who are totally unacquainted with music! In the year 1821 his Majesty George IV. signified to the late Sir W. W. Wynne that he would honour Wynnystay with a visit, in his way to Ireland. The late lamented Mrs. Hemans wrote the following stanza, at the request of Mr. Parry, to be sung after the manner of the Pennillion, with the harp.

Awake! ye gifted sons of song,
Your Druid haunts among!
O'er your hills are banners streaming,
Arms amid your woods are gleaming,
Ye, by glen and torrent dreaming,
To the triumph throng!
Awake! though arms be gleaming bright,
'Tis not the hour of fight—
But each mountain wind is swelling,
Where the echoes have their dwelling,
With a voice of music telling
Cambria's proud delight!
It is an hour for harps to ring
With soul in every string!
And for joyous crowds descending
All our ancient heights, and blending
Shouts, the Alpine stillness ringing,
As they greet their king!

THE ACT FOR FACILITATING ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN DEBTORS AND CREDITORS.—This act will come into operation on the 1st of September next. It contains sixteen sections, which, with rules, &c., are to be worked out by the Court of Bankruptcy, in addition to the other branches of jurisdiction on the law of debt and creditor. The object of this act is to enable non-traders to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy to petition, making a full disclosure of their affairs, with a proposal to pay their creditors, on which a protection from arrest can be obtained. It does not appear that there need be any public examination if the conduct of the applicant should be satisfactory, and at the last meeting a "certificate" is to be given, as in bankruptcy, but not to operate against the debts set forth by the petitioner, whose application cannot, however, be entertained unless one-third in number and value of his creditors express their concurrence. The act is to be construed beneficially for creditors.

BALLOON ASCENT ON MONDAY LAST.

On Monday evening, Mr. Hampton ascended in his splendid new balloon, from the gardens of the White Conduit Tavern, on the occasion of a fête for the benefit of the Hope Benevolent Institution. Many years have elapsed since the ascent of a balloon from these gardens; the attraction was, accordingly, very powerful. Within the grounds there were present upwards of 4000 spectators, and the concourse of persons in the neighbourhood was immense. The balloon was filled at the Imperial Gasworks, Battle-bridge, and placed on a car, to which it was secured by ropes, it was conveyed to the gardens, by six o'clock on Monday morning; an extra supply of gas being provided to keep up the loss by condensation.

All things being prepared, at half-past six in the evening, Mr. Hampton, accompanied by Mr. Wells (the gentleman who was to have ascended with him from Birmingham last month), stepped into the car, and the signal being given, the balloon rose in majestic style. The weather was somewhat gusty, and the aeronauts at no period rose above half a mile; and they descended shortly before seven o'clock, in a meadow belonging to Mr. T. Rust, of East Ham Hall, about eight miles eastward of White Conduit House. Owing to the confined state of the gardens, there were certain difficulties in the ascent, in mastering which, Mr. Richardson, the engineer of the Gasworks, and Mr. House, the landlord of the tavern, were very efficient. To prove the buoyancy of the new balloon, it may be stated that the aeronauts took with them four out of ballast, and rose with ease; whereas, at Birmingham, on the 22nd ult., so inferior was the quality and supply of the gas, that Mr. Hampton was compelled to ascend per se.

This new balloon, in its construction, comprises certain improvements, which we shall proceed to detail to the reader. The huge machine is next in size to Green's celebrated "Nassau," is composed of forty-one gores of the best silk, which is varnished to make it gas-tight; each gore is sixty-seven long and one yard wide at its full breadth; consequently, the circumference is 123 feet, and the diameter forty-one feet; and the entire quantity of silk is 600 square yards.

The valve, in the crown of the balloon, Mr. Hampton states to be entirely on a new principle, which will be of great importance in the management of the balloon, inasmuch as it will enable the aeronaut to let out the gas gradually; and it will also permit its escape in such a vast quantity as to reduce the bulk of the balloon in a few seconds, and thereby render it a manageable machine. The kind of valve commonly used in balloons is objectionable for two reasons—1. the impossibility of precisely ascertaining how much gas may pass when the valve-line is pulled; 2. the constant attention required for the regulation of the valve, when the aeronaut's exertions are demanded elsewhere. Now, in this new valve each of the above difficulties is provided for.

The old valve consists of a hoop, fitted with a pair of shutters, which open in the middle by means of the valve-line attached to each; and, when closed, are kept gas-tight by means of spiral springs. In using a single line, however, it is necessary to open both shutters at once; and the dimensions of the valve being four and a half feet in circumference, the least opening allows a great deal of gas to escape. And as the loss of a small quantity is sufficient to enable the aeronaut to descend, the shutter principle is by no means economical. A constant strain on the valve-line is also indispensable to keep the valve open; and as this is not always possible when the aeronaut is passing over the earth's surface, the difficulty becomes of great importance.

The interior of the new valve is shown in the annexed wood-cut:—1. a hoop, four and a half feet circumference, six inches deep; 2. spiral springs, fixed internally; 3. circular pieces of wood to which they are affixed; 4. contrivance to supersede the shutters, which may be called a drum-head, which fits the inside of the hoop exactly, and works on two brass pins, which are incased in two concave pieces of brass in the hoop, which make the drum work freely and accurately; 5. two lines—that on the right hand, when pulled, opens the drum-head, whilst that on the left shuts it. This is likewise regulated by the spiral spring, but the line is an additional safeguard. Two rings pass over the straight part of the springs, which slip off when the drum-head is opened beyond a certain distance; and when this is effected, the drum-head remains open, and allows the gas to pass without the least obstruction. This final measure is only adopted when the balloon is on the earth. Attention to the valve then becomes unnecessary, and the aeronaut is, consequently, at liberty to consult his own personal convenience. The line to the left as precisely regulates the pulling of the line to the right, that the drum-head can be opened only the eighth of an inch, if advisable; consequently, the least portion of gas may be parted with, or the balloon be exhausted speedily by opening the drum-head to its full extent. The exterior of the valve is plain, and, therefore, is not exposed to friction or violence.

The car diff. is from that attached to other balloons, in being circular instead of oblong, an improvement which must be manifest to every mind of a mechanical turn. It is not only in character with the shape of the balloon, but is better adapted than any other form for coming in contact with obstacles, whether they be hedges, trees, houses, &c. The car also gets bigger than usual towards the bottom, and is made so as, in every respect, to lessen the violence of a collision.

The rope for the grapnel has been manufactured of cocoa-nut fibre, by Whitey and Co.; it is stronger, lighter, and more elastic than common rope—three grand points as regards its use for balloons. A minor contrivance of Mr. Hampton's may be mentioned here; it is a simple substitute for knots, by the use of a piece of wood called a toggle.

Mr. Hampton, we understand, will make another ascent in his new balloon, on Wednesday next, at Cheltenham, where he has already distinguished himself by an intrepid parachute descent.

ROYAL VISITS.

HE almost eastern seclusion with which the immediate predecessors of her Majesty surrounded themselves was a peculiarity that distinguished them from nearly all the Monarchs of Europe; but there were circumstances which accounted for this retirement. We need not do more than allude to the blindness and mental alienation of the latter years of George III.; George IV. was exclusive by disposition, and in addition never recovered that confidence in the good humour of his subjects which he lost in the rather violent expressions of their disapprobation with which they assailed him when he appeared in public during and after the unhappy affair of the Queen. His dislike of the public gaze increased with years, and during the latter part of his life his walks and rides were as carefully guarded from observation as if he had been a Sultan. William IV., more hearty, frank, and popular, was too far advanced in life to go through more than the routine of royalty; besides, he had been a sailor in his youth, and had seen more of the world than most of his kindred; he had scarcely ascended the throne ere he felt the necessity of peace and repose. From all these reasons, then, the people of England had for many years become accustomed to look on their Sovereign as a fixture, which it would have been something astonishing to have found out of its place, or moving out of its orbit, which was the rather circumscribed one including Windsor, Buckingham Palace, St. James's, or now and then Ascot.

But, with the accession of Victoria the whole scene was changed—and changed for the better. Young—why should she not indulge the active curiosity so natural to her years? Popular—why should she not receive from her people themselves the proofs of that popularity? Queen of a fair land—why should she not visit the princely seats and residences of her nobility? And mistress of the ocean—why should she not launch her splendid yacht upon the seas and make its waves minister to her pleasure even as they do to the greatness of her empire? There were no reasons why her Majesty should not do all this, and many reasons why she should; and they were done accordingly. The reign of Victoria will present to the historian as many Royal progresses as that of Elizabeth, without the stiff and cumbrous state ceremonial that impeded the march of the virgin Queen. Her Majesty lays aside her sovereignty for a time and accepts the invitations of the greatest names among her aristocracy, on what may be called equal terms. The ruinous expense which the Earl of Leicester lavished on the fêtes of Kenilworth, for the entertainment of Elizabeth, was not required of the Duke of Devonshire, at Chatsworth, nor of the Duke of Rutland, at Belvoir; yet we doubt if the feeling between the Sovereign and subject was not as cordial and sincere, though its expression was less formal and ceremonious, in the latter cases than in the former.

But her Majesty has done more than this; she has departed still more widely from the example of her predecessors. Her visits have not been circumscribed by the bounds of her own kingdom; she has crossed the seas and exchanged courtesies with the Monarchs of other countries; and Leopold, on the throne of Belgium, and Louis Philippe, on that of France, have each been the hosts of the Sovereign of Britain. The two Monarchs who are the parvenus among the Kings of Europe, who have been chosen by the people in defiance of hereditary right, and the prestige of legitimacy, are the only two Monarchs who have received the visits of the Queen of England. The other Sovereigns of Europe confine their intercourse with them to the cold courtesies of what are called "diplomatic relations." We rejoice to see our Queen partaking of the freer spirit of her age; and it was, at the time, hoped that this friendly feeling between the Rulers of two great rival nations would have had a beneficial effect in preserving a good understanding between them, and that peace which is the natural consequence of it. But, as far as France is concerned, we have just been compelled to see how fallacious were such hopes; all the glowing anticipations of harmony between the states, in proportion to the friendship expressed by the Monarchs, have turned out vain; the compliments are forgotten, and old grievances are raked up and remembered on both sides, their bitterness being increased by the events which are every day crowding thickly upon us. The ferment in the public mind of both nations—especially in that of France—would hardly permit Louis Philippe to visit England, were he so inclined, if he wishes to preserve anything like popularity, or rather to escape growing more unpopular than he is already. Unless the prospect presented by the foreign relations of both countries brighten a little, the Isle of Wight will not present a repetition of the festivities of the Chateau d'Eu.

But another royal visit is spoken of, which gives us even more pleasure to contemplate. It is very generally reported that her Majesty intends to make an excursion to Ireland. We hope the rumour is better founded than rumours generally are. Ireland feels heavily the existence of an Executive Government in various ways, in Arms Bills, Coercion Acts, and such matters. Of the Royal authority it sees nothing, save in the faint shadow of it possessed by the Lord Lieutenant. We should like to see her Majesty residing for a short time in Dublin Castle, governing that part of her empire, for a space, in person instead of by deputy, and reducing the Viceroy for the time being to what he really is—a cypher—made conspicuous by much empty pageantry, which is beginning to excite ridicule even in the House of Commons. All this "borrowed majesty" would fade before the reality.

A substitute shines brightly as a King.
Until the King be by—and then his state,
Empties itself as does an inland brook
Into the main of waters.

If Ireland is really to be a portion of one empire, it would be far better to do away with the establishment of a Vice Royalty, which keeps up the form, and preserves the idea of a subjugated and conquered country, while the real business of the Government is just as much done in Downing-street and the Home-Office as that of Scotland. For a time at least, though a short one—it would be superseded by the presence of the Monarch.

In the present state of affairs there has been some little doubt as to the reception her Majesty would receive. We are certain it would be a most loyal one, if the visit were deprived of all appearances of a political tendency, which it probably will be. It is to be taken as nothing more than a pleasure trip, having this peculiar recommendation, that it will make her Majesty acquainted with a part of the empire of which too many of its rulers have been perfectly ignorant. The total neglect that has been displayed towards Ireland has produced worse results almost than the unequal laws, the oppressions of her social state, as exhibited by the working of the land tenure, or the anomalies of her religious condition. We know that all these evils lie too deep to be remedied by anything so brief—brilliant as it may be—as a Royal visit. But it will draw attention to the country; it will give the inhabitants there something to talk about besides the everlasting story of Saxon wrongs and injuries; it will, for a time at least, somewhat change the current of discussion of public affairs which have for a long while been running in a darkened channel.

Some material benefit, too, may arise. Many will go with the Queen; many more will go after her, thinking they may safely visit, without loss of dignity, what has attracted the attention of royalty. We should not be surprised to see an Irish mania take possession of the fashionable world, as it was seized last year by a Scotch one; and we shall find everybody "wearing the green," as it was then considered "the thing" to display the plaid in all its varieties. But, seriously, we should anticipate considerable good from this excursion; and we hope soon to hear that her Majesty's yacht is in preparation to bear with all speed the Queen of the Ocean to the island which the poet has called the "gem of the western world," and which, like many a gem in story, politicians have found to be inscribed with strange characters, that converted it into a talisman of wonderful and troublous power; for which reason we have omitted all mention of that one political question which there absorbs almost every other—we should wish to keep party feelings out of sight in treating of the Royal Excursion. And, besides, the visit, after all, may not take place—which will be unfortunate, but, everything considered, not surprising.

ENCAMPMENT OF IOWAY INDIANS, LORD'S CRICKET-GROUND.—THE WELCOME SPEECH.

THE IOWAY INDIANS.

During the past week this celebrated party of Indians (described in No. 119 of our journal) have been encamped at Lord's Cricket-ground, St. John's Wood, where they have exhibited their skill in shooting with bows and arrows, in a grand archery fête, in ball-play, characteristic dances, &c. The party numbers fourteen persons, including the principal Chiefs, Braves, or warriors, and the great Mystery or Medicine Man of their tribe, with their Squaws, their children, and a Papoose, or infant. The several performances (excepting the archery and ball-play) took place on an elevated platform. They commenced with the ceremony of pitching the wigwags, or tents, beside the platform, which was performed by the Squaws, after the Medicine-Man had invoked the benediction of the Great Spirit; this being one of the most interesting rites of the tribe. The wigwags were struck by the Squaws each day previous to the party leaving the ground, and the erection, as well as the taking down, of the tents, was accomplished in an incredibly short space of time.

The second performance was a speech from the second chief—the Walking Rain, explained by the interpreter; in which he stated this to be the first encampment of the kind formed in this country; adding his congratulations on the numerous attendance. He then performed.

The Opening, or Welcome Dance, in full dress, as given in compliment to strangers or friends visiting a village, and when taking leave.

Next was the first part of the War Dance, called the Approaching Dance, in which their actions exhibit the mode of approaching an enemy, by hunting their track; and in tracing them up, skulking after them, and, at last, when the war-whoop sounded, of rushing upon them for the attack. For this dance, their costumes were changed to what they call the war-dress and war-paint.

In the Archery, the prizes, &c., were shot for with their own bows, brought with them from America. This was but a very mediocre performance.

The Ball-play, peculiar to the North American Indians, was next played, with a ball-stick, which each player held in both hands as he ran, catching the ball as it flew, in a little hoop or racket at its end, from which he threw the ball home to his bye or goal.

The Eagle Dance was given as a part of the War Dance, in compliment to the valour of the War Eagle, the bird that conquers all others of the eagle species in their country, and from the tail of which they procure the plumes which adorn their heads.

The Wild Horse Dance was the next performance, and showed the modes of chase, catching and taming the horse, &c.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Our intelligence this week from the French capital is deeply interesting. The bombardment of Tangier seems to have been but the commencement of a series of operations of the Prince de Joinville, with breathless haste, and in spite of the peaceful prognostications of journalists, abroad and at home, has attacked and destroyed Mogadore. The following is the telegraphic despatch announcing this significant event:—

"TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCH."

"BAYONNE, Aug. 26. Half-past two o'clock."

"Mogadore, Aug. 17."

"THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE TO THE MINISTERS OF MARINE."

"On the 15th we attacked Mogadore."

"After having destroyed (cerca) the town and its batteries, we took possession of the island and of the port."

"Sixty-eight men, including seven officers, were killed or wounded. I am busied in establishing the garrison of the island. I have placed the port in a state of blockade."

"Attested copy."

"Baron de Mackau, Vice-Admiral, Peer of France, Minister of Marine and Colonies."

The only other document of an official character upon the subject is the subjoined letter from Gênes, dated Aug. 18, received at Lloyd's:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to acquaint you that her Majesty's steamer Hecla arrived this morning from Mogadore, bringing about thirty-five passengers from the west coast of Morocco, for which purpose she was despatched, as reported in my communication of the 8th instant. She brings news of the bombardment of Mogadore, on the 15th instant, by the French squadron. The land forces were about disembarking to take possession of the small island near to it, when the Hecla left. Mr. Wills, our consul, and some other British subjects, were not allowed to embark, owing to some local regulations relative to Custom-house engagements. Admiral Sir E. Owen has dispatched the Venus to Mogadore, where her Majesty's ship Warpite was lying for the protection of British interests. At Tangier everything was quiet, and order prevailed. The markets were re-opened and trade reviving. The defences were about to be repaired. The savage tribes in the neighbourhood had dispersed."

(Signed) "To W. Dobson, Esq., Secretary, Lloyd's."

"P.S.—The Moors are reported to have fought with great bravery, and that they opened fire from the batteries, when they found the three line-of-battle ships were about to take up positions at two o'clock P.M., on the 15th instant. The cannonade lasted till near sunset, when the steamers towed off the large ships to the regular anchorage ground. At night there was firing between the contending parties till ten o'clock, when the Hecla departed, and till eleven o'clock at a distance firing was still heard. This firing was between the shore and the steamers with small French sailing vessels of war. The French had not attacked any other part on the West coast."

Another letter from Gênes of the same date furnishes a few particulars. It says:—

"Her Majesty's steamer Hecla arrived in the course of the night from Mogadore with the intelligence that at about half-past two o'clock on Thursday last the Prince de Joinville had attacked upon the defences of that place, which continued briskly for some hours, without the results being known when that vessel departed at half-past ten. Up to one o'clock, however, firing was heard by the officers of the Hecla. This time the Moors did not wait until the French ships got into position, but fired upon them while forming. The large ships, which had not depth of water as close as they would wish to go, were the first to fire at the works; afterwards the Belle Poule and long closer in; and lastly the steamers. The distance to which the Warpite and Hecla were hoisted off prevented the damage done to the works from being seen by persons on board, but certain movements gave an impression that landing on the island in front of the town was about to be made as the day closed. Operations would, no doubt, have recommenced on the following day."

"A statement is freely handed about, and is believed by those who have particular means of information, that the Prince has declared that, instead of the lenity shown at Tangier, he will sweep all away at Mogadore—a sort of naval version. But it is permitted us to hope that he never uttered anything of the kind. Contrary to what had been expected, the French squadron, instead of attacking any of the intervening ports between Tangier and Mogadore, went direct to the latter place; they will, however, it is understood, call at those places when they shall have done all they tried at Mogadore. According to very good authority, the number of batteries at or near the town amounts to eight."

The French papers are, of course, occupied exclusively with the discussion of the fresh warlike operations of the Prince de Joinville before Mogadore, of which they speak in terms of high satisfaction, and many of them are in great rapture at the event. As to the Nathaniel, that journal considers the occupation of the island as the sure indication of an approaching war. The Nathaniel says:—

"Whether an immediate war will be the consequence of the difficulties which at present exist between France and England we know not; but we know that it is time to prepare for it. England is preparing for such an event with significant activity, and the petty comedy which was lately performed between the Whig orators and the journals of their party, when they affected to deplore the diminution of the maritime armaments of England, ought not to mislead us as to the real facts. It is certain that England is arming actively, and that she is preparing to attack us everywhere with vigour, and to place her possessions in defence against any attack. At the period when she had on her hands a war in India, another in China, and when she saw complications in the East, England never made such extensive preparations. England, consequently, foresees a war, and if she foresees it, it is because she wishes it."

The Spectator, after publishing the despatch of Prince de Joinville, observes:— "The number of killed and wounded mentioned by the Prince, proves that the affair was more serious than that of Tangier, in which two colon boys were killed and only one sailor dangerously wounded. The number of officers Arde de combat would seem to indicate that the troops, on landing, experienced a lively resistance, and that the attack had been repulsed. There is on board only one officer for every thirty or forty men, and the casualties among the officers is one to ten soldiers. This is a painful but noble reply to the calumnies of a portion of the British press."

The effect of the news, when first received in Paris, was a slight fall in the funds.

The news from Algeria, received in Paris, had also created considerable interest, Marshal Bugeaud having obtained an important advantage. The news, however, was soon eclipsed by the more important announcement of the destruction of Mogadore. Marshal Bugeaud's despatch is as follows:—

"MARSEILLES, 22nd August, 5 P.M.—"The Governor-General of Algeria to the Minister of War.—Bugeaud of Kaudiat, Abdelkader 14th.—Having marched upon the Morocco army, which became daily more strong and menacing to Algeria, I came up with it at two leagues in front of its camp. It assumed the offensive with 20,000 men at the moment the heads of our columns were crossing the valley. We were surrounded on all sides. The most complete victory remained to us. Our infantry, which stood most firmly, and a little knot of our cavalry fought with the utmost bravery."

"We have taken, in succession, all their camps, covering more than a league, eleven pieces of cannon, sixteen standards, from 1600 to 1200 tents—amongst them that of the son of the Emperor, his parasol, his insignia of command, all his personal baggage, a great quantity of the munitions of war, besides an immense booty which has fallen into our hands. The enemy have left about 300 dead on the field of battle. Our loss, though severe, is comparatively light for a day so distinguished as we may name that of the Battle of Jaly."

The Moniteur Parisien says:—"The Moroccan army, which attacked our troops on the banks of the Jaly, reckoned 24,000 cavalry. The enemy must, in addition, have possessed a numerous irregular infantry, and probably some regular troops, to defend and work the artillery. Marshal Bugeaud, as has been already stated, had under his orders only 7000 infantry, 4400 cavalry, and twelve pieces of cannon."

The Tabiti affair is by no means settled, although the Revue de Paris contains the following pacific intimation:—"After the exchange of several diplomatic notes, M. Guizot has proposed to England the following arrangement:—Tabiti to be a free state, and France and England each to have a consul there, on terms of perfect equality as to commercial advantages; the French expedition is to be recalled, the authority of Queen Ponnare to be re-established, and Mr. Pritchard to have permission to return to Tabiti, but merely as a private individual, and never to perform any public functions."

As may be naturally supposed, the letters published here, insinuating that the Prince de Joinville and his men are not perfect masters of the art of gunnery created a perfect storm in Paris, and for some days our Paris contemporaries were absolutely furious.

The Moniteur publishes a royal ordinance, restoring to Count Durbatel, who had returned from Enns, the direction of the Home Department, which had been confided ad interim to the Minister of Public Instruction. M. Larave Laplagne, the Minister of Finance, and M. Cousin Grideau, the Minister of Commerce, had also returned from the country to Paris. Marshal Soult still remained at his estate of St. Amand, having, it is said, replied to the King's invitation to attend in Paris, that he was unable to travel, from indisposition. Much inconvenience was experienced by his absence, but "he would not be commanded." The despatches of Marshal Bugeaud were sent home unread from Paris, and had not yet been returned.

SPAIN.

The letters from Madrid of the 21st inst. mention the arrival of the Queen in that capital at four o'clock in the morning of that day. The civil and military authorities went out beyond the gate of Atocha to compliment their Majesty, and the city was illuminated during the entire night. General Narvaez rode on one side of the royal carriage, and the Captain General on the other. A Cabinet Council was held on the 21st, at which the appointment of a Minister for Foreign Affairs was discussed. M. Martinez de la Rosa and the Marquis de Miraflores were still candidates for that office. The son of Sir Robert Peel had arrived at Madrid. Queen Christina went in the evening to return thanks at the church of Atocha. The young Queen and Infanta, who are far from enjoying good health, suffered considerably during the journey, but the Government journals assert that there is no truth in the report of the Queen being ill.

According to correspondence dated Ceuta, the 13th, the Emperor of Morocco had not only acceded to the just demands of Spain, but had agreed to pay the expenses of her recent armament, and to grant her a territory of three leagues in extent round Ceuta. Tangier was tranquil. The Governor and the Emperor's son were encamped at the distance of a mile from the place. All the Spanish ships of war, with the exception of the Christina frigate, had left for Algiers. No other foreign vessels either had remained. The Alibon ship of the line had followed the French squadron. The Insulites, who retired to Gibraltar before the commencement of hostilities, had, for the most part, returned to Tangier. Mr. Drummond Hay was stated to be seriously indisposed, arising from the great exertions he has lately made, and the manifestation at seeing his efforts to prevent a rupture between Morocco and France defeated.

PORTUGAL.

Our accounts from Lisbon, which are to the 26th instant, represent the state of affairs to be still exceedingly critical. It is evident that the result of the agitation which prevails must either be the triumph of the policy of Costa Cabral or a return to absolutism.

The decrees respecting the judges, to which our letters last week alluded, and the intention of which was no doubt to make them entirely dependent upon the crown, has excited so much alarm, and raised so determined a spirit of opposition, that the Ministers will find it no easy matter to stand their ground against it. The sentiments of indignation of the greater part of the judges who preside in the different courts having been laid before the Queen in the form of protest by Senor Jose da Silva Carvalho, President of the Supreme Tribunal of Justice, her Majesty was pleased to signify her disapprobation of the same by receiving him in the most ungracious manner, and he has been dismissed from the high office he held. This harsh measure betokens anything but a conciliatory spirit on the part of the crown. Similar addresses are in preparation from the Tribunal of Commerce and the other courts of justice, and although the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Gomes de Castro, is gone to Oporto for the express purpose of preventing, if possible, a similar step on the part of the judges of that city, it is thought that they will follow the example set by their Lisbon colleagues.

The Duke of Palmella has had an interview with her Majesty, at which he communicated his sentiments with respect to the illegality of the decrees. That interview, it appears, did not alter her Majesty's opinion. The Duke on his return addressed a letter to the dictator, as a member of the council of state and president of it, in the absence of her Majesty refusing to accept the functions which that decree imposed on the council.

Some sensation has been created in Lisbon, by the arbitrary proceedings adopted towards a British subject, Mr. John Alfred Toner. This gentleman was imprisoned at Coimbra, on the 14th of April last, changed from one goal to another, sent to Lisbon on the 2nd of May, put on board a ship of war, taken to the fief's prison (Lisboa), and afterwards removed to the Castle of St. George, where he still remains under the most rigorous confinement and surveillance. It was not till the 24th ultimo that he was placed under the jurisdiction of the British Judge-Conservator, and by his order only 101 days without the pale of the laws, stipulating British privileges and those regulating the criminal process of this country. In virtue of the illegality and irregularity of the proceedings, the prisoner concluded that by appealing to the British Judge-Conservator they would have been promptly annulled, and he set at liberty. Such was not the case, as this functionary referred the case to the tribunal of the "Relacao" of Lisbon. The "Relacao" would not take cognizance of the case, under the plea of being incompetent to decide.

GREECE.

Accounts from Athens, to the 11th instant, mention some changes in the Ministry, and state that great ferment existed. The following decree, proclaiming a political amnesty, has been officially published:—

"Otho, by the grace of God King of Greece. Upon the proposition of our Council of Ministers, we have decided and do ordain:—

"Art. 1. We grant an amnesty to those who have taken a part in the insurrectionary movement which took place in Acarnania and in Western Greece during the months of May and June last."

"2. Theodore Grotas, Protopapa, Demetrius, Tarsades, Nicolas I. Nello, Costas, Chasapi, Constant Colocythas, Sp. Maristates, and Costa Capo Georgachi, are exempted from the benefit of this decree."

"3. We reserve, should it become necessary, the exercise of our royal clemency to the persons excepted, after their judgment."

"Athens, July 31, 1844."

"(Countersigned)"

"MAYORCOURAYO, A. LONDOS, C. LONDOS, RODRIGUEZ, TRICOUPEL"

EGYPT.

In our late impression, last week, we announced that Mehemet Ali had repented of his hasty abdication, and had resumed his functions. Little light has been thrown upon the causes which first led to his resignation. We have seen letters from Alexandria, which attribute it to a sudden fit of ill-humour at his son Ibrahim supporting a measure in the council disapproved by him, and that the old Pacha was induced to return to Alexandria by the council and Ibrahim giving way.

Another account gives this explanation of the origin of the abdication:—"The Pacha, by the advice of his sons, made some changes this year in the mode of collecting the 'ferds' (rents or taxes) from his subjects; and that in consequence of such alterations, the sum has fallen far short of the usual amount. His highness, it is said, on being made aware of this, called on his sons to make up the deficiency amongst them, alleging that it was through their advice it occurred. This they positively refused to do. The consequence was a family quarrel, during which the Pacha drew on the Treasury for 10,000 purses, equal to £30,000, with which he set off for Cairo without saying a word."

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

TRIAL FOR MURDER.—At Liverpool, on Monday, George Leonard was indicted for the wilful murder of his wife, Bridget Leonard, and inducing several wounds on her body with a razor.—It appeared from the statement of James Leonard, the principal witness for the prosecution, a boy 12 years of age, that his father, the prisoner, was a tailor, living in Peter-street, in that town. The deceased was his mother. There was a family of six children, of whom the witness only was residing at home. The deceased was in the habit of letting a part of the house to lodgers, and on the 27th of July the attic was occupied by a person named Livingstone and his wife. There was another male lodger in the house, whose name did not appear. On the evening of that day this boy had retired to bed, in a room on the first floor, where the deceased and the prisoner slept. He had, on going to bed, left them and Livingstone and his wife and the other lodger in the kitchen. He was awake by a noise, and found it was the lodger snoring; and he then heard the voice of his father in altercation, insisting upon the lodger leaving the house. The boy came down stairs, and found the lodger on the point of departing. After he was gone, the prisoner continued very angry. He called the deceased an obstinate name, and accused her of misconduct with one John Guest, who had been a lodger several years before. Soon after, the Livingstones went to their room and were let up stairs by the deceased. The prisoner followed to the room on the first floor, and the boy saw his father put something bright into his pocket. He went up to the room of the Livingstones and desired his wife to come down stairs. He himself went down to the kitchen and barred and fastened the door and window. The deceased soon after came down, and the prisoner recommenced his abuse of her on the subject of John Guest, and used the same epithets as before. She only replied, "Are you sure?" which she repeated several times. She was sitting in a chair behind the door, and the prisoner struck her with his fist somewhere about the face, and then took "the bright thing" out of his pocket, which proved to be a razor, and began cutting her about the throat. The boy cried "Murder!" and endeavoured to pull him away, but he repeated the blows on different parts of his unfortunate victim. The boy at last got the door open and ran for the police. In the meantime Michael Hamilton, a neighbour, came to the door and endeavoured to push it open. The parties were behind it, and he could only get hold of the hair of the prisoner, who again forced the door to. On a second attempt, he forced an entrance, and found the deceased lying on the ground, and the prisoner standing over her, striking her with something he held in his hand. He said to the prisoner, "You old villain, what are you doing to your wife?" He then found that the nose of the unfortunate woman was entirely cut from her face, and she had a severe gash upon her cheek. The witness ran to call the police, and the unfortunate woman in the meantime crawled partially out of the door, saying faintly, "Keep him in, keep him in; put something to me,

I shall die; he has cut my throat." The prisoner then pushed her with his feet, when she fell out on the pavement, and he shut the door to. Several policemen coming up she was carried to the house of a surgeon, and thence to the hospital, but died from loss of blood before she arrived there. The prisoner was found in the middle of the kitchen floor washing his hands, and being asked why he had committed the act, spoke of her in very coarse terms. He seemed to have been drinking, but yet to know what he was about. On examination of the body of the deceased, it was found that several frightful wounds had been inflicted on the face, neck, legs, and thighs, one on the latter being seven inches long and near six inches deep. The lateral jugular vein and the femoral artery were divided. Mr. M'Quibrey addressed the jury for the defence, and contended that the prisoner was insane; and that, at all events, under the provocation stated, the offence did not amount to more than manslaughter. The learned judge summed up the case very elaborately, and the jury found a verdict of "Guilty of Manslaughter." The prisoner was sentenced to be transported for life.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

AN UNFORTUNATE PLEA.—On Wednesday, Charles Lamb Dowden, alias Charles Lamb, a young man of the theatrical profession, was indicted for forging and uttering orders for the payment of money, and thereupon receiving divers sums, with intent to defraud T. Lamb, his late uncle. The prisoner, when he came to the bar, pleaded guilty.—Recorder: Prisoner, it is not for me to advise, but you had better take your own consideration before you plead guilty. The Court has a reason for throwing out that suggestion.—Prisoner: I am guilty, my lord.—Recorder: Then let the plea be recorded: let the witnesses stand forth.—Evidence was then given that the uncle of the prisoner (late deceased) allowed the prisoner sums of money upon his (deceased's) order; but, at a certain period, that system was abandoned. The prisoner, however, has since obtained sums of money on a signature purporting to be that of his uncle, and had altogether received fraudulently about £23. The prisoner was formerly an actor at Sadler's Wells. The deceased had made a bequest in his favour, notwithstanding.—Another class of witnesses spoke to the general good character of the prisoner. Owing to the "slackness" of employ in the theatrical world, he had recently fallen into distress.—The Recorder told the prisoner that his plea could not affect the judgment of the Court, because the act of Parliament decided what must be the minimum of punishment. He (the Recorder) had advised consideration, because the Court thought that, as the prosecutor was dead, the fact of forgery might not have been proved. The mildest sentence he could pass was, that he be kept to hard labour for two years, as his plea did away with the discretion of the Court.

This case concluded the session, and the following sentences were passed:—

Death Recorded Against.—W. Beveridge.

Transportation for Life.—P. Larkin, J. Middleton, J. K. Lingard, W. Scarborough, W. H. Watts, W. Windley, T. Ashford.

For Twenty Years.—Narkville Narkville.

For Fifteen Years.—J. Ingram alias Walker, G. Edwards, W. Fisher.

For Fourteen Years.—J. Smith.

For Twelve Years.—H. Brown, Elizabeth Jones.

For Ten Years.—C. O'Connell, T. Woodcock, J. Tennison, J. Beaumont, P. Vailon, F. Esauze, H. Malcott, W. Woodward, B. Scullthorpe, G. Manning, H. Harrison, W. Wright, T. Boulle, T. Brown, J. Brown, G. Gray, J. Davis, Frederick Rider, H. Harrison.

For Seven Years.—Maria Lewis, Mary Barke, Elizabeth Dubois, Jane Robinson, J. Fitzgerald, N. Cartwright, R. Wilson, A. Hallifer, C. Salomon, W. Harvey, J. Barnett, J. Bushell, W. Readshaw, T. Jones, G. Golding.

A number of prisoners were sentenced to imprisonment and hard labour for different periods.

POLICE.

EXTRAORDINARY CRUELITIES ON THE AFRICAN COAST.

A day or two ago a man named William Laidler, went before Sir John Prie, at the Mansion-house, and made a most extraordinary statement. He said he had been a seaman on board the ship John Campbell, of Liverpool, a vessel of 600 tons, in the palm oil trade, and then disclosed the particulars of a mutiny on board that vessel, and a series of cruelties which, he stated, had been crowded with murder. He solemnly pledged himself to the truth of the statement, which was to the following effect:—"The ship John Campbell left the Liverpool Docks on the 21st of October last, bound for Old Calabar, on the African coast, in the palm oil trade. Two weeks after the ship sailed, the skipper (Robert Nelson) died off Madeira, when the supercargo assumed the command, in defiance of the senior officer on board. We had now gained our destination, working under an African sun, unloading the ship, but, finding ourselves oppressed with heat, and languishing for the want of food, we resented, went off, and respectfully complained to the proper officer, the first mate, that, in consequence of the reduction of our rations, we felt weak, and unable to do our work. The officer referred us to the supercargo. We then addressed ourselves to that personage, who also refused our request, on the ground that the ship's provisions were short, and should be reserved for the homeward passage. We knew this to be an evasion of our just claims, and a falsehood, as the owner, Sir Joseph Sharp, at the time we signed the ship's articles, said we should have plenty to eat, and be well used. As the petition was rejected, we returned quietly to our duty, whilst the supercargo sent off to some of the ships in port, and having conversed with their skipper and supercargoes, several of them accompanied him on board the John Campbell. We now believed our usual allowance of food would be granted to us, and, being satisfied, we gave them three cheers as they passed over the side, being under no apprehensions. On this occasion the supercargo was told that the John Campbell's crew did not recognise him as master, but were ready to obey the senior ship's officer on board. The supercargo did not return on this day, but remained all night ashore, and next morning he sent for half the ship's crew, no reason having been assigned for this unusual order. This mysterious request having excited our suspicion, all hands refused to comply until the intent was known. When the messenger returned he said we might look to ourselves, as the war canoes were preparing to come off. Our armament may be conceived; and there now ensued a scene of barbarity and cruelty that could not be exceeded by the most ignorant savages on the coast, and inhuman and blood-thirsty as the natives sometimes are, they cannot be excelled by the butchery and bloody purpose of the orders issued in this deplorable instance. We saw about fifty armed war canoes put off, with from eighteen to twenty natives in each, chanting their war songs of blood and slaughter, with the supercargo at their head. They soon drew up in a circle round the ship, and swept her decks with volleys of shot and poisoned arrows. Being assailed by such an extraordinary attack, and shuddering at the idea of instant death, we stood on the defence with such weapons as came to hand, but becoming weak from wounds and loss of blood, the ship was easily boarded, and nine of us tied with cords, and thrown, covered with gore, into the canoes, and taken ashore and paraded through King Yamba's town, where every species of cruelty and insult was also inflicted upon us. The natives having exhausted their cruel energies, we were stripped, our clothes taken away, and ourselves put in chains, and suffered to lie on the damp ground in separate huts, and fed on water and half a pound of biscuit a day during forty-three days, two of our number having died from this brutal treatment—the carpenter and Edward Johnson. The crew being now in chains, and the ship delapidated, the natives turned upon the supercargo, and plundered the vessel of her gear, and every movable article upon which they could lay their hands. This was but a slight portion of retributive justice upon the supercargo. The statement concludes with the expression of determination to bring the supercargo to public justice upon the arrival of the other injured parties, and gives the names of the other men who were injured, viz., Alfred Benness, Samuel Gillin, William Hall, Edward Cadogan, Edward Johnson, Joseph King, William Laidler, and the carpenter; and the names of those stated by the applicant to have been murdered, viz., Edward Johnson and the carpenter. The statement, which is dated "Yamba, 1st July, 1844," is signed William Laidler and William Hall. Sir John Prie put some questions to the applicant, who showed one of the poisoned arrows which he said had been sent against the vessel from the armed canoes. The latter most solemnly declared that every word he had written was perfectly true, and that as many of the crew as survived would testify to the accuracy of it. Sir John Prie then sent the seamen to a place of refuge, and wrote to the owner of the vessel, alluding to the matters detailed, and requesting information on the subject.

On a subsequent day Mr. Goodman, the chief clerk, who had written to the owners of the ship John Campbell, by direction of Sir John Prie, handed to the Lord Mayor the following answer:—

"Liverpool, 26th August, 1844."

"Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 24th inst., I beg to state, for the information of Sir John Prie, that my ship, the John Campbell, has not yet arrived from Africa, and I scarcely know when to expect her. I do not know whether any others of the crew are in this country, and I have no reason to suppose Captain Burnley would commit such an act as that with which it appears he is charged by the man Laidler. A mutiny took place on board the John Campbell soon after her arrival at Calabar, which was quelled by the interference of the King. I perceive that Laidler, the complainant, was one of the mutineers, and, having observed in the London papers a long account of his examination before Sir John Prie, I have deemed it but justice to Captain Burnley, and to prevent the public forming an erroneous opinion of the case from exaggerated statements, to publish the depositions and statements of the mutiny, which I received from Capt. Burnley on the 8th of June last. (These letters describe a mutiny which had taken place on board the ship.)"

"I beg to remark that Capt. Burnley was put on board the John Campbell by the charterers of that vessel, as supercargo only, but assumed the command by my authority, on the death of Captain Nelson."

"I am, Sir, yours respectfully,"

"S. R. Goodman, Esq., Mansion-house, London. Wm. SHARP."

Laidler, the seaman, upon being told that his lordship would, on a future day, take cognizance of the case, stated that he should be punctual in attendance."

On Wednesday Laidler again appeared before the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House. Sir J. Prie sat with the Lord Mayor on the occasion. The Lord Mayor stated that the owner of the John Campbell, which had not yet arrived, had remitted to town an account of the depositions of Mr. Burnley, relative to the extraordinary transactions on board that vessel. From that account it appeared that a mutiny had taken place; that several of the crew, of whom Laidler was one, objected to Mr. Burnley as captain, although the appointment was made by the owner upon the death of Captain Robert Nelson; and that so menacing and insubordinate was the conduct of the mutineers, that he was obliged to apply to King Yamba for assistance to protect his own life and the property of his employees. From the details of the statement, which showed that Mr. Burnley had acted with becoming zeal, spirit, and discretion, it appeared that several of the crew had evaded the bloodthirsty work which had been assigned to them. Mr. Burnley had not only been diligent in his duties, but he had also been successful in his efforts to bring the crew to a state of discipline. The Lord Mayor, who was present, expressed his satisfaction with the conduct of Mr. Burnley, and he also expressed his sympathy for the crew, who had been so long and so hard worked. The Lord Mayor then turned to the crew, and he addressed them in a few words, in which he expressed his sympathy for them, and he also expressed his confidence in their future conduct. The crew then responded to the Lord Mayor's address, and they all expressed their gratitude to Mr. Burnley for his kind treatment of them. The Lord Mayor then dismissed the crew, and he also dismissed Mr. Burnley. The Lord Mayor then turned to the audience, and he addressed them in a few words, in which he expressed his satisfaction with the conduct of Mr. Burnley, and he also expressed his sympathy for the crew, who had been so long and so hard worked. The Lord Mayor then dismissed the audience, and he also dismissed the crew.

A STRANGE STORY.—At Union-hall on Tuesday, Edward Bentley, a respectable looking young man, living in Dorset-place, Pall-mall, was charged with stealing a gold watch from Mrs. Sophia Lee, of Stangate-street, Westminster-road. The complainant stated that she was a married woman, and left home the preceding evening to witness the illumination; that in the course of her perambulation she met the prisoner, with whom she was previously acquainted, and, after waiting a good deal about, in passing over Westminster-bridge, they sat down in one of the alcoves, where, being exhausted, she fell asleep, and when she awoke she found her companion was gone, and missed her watch from her bosom. She immediately recovered the bridge, and meeting with a policeman in Whitehall-street, she apprised him of the circumstance, and gave him the prisoner's address. They proceeded to his house, and found her watch, and she gave him into custody. The policeman stated that he accompanied Mrs. Lee to the prisoner's house, between three and four o'clock that morning, and found him in bed. He left the complainant in the parlour while he went into the prisoner's bedroom, and, addressing him, inquired if he had been on Westminster-bridge that night with a lady; he immediately replied in the affirmative, and at the same time expressed a great deal of surprise at the visit of a policeman to his abode at such an unreasonable hour. He, however, made no allusion to the watch until the complainant entered the room. The prisoner was then asked if he knew anything of her watch. He said: "Yes, I have the lady's watch; she gave it to me to keep for her before she fell asleep on the bridge, and I intended to have taken it over to her house this morning when I got up." Mr. Traill asked the complainant if it was true that she had given him the watch to keep for her before she fell asleep. The complainant said that she had no recollection of anything of the kind. Mr. Traill: Were you perfectly sober? The complainant admitted that she had taken a little rum, but she was not at all intoxicated. The policeman said that the complainant was sober. It was between three and four o'clock in the morning when she spoke to him on the subject of the alleged robbery. The prisoner in his defence said that he was acquainted with the complainant, who visited at the residence of his son; that he met her accidentally the preceding night at a late hour, and they walked together, and while going along she was actually asleep. Mr. Traill: What while walking along the streets? The prisoner said that such was the case; that she seemed to be under the influence of liquor, and he endeavored all in his power to prevail on her to go home, offering to see her to her house. She, however, refused to go, saying that she wanted to see the "lights," and on their return, when they got on Westminster-bridge she proposed to sit down to rest in one of the alcoves. He dissuaded her against it, mentioning that she was so near home they had better proceed forward. She was opposed to this, and they had not been many minutes in the alcove before she took out her watch, and desired him to keep it for her, and she then fell asleep. As he could not arouse her he got up, leaving her where she was, and walked to his home, but he had not been long in his bed when, to his astonishment, the complainant brought a policeman, and charged him with stealing the watch. He had no intention of appropriating the watch to his own use, and his only motive in taking charge of it was to prevent it from being taken from her while she remained asleep in such an exposed situation. Mr. Traill, after remarking upon the extraordinary nature of the affair, said that under all the circumstances he should discharge the prisoner.

DEATH OF THE CHAMBERLAIN OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—We regret to have to announce that Sir William Heygate, Bart., Chamberlain of the City of London, died on Wednesday, at Roehampton, in the sixty-third year of his age. The deceased baronet was only elected to the Chamberlainship about fifteen months since. Mr. Alderman Brown has offered himself a candidate for the vacant office.

We engraved a portrait of Sir William Heygate, at the time of his election, about fifteen months since.

CENTENARY OF THE BIRTH OF THE LATE REV. ROWLAND HILL.—On Tuesday evening, a large public meeting was held at Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars-road, for the purpose of commemorating the centenary of the birth of the late Rev. Rowland Hill, and also to consider the propriety of erecting a memorial to him. The Rev. James Sherman, M.A., Minister of the chapel, presided, and was supported by Mr. Pritchard, the Consul at Tahiti; the Rev. George Clayton, the Rev. Dr. Campbell, and several other gentlemen. The Chairman said that it had been suggested to him to take measures for erecting a memorial to the late Rev. Rowland Hill, formerly Minister of Surrey Chapel, now that they had completed the centenary of his birth. Many plans had been recommended, but that which had met with most general approbation was that which proposed to erect, contiguous to the chapel, a large schoolhouse, where a number of children might receive the blessing of a sound, liberal, and scriptural education. In addition to this it was proposed to erect two large infant schools, one of which should be in the Borough-road. Resolutions to that effect were submitted and adopted. Upwards of £200 was subscribed. Mr. Pritchard detailed at some length the progress of education at Tahiti and the South Sea Islands.

MANICAL PROTECTION.—On Monday afternoon a numerous and highly influential meeting of general protectors was held in Exeter Hall, to receive the report of the committee of the Medical Protection Assembly. Dr. Carpenter in the chair. The report having detailed the proceedings of the committee for securing to the profession their rights, stated that they sought a communication with the Council of the College of Surgeons, which was rejected, and that they subsequently begged an interview with the Home Secretary, which Sir James Graham refused, on the ground of pressure of business. The report, in conclusion, condemned in toto the conduct of the Council and Sir James Graham's refusal. Several resolutions sanctioning the report were adopted, and a committee was appointed which proposed a resolution, to the effect that they should meet again early next month to reconsider the conduct of the Council. Mr. Wakley denounced the measures of the Council and Sir James Graham's bill, and said that it depended on the 11,000 members of the profession to correct the Council and prevent the other being carried.

CONTENT BETWEEN LORD BROUGHAM AND THE SOLICITORS.—Lord Brougham's measure for the partial abolition of imprisonment for debt has worked up the solicitors almost to frenzy, and very naturally, for it will certainly be the ruin of the most respectable portion of them, as their prosperity has been occasioned by their power of oppression. It is now no longer possible to increase a debt three-fold by costs exacted under a fear of imprisonment. A public meeting of the solicitors took place on Monday evening, in Bedford-row, to consider the operation of the act, Mr. Goddard in the chair. The Chairman introduced in strong language upon the tendency of all Lord Brougham's attempts at legislation to injure the profession, from the sober members of which he had never received very cordial countenance. They came into the profession after incurring heavy charges, and it was necessary that they should maintain a respectable position in society; but they were now to be deprived of the means. (Hear.) But not only themselves were endangered by the new law, but the interests of the tradesmen and shopkeepers of the metropolis, and throughout the kingdom, were deeply implicated, as their debts, in the majority of instances, were under £200. A plan had been organized of petitioning the Legislature, in which the latter class of the community could assist, and, working cordially together, they would form a formidable body. On the motion of Mr. Clarke, a petition to the Legislature was adopted, praying for the immediate repeal of the 57th clause of the act. A discussion took place as to the best means of furthering the objects of the meeting, in the course of which it was resolved to appeal individually to the 11,000 solicitors in the kingdom, and extend their co-operation. It was also resolved to summon a general meeting of all the members of the profession in London, on Monday next.

THE POST-OFFICE SUT SYSTEM.—The inquiry into the nefarious practices of some of the subordinate employees at the Post-Office, to which we alluded last week, is concluded. Beside the letter carrier, Tapson, upon whose seat in the Northern Office the two letters which led to the discovery were found, open, the men delivering letters in the square district, North Audley-street, Grosvenor-place, Connaught-square, as well as others employed to sing bells at night, in several western localities have been subjected to rigid examination. This inquiry has not only fully confirmed our statement as to the extent to which this practice has occurred, but several important circumstances have been elicited. When charged upon the evidence of Tapson's book, with having obtained their information from the opening of the letters of Lord George Bentinck and others, the fact was readily admitted by all the parties then charged, and the further chain of evidence was shortly concluded that that information had been furnished to parties who were willing to pay for it. Indeed it was the avowed practice of some of the parties to visit Tattersall's, and being distributed during the day in different parts of the metropolis, while one of them was in attendance to business at the West-end, others were busily engaged at the several sporting houses in the city, the eastern and the southern districts of the metropolis. Here it was that they employed their improperly acquired information, and by these means they netted no inconsiderable sum, as is already proved. It is most probable, and it is partially proved, that much of the information obtained by these men was from the letters received of Lord George Bentinck and others when given to the postmen from the hotels and other places where these noblemen and gentlemen resided. The letters thus obtained were easily examined, their contents copied, and the letters then forwarded, without losing the post of that evening. Up to the conclusion of the inquiry, for the present, although a great number of men have been examined, no others are suspended upon the existing charge. All that, as yet, is officially known is this, that the great evil is as yet unsuppressed, not diminished; and that other officers are put on, both in the morning and in the evening, to do their several duties, both in and out of the office.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE METROPOLIS.—The plan for opening a direct line of communication between the new Houses of Parliament and the north-west district of London, has been agreed upon. The new street will commence at the western extremity of the new Houses of Parliament, running in an oblique line from Abingdon-street to Rotten-square, from which point there is already a corresponding continuation to the Great Western road. By this project two desirable objects will be attained. It will form a nearer and more convenient approach to the Houses of Parliament, the Law Courts, and the Government offices, from the extensive neighbourhood referred to, whilst the removal of the obscure streets, courts, and alleys in that part of Westminster will serve to abate a nuisance which was considered deserving of legislative reprehension. The new street is to be of the width of Regent street, and of nearly equal length. Mr. Hugh Wason, late member for Ipswich, has entered into a contract to complete two-thirds of the line at 34 per cent. less than the Government surveyor's estimate. Between Holborn and Oxford-street the line of the new street is in a state of considerable forwardness. The vaults for the houses on either side of the way are complete, and the width of the thoroughfare is now marked out. When the whole length is finished, which is now expected to be in the course of three or four weeks, there will be a direct communication between the town and Oxford-street for foot passengers. Many now take this course, avoiding the circuitous way by St. Giles's Church.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths in the metropolis for the week ending Saturday, the 24th inst., was 935, of which 485 were males, and 451 females. Of that number there died in 15 years of age, 393; from 15 to 50, 284; and from 50 upwards, 148; the age of one person, whose body was found in the Thames, being unknown. The average weekly mortality for the last five summers was 900, and for the last five years 965.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Thursday the directors of the London and Blackwall Railway Company met at the Corporation of London, in the City Hall, to consider the report of the directors of the London and Blackwall Railway Company, which was presented to them by the directors of the London and Blackwall Railway Company, and they resolved to adopt the same.

THE LONDON VETERINARY SCHOOL.—A splendid gift was given to the Veterinary School on Monday and Tuesday for the benefit of this excellent institution. The gentlemen were changed on both days, and such were the arrangements of the committee, aided by the spirit and liberality of Mr. Tyler, the proprietor, that the public must have been abundantly gratified and a large sum must also have been secured for the school.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE EARL OF DUNHAM.—On Wednesday last the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the monument to the memory of the late Earl of Dunham, on Painswick Hill, in the county of Durham, was performed with great splendour. The Earl of Zetland presided on the occasion, and was attended by large bodies of Freemen, dressed in their usual paraphernalia, with bands of music and flags; the concourse of people from the neighbouring towns of Newcastle, Sunderland, and Durham, was immense, being estimated at about 15,000. Several columns of the testimonial are already some feet from the ground. The stone used for the ceremony was at the bottom of the hill; and, being raised by decorated shrou, was wound round the hill, followed by music, &c., until it reached its destined place on the summit. We have received a sketch, taken on the spot, of this magnificent scene, which we shall present to our readers next week with a more detailed account.

PROPOSED STATUE TO GEORGE STEPHENSON, ESQ.—The Liverpool and Manchester and Grand Junction Railway Companies have it in contemplation to order a statue of this eminent engineer, executed by Gibson, and erected in some public place in Liverpool, as a monument of their respect for his talents and services in introducing the railway system, and especially in planning and executing the great lines of railway connected with that town. The principal room in the new St. George's Hall is spoken of as the most likely place for the reception of the proposed statue, but the plan is not yet sufficiently advanced for any decision to have been come to on that point.

A MONUMENT TO DR. DALTON.—On Monday last, a preliminary meeting of the various literary and scientific societies of Manchester, was held in the rooms of the Literary and Philosophical Society, for the purpose of considering what steps it is desirable should be taken, with a view to secure the erection of a monument to the memory of the late Dr. Dalton. The meeting came to a resolution, "That, in order that the steps necessary to the action may be adopted without delay, and to give to the public generally the opportunity of joining in this additional mark of respect to the memory of Dr. Dalton, it is desirable that a requisition should be presented to the Mayor, to convene a public meeting to determine what steps shall be taken to secure the erection of such monument; and also to consider as to the propriety of testifying in any further, and in what manner, the sense entertained by the community of the invaluable services rendered to science by the late illustrious philosopher."

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.—The general subscription fund for the approaching meeting of this scientific association has already reached a sum exceeding nine hundred pounds. It is exclusively appropriated for covering the expenses at York, in which city the annual meeting is to take place. It is intended to bring forward and discuss several recent and important scientific discoveries. The daily scientific business of the association is to be distributed into seven sections, namely:—Section A. Mathematical and physical science; B. Chemical and mineralogy, including their application to agriculture and the arts; C. Zoology and physical geography; D. Zoology and botany; E. Medical science; F. Statistics; G. Mechanical science. The meeting is expected to be a most important and interesting one.

POWDER-MILL EXPLOSION.—On Wednesday morning, between four and five o'clock, one of the powder mills in Kew Hill, belonging to Sir Henry Bridges, Bart., exploded, and the building was totally destroyed. The report was heard at a distance of two miles, and the police were very soon on the spot. A man, whose name is Henry Hawkins, was at work in an adjoining mill, and experienced the effects of the shock, but the explosion happily did not communicate. There appears to be a singular fatality about these mills, this being the third or fourth explosion within twelve months time.

FATAL STRAM-BOLLER EXPLOSION.—Last week there was an explosion of two boilers connected with the engine at the iron works belonging to Mr. Firmstone, at Little Madeley, Staffordshire, which was attended with fatal results to one of the firemen. A large piece of the iron, about fifteen cwt., was seen to rise over the tall chimney, and fall in a field opposite, across the turnpike-road. Another piece, of an immense weight, travelled in a contrary direction, and fell in a field above a quarter of a mile distant, and was found as flat as a pancake. A number of smaller pieces were distributed around, in every direction, doing in collision with various objects. A quantity of bricks, displaced from about the boilers by the violence of the explosion, were hurled with terrific force through the roofs of the cottages; others were thrown into an adjoining cornfield. A poor fellow, named Charles Muir, who was attending to his business in the field, was thrown down by a body of falling bricks, and he died instantly. At the inquest a verdict of "Accidental Death" was returned.

DEVASTATING FIRE IN SOMERSETSHIRE.—A very serious fire took place on Sunday morning, in the village of Winham, near Chard, in Somersetshire, and terminated in the complete demolition of no fewer than thirty houses. The fire broke out soon after ten o'clock, during divine service; and on the alarm being raised, the fire was raging in the upper part of a house situated, with others, at the extremity of the village, and the thatch roof soon ignited, the building was speedily reduced to ashes. Attempts were made to check the flames from running along the thatch of the adjoining houses, but ineffectually, for, within the space of a quarter of an hour, no less than eight of the adjoining dwellings had caught fire; and there being no engines in the neighbourhood, it extended its ravages until twelve buildings were consumed. The remainder were preserved by the inhabitants stripping the thatch off the roofs, and throwing water on the exposed rafters, so as to prevent them being fired. A second outbreak, far more destructive than the previous one, took place at about half-past ten o'clock on Monday night, in a small out-house at the back of a dwelling in Church-street; and scarcely had an hour elapsed before upwards of fourteen houses were enveloped in flames. It is supposed that they were the work of an incendiary, but nothing decisive has as yet been known. The loss must be very heavy.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE AT BURY.—Within the last few days Captain Goate, R.N., C.B., committed suicide at his apartments in the Assembly Rooms, Bury, Suffolk, of which establishment he was one of the directors. From the facts adduced at the coroner's inquest it appears that for some time past he was in a wretched, desponding state, arising from his infirm condition and advanced age, being in his seventy-eighth year. On Friday week he retired to rest at an early hour, apparently in his usual spirits. On the following morning he was called at eight o'clock by one of his servants, and answered her, but on her taking up his breakfast to his bedchamber in the course of two hours afterwards, as was the custom, he was not to be found in the apartment. Some hasty search was then made, and the unfortunate gentleman was at last found dead on a pattern of water, his head being downwards. A surgeon was promptly called in, who stated that life had been extinct for more than an hour. The jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed himself while in great distress of mind from fear of losing his sight, but whether an unaccountable state there was no evidence to show."

EXECUTION AT NEWCASTLE UPON-TYNE.—Yesterday week Mark Shewwood was executed on the Town Moor, Newcastle, for the murder of his wife. On the preceding day he made a confession, in which he denied all premeditation in the commission of the deed; that he slept with his wife during the night, and that she got up once to know, as she said, how the cursed still was going on. In the morning, when he awoke, he partly dressed himself, and put on his great-coat, and while lathering his chin for the purpose of shaving, his wife re-appeared, in irritating language, to the quarrel of the preceding night—and this, together with her gross and unbecoming conduct before him, so excited and enraged him, that in the moment he suddenly turned round, seized and threw her down, and with the razor which he held in his hand, made several gashes on her throat; after which he drank spirits to excess, to destroy himself, and fell down, at the place where he was found. He further stated, that with respect to the death of his first wife, he denied all participation in it, and said that the reports against him about it were all false. Shewwood ascended the steps to the floor of the platform with a steady firm tread. The executioner approached him with a white rag, which he put on the head of the culprit, who said, "Take off my stock, but leave my eyes open," and, at his request, the cap was not drawn over his face in the usual way. The drop fell about nine minutes to one o'clock, and the culprit died without a struggle. He had a small book and a manuscript in his hand, and many thought that he intended to address the multitude, but he never manifested the least intention of doing so. The crowd to witness the execution, notwithstanding a tremendous shower of rain, was immense. There were at least 25,000 people present.

MURDER ON HANBURY RACE COURSE.—Information has been received of the murder of Samuel Newman, a hawker, a few nights ago, on the above race-course, by two men and a woman, who are well known as frequenters of race-courses and fairs. They brutally assaulted him, and after they had rifled him of everything, threw him into a river near the spot, where he was discovered. A verdict of "Willful Murder" has been returned by the coroner's jury against them. One of the men is known by the name of George Star Bull. The woman is known as Gloucester Eliza, and is always in company with the above men.

ALARMING STRAM-BOLLER EXPLOSION NEAR SHEFFIELD.—Another of those terrific explosions which have of late disgraced the locality of Sheffield took place on Sunday night last, at the colliery known by the name of the Deep Pit, in the occupation of the Sheffield Coal Company. This pit is situated about two miles from the town, on the right side of the road to Eckington, and is one of those from which the colliers turned out a few months since. A number of the old hands intended to go to work again at this pit, and it appears that a number of others were determined to prevent it. It is supposed, therefore, that to carry this determination into effect, the destruction of the boiler and steam-engine was accordingly resolved on. The explosion was heard many miles off, in the direction of Eckington, the wind at the time being in the west. On this occasion the chief movers in the act have been caught in their own trap; for not being aware that the boilers under the boiler were then smouldering, they introduced a cask of gunpowder, and by some means it ignited while they were close to the door of the door. The effort on one misguided man named Boulton was terrific. He reached the door of his sister, who keeps the Norfolk Arms at the Manor, about twelve o'clock, and who had from his noise and dress would not have known him. His face and hands presented a spectacle truly pitiable to behold. The face was like one large black roller, the hair entirely seared from the head, and the eyes, though not lost, fastidiously swollen and burnt round the lids. Both hands were in a similar state, and the left side was also much injured. On being let into the house, he merely observed that he was dying, and immediately afterwards became almost speechless, only uttering at times something that could not be understood. Portions of hats, caps, and coats were found near the boiler, all much burnt by gunpowder. Parts of some wooden hoops and staves were also found, indicating sufficient to prove that the cask containing the gunpowder was capable of holding about 30 pounds. The state of the boiler and caps was also enough to show that the boiler that were then in no workable condition. The whole of the metal work surrounding the store door was forced away, and more or less broken. The fire grate was much damaged, and the stone plate shattered. A poker, nearly an inch thick, which had apparently been used to force the barrel of gunpowder under the boiler was broken off about two feet from the lower end. The steam chest, which was about ten feet from the boiler, but connected by an iron tube, was also forced off, and the boiler itself had been driven six inches from its original position. Boulton is about 25 years of age, and it is said that his father, who was a collier, once received a similar injury from an accident.

HIS MAJESTY'S VISIT TO IRELAND.—A letter from Dublin dated Tuesday, says:—"The engrossing topic in all circles is the royal visit, which is now spoken of as a matter almost of certainty, although nothing whatever in a positive or official form has transpired upon the subject." The Dublin Evening Post says:—"We stated on Saturday that a communication had reached us, which left little doubt on our mind that the Queen will arrive in Dublin in the course of the next month. We have since seen or heard nothing to weaken this impression, but, on the contrary, much to confirm it."

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—PRINCE ALBERT.—At the last weekly meeting of the Council of the Royal Irish Agricultural Society, the following letter from General Wemyss, Secretary to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, was read:—"Windsor Castle, Aug. 12, 1844. Sir.—In compliance with the request communicated by you from the Council of the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland, I am commanded by his Royal Highness Prince Albert to acquaint you that it will afford his Royal Highness much pleasure in being nominated a member of the society, and you will be so good as to communicate to the Council his Royal Highness's cheerful acquiescence in their wishes. Your obedient servant, W. WEMYSS. To the secretary, &c. &c." Ordered.—That the above letter should be acknowledged, and that Mr. Purcell be desired to take the necessary steps for announcing to his Royal Highness that he had been admitted a member of the society, and for presenting to him the society's medal, which had been gained by him for the best oat annual in the year at the late cattle show.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting of this association was held on Monday at the Conchobhar Hall, Dublin. A letter was read from Sir James Graham, stating that the address in favour of repeal had been laid before her Majesty. It appears from the other proceedings that agitation is about to be commenced with the view of inducing the people generally to abstain from the consumption of respectable articles. A long address was read which had been presented to Mr. O'Connell on the subject. In this address the authors, after contending that England had always acted despotically towards Ireland, allude to the Repeal of the Union, and express their confidence that the measure must be conceded. Pending this question, however, the memorialists submit for the consideration of Mr. O'Connell this intermediate plan of abstinence from excusable articles, and proceed thus:—"The plan, if carried into general operation, through our instrumentalities, must be effectual in working from the reluctant hand of England speedy and ample justice for our afflicted country. It is the plan which marked the origin of the American revolution, and led to American independence. It is the plan which was partially carried into effect by yourself in Clare, and is just now put into operation in the county of Wexford. It is the plan of arousing an organized determination in the whole Irish nation of abstaining from the consumption of all taxed articles. If this can be effectuated through your advice and influence three great results will be obtained. It will exhibit the union, the determination, the moral power, the heroism, and the injured feelings of an entire people. It will tend to eradicate the injurious habits and elevate the moral character of our countrymen, and it will lessen by four millions sterling the receipts of the English exchequer. It will thus touch England in her most sensitive part, her pocket, and force from her an immediate compliance with Ireland's just and moderate demands. The undersigned will cheerfully abandon the comforts, the enjoyments, say, the necessities of life rather than swell from Irish resources the sources of haughty and ungrateful England. Let England show a disposition to act fairly, impartially, and justly towards Ireland, and we shall willingly assent, in proportion to our means, in delaying the enormous charges by which she is pressed down; but as long as she refuses, in return for the civil liberties Ireland has won for her, to aid us in obtaining equal political freedom, so long shall we remain contributing to her revenue or breaking any share in her burdens. To your influence, your patriotism, and your great practical experience, do we look with confidence for the accomplishment of this praiseworthy and glorious project. If it meet your approval it must succeed. Call on your countrymen; your advice will be followed; and, through the instrumentality of this great national movement, Ireland may yet, within the period of a single year, work out her political regeneration. This is a weapon she can easily and effectively wield, without destroying human life or impeding national prosperity. It requires but the will. If she refuse let her abandon the Repeal of the Union, for she has not sufficient moral determination to be free." The signatures are those of men entirely unknown to fame. Town Councillor Reilly handed in £214 from Galway, and £47 from county Louth, and observed that he was sorry he had not any more money from them at present, for it was by money England was to be beaten. (Hear, hear.) They would not submit to be ill-treated. (Hear, hear.) The rent amounted to £534 13s. 11d.

MURDER NEAR LEINSTER.—A dreadful homicide has taken place in this latterly peaceable district, being the murder of a man named Pierce Campion, residing at Mount, near Lennater. On Thursday evening, the 15th inst., between nine and ten o'clock, Campion went into his field, when he heard a violent knocking at the door of his house. On going to the road for the purpose of securing the cause of the disturbance he was seized by a man named Patrick Cooney, who held his arm while he was struck on the head with a stone by another person named Fitzpatrick. Campion immediately fell on the ground, and his assassin fled. He was soon afterwards carried into his house, where he lingered until the following Monday, when he died.

A man of the detachment of the 55th Regiment, living in Waterford barracks, was drowned in the tank at the Artillery barracks magazine a few nights ago. His name was John Noland. He was on sentry over the magazine, when, it is supposed, he set his foot against the sentry-box, where it was fixed and stood, and went and sat down upon the kerosene which separates the tank from the tank, fell asleep, and fell backwards into the tank, where he was found quite dead by the corporal who went to relieve him. There was not more than three feet of water in the tank.

ST BARNABAS CATHOLIC CHURCH, NOTTINGHAM.

CONSECRATION OF ST. BARNABAS ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, NOTTINGHAM.

The public consecration of this admirably designed edifice, the largest Catholic church yet completed in this country since the Reformation, took place, on a scale of unusual magnificence, on Tuesday last. Dr. Wiseman was the officiating bishop, supported by twelve other priests; and an amazing number of persons were present. The ceremonies commenced at seven a.m., and extended over seven hours.

On Wednesday the church was solemnly opened, with a procession of the bishops and priests inside the church; there was also a Pontifical High Mass at half-past ten o'clock, and vespers at half-past five o'clock, with a sermon at each service, in the morning by the Right Rev. Bishop Wiseman, and in the afternoon by the Right Rev. Bishop Gillis. The public were admitted to the church by tickets, divided into three classes, corresponding to three different divisions of the church; the proceeds of the sale of these tickets being devoted towards the expenses of the opening, and the building fund. Arrangements were made with the Midland Railway Company for a special train for the conveyance of passengers from Birmingham to Nottingham, and back, within the day, and the attendance of visitors was, consequently, very numerous.

After the ceremony of opening the church, there was a public collation at the Nottingham Exchange Hall, which was graced by the presence of several ladies. The Right Hon. the Earl of Shrewsbury presided; and among the Stewards were the Lords Arundell, Camoys, Dormer, Newburgh, Southwell, and Stourton; Sir E. Mount, Bart.; the Hon. Charles Clifford; P. H. Howard, Esq., M.P.; the Hon. Charles Langdale; Sir Piers Mostyn, Bart.; Sir E. Smythe, Bart.; the Hon. T. E. Stonor; the Hon. P. Stourton; Sir E. Vavasour, Bart.; Sir C. Wolseley, Bart., &c. &c. After the collation, the Right Hon. Chairman addressed the company, and then returned to the church. We subjoin the architectural details of this important structure:—

This splendid church, dedicated to St. Barnabas, is erected on an elevated site on the south side of Tollhouse-hill. The first stone was laid by the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, on Tuesday, the 10th of May, 1842; and, when complete, it will be one of the most successful revivals of ancient ecclesiastical architecture; it is from the design of Mr. Welby Pugin, architect of St. George's, London, and many other Catholic churches recently erected. The choir is entirely surrounded by aisles and eastern chapels. Beneath the choir is a crypt, with vaulting springing from two rows of low pillars; at the eastern end of this undercroft is an altar, dedicated in honour of St. Peter, as being the foundation or rock of the church. The same staircases which lead up to the rood loft, at the entrance of the choir, are continued down to the crypt, which is lighted by side openings in the walls of the choir, which being elevated several feet above the pavement of the aisles, afford sufficient space for their introduction. The various chapels, as well as the choir, are enclosed by oak screens of open tracery, and panel-work. That portion of the church eastward of the transept is divided from the rest of the building by open screens and gates, on a line with the great rood-screen.

The rood-loft extends the whole width between the great east pillars supporting the tower, and is raised about fourteen feet from the choir; it is about seven feet in breadth, and in the centre a great rood is erected, with appropriate images, standards for lights, &c.

The choir is furnished with sixteen carved oak stalls and desks, precisely on the old model, and at the backs of the stalls are oak screens, which extend along both sides of the choir between the pillars. The pavement of the choir and sanctuary, as well as that of the eastern chapels, consists of incrustated tiles of various colours, similar in design and composition to those used in ancient churches. On the epistle side of the altar are fixed the sedilia, framed and carved in wood, somewhat similar in design to those still remaining in the choir of Westminster, and vulgarly called "King Sebert's Tomb." The high altar consists of a single slab of stone, supported on eight shafts, with gilt cap and bases. Immediately behind the altar a rich perforated oak screen extends across the eastern extremity of the choir, enriched with gold and colours, and, like the other screens, surmounted by standards for wax tapers. Through this screen the arched entrance and stained windows of the Lady Chapel are distinctly seen. In a chapel, on the epistle or south side of the choir, the Blessed Sacrament is reserved, on a rich altar, surmounted by a ciborium, or canopy, supported on four marble pillars, between which curtains are hung on brass rods, extending from cap to cap.

The windows of this church, 76 in number, are all glazed with stained glass, of various devices and subjects in the rich early style. The circular window over the eastern end of the choir represents the adoration of the lamb. In the windows of the nave are the following armorial bearings:—Talbot, Neville, Furnival, Lovetot, Verdon, Lacie; Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman; Right Rev. Dr. Jernyn's Cross, Coxton Abbey, and Workshop Priory. The lights of the Chapel of the Blessed Sacrament have been designed with especial reference to that great mystery; they consist of a succession of cherubim in ruby colour, signifying the intensity of Divine love, and are placed on a field of azure, bordered by alternate crosses and ciboriums, &c. The eastern window of the Lady Chapel contains the mysteries of the Annunciation, Visitation, Birth of our Lord, Adoration of the wise men, and the coronation of our Blessed Lady: these are placed in circular compartments on a field of lilacs intersected by blue bands:—in each of the side lights are eagles, each bearing a vase of the Manna, or Cantic of the Blessed Virgin. (Luke i. 46.) It is proposed eventually to cover all the spandrels of the arches, walls, &c., with painted enrichments.

The plan of the Church is cruciform, 198 feet in length, from east to west; the transepts are 83 feet by 30 feet, and 34 feet high; the nave is 75 feet by 22 feet; and the north and south aisles are each 15 feet 6 inches in breadth; they are separated from the nave by eight columns and ten pointed arches, and from the transepts by the two west pillars of the tower and two arches. From the door to the top of the close story wall is 34 feet. The choir, 37 feet by 22 feet, is separated from the transepts by the east pillars of the tower, and from the aisles north and south of it by six, and from the east by two pointed arches. The three aisles are each 14 feet 3 inches. The Chapel of the Blessed Sacrament, south of the choir, is 41 feet by 13 feet, and separated from the south aisle of the choir by three pointed arches. The Sacristy, east of and adjoining to this chapel, is 17 feet 6 inches, by 12 feet. St. Mary's Chapel, in which are seven stalls at the east end, and three on the south side, is 35 feet by 16 feet; on the north of this is the Chapel of St. Michael and the Holy Angels, and on the south side the Chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury and Venerable Bede, in each of which are three stalls; and each chapel is 15 feet square. The organ gallery, 16 feet by 12 feet, is on the north side of the choir. The north and south porches are 12 feet square. Each of the pointed gables terminates with a cross, and contains an evangelistic symbol.

The tower contains eight belfry windows, and is surmounted by a spire of the early style, about 150 feet in height, terminating in a metal cross, surmounted by a cock; at the base of the spire are four-angle niches, containing images of Saints Peter, and Paul, St. John the Evangelist, and St. Barnabas; over these are four pinnacles, and between the niches are four double lancet windows with high gables, on the crests of which are emblems of the four Evangelists. The whole of the spire is built in solid masonry, and the weight is borne by internal skew arches in the angles of the tower, and down to the four great pillars, which rest on inverted arches. The entrance porches are on the north and south side, and the principal entrance is at the west end.

Beside the high altar there are five other altars, dedicated in honour of St. Peter, St. Michael, and All Angels, St. Thomas of Canterbury and Venerable Bede, and the altar of the Blessed Sacrament. These are all furnished with hangings, plate, and other ornaments, in the same character as the building, and the minutest details have been executed in the spirit of Catholic antiquity. Immediately behind the high altar is an image of our Blessed Lady, under a rich canopy, and supported by a corbel, representing a serpent coiled round an apple tree. The entire cost of the church is about £15,000, and the chief benefactor is commemorated by the following inscription, running along the bottom of the aisle windows:—"Good Christian people, of your charity pray for the good estate of John, Earl of Shrewsbury, the chief benefactor to the building of this church, dedicated in honour of Saint Barnabas."

THE POLYTECHNIC SCHOOL, AT PARIS.

The dissolution of the Polytechnic School, at Paris, was noticed in our Foreign Intelligence of last week. The French Government, according to the Courrier Français, "has been long labouring to disorganize the Polytechnic School, in order to subject it to the arbitrary will of the Ministry. An institution, having its regulations, usages, and traditions, gives umbrage to our rulers, who are striving to undermine by degrees all the guarantees which it insured to the pupils, for the sake of setting up in their place the arbitrary sway of administrative and military despotism. They wish to convert a school, possessing regular conditions of existence, into a barracks. The exercise of acknowledged rights keeps up the spirit of independence. With a view to break that spirit, which they dread, they suppress the rights and destroy an establishment, which is indebted for its energetic vitality to its particular organization. Marshal Soult commenced the work of destruction, and it behoves M. Guizot to give it the finishing blow. From 1796 to 1835—that is, in an interval of thirty-nine years—the Polytechnic School furnished the land army with 2839 officers, the navy 289, and 818 civil engineers—in all, 3946, or a little more than 100 per annum. Since the great development assumed by the public works, between 40 and 50 engineers of the department of bridges and roads came out of the school annually. In 1799, the school consisted of 274 pupils, 160 of whom were without fortune, 75 in easy circumstances, and 39 rich. In 1840, the institution contained 270 pupils, belonging all to rich families, for, in order to be admitted, it is at present necessary that each pupil bring with him an outfit valued at 700 or 800 francs, and their family must, besides, pay a pension of 1000 francs a year."

The Polytechnic School, in the Rue Descartes, was founded by a decree of the National Convention, in March, 1794. Its object was to diffuse the knowledge of the mathematical, physical, and chemical sciences, and likewise to prepare pupils for the different schools of engineering, military, civil, and naval; and for the artillery, and military geography, into which persons cannot be admitted without having studied in the Polytechnic School. Under the Government of Napoleon, the school underwent various modifications; and by Louis XVIII., in 1816, it was completely re-organised, and placed under the special protection of the Duke of Angoulême. A great number of excellent officers, engineers, and scientific men have been trained in this school. Our engraving represents two of the pupils—in their undress and full uniform.

STRIKE OF WORKMEN AT BERLIN.

Accounts have been received from Berlin, of a general strike among workmen in the extensive calico-printing works of that city, comprising a body of from 2500 to 3000 men, for an augmentation of wages; but which, it appears, the owners are not inclined to grant. It originated in the very extensive works called the Dannenbergsche-Cotum Fabrick, belonging to the Messrs. Nauen, Loire, and Co., a firm well known in Prussia for the extreme liberality with which it has treated their workmen, and extended itself among the neighbouring works of Messrs. Goldschmidt and Co. It was at first rumoured that some very serious disturbances had succeeded the strike, and that the works had been fired; but this has not been the case. There appears no real or just cause why the men should have acted so unwisely, since the wages hitherto granted have been very liberal, considering the great depression which has existed for some time back in the calico-printing trade.

At Breslau, it has been said that some disturbances have also occurred among the weavers; but there is no certainty as yet in the matter. Generally speaking, the people of Prussia are much against such outbreaks, and at Berlin the police and military have had more to do in keeping the more respectable part of the working-classes from inflicting punishment on the refractory than keeping the latter in order. These people are aware that, in general, the manufacturing part of the population are by no means ill-paid or ill-treated, and, from a moral and sensible feeling, dislike such unreasonable and unjust proceedings; whereby they can only injure themselves and their families more than any one else. Some partial arrests have, however, taken place, but it is expected the men will soon return to their work, seeing that the general feeling is against them.—Hamburg Correspondent of the Times.

"JOE SMITH," THE MORMON PROPHET.

The murder of this popular fanatic has been already recorded in our journal. The numbers who adhered to him, a few months ago, amounted to twenty thousand, and formed themselves into a town, called the City of Nauvoo. A code of Mormon laws was drawn up for its government. Joe Smith was Mayor, or Theocrat; and the influence of the prophet prevailed so widely that he commanded a majority of votes in the state of Illinois, and started for the office and dignity of President of the United States, with no mean prospects of success. In the spring of 1844, he indulged in the most sensual excesses: he justified his licentiousness on each occasion of his notoriety by pretending to a new revelation from heaven; and twenty thousand Americans believed his lies and defended his conduct. The Nauvoo Expositor was got up by a knot of seceders, and, owing to its representations and other evidence, the fanatic Smith had to seek refuge in a prison from an infuriated mob. In prison, however, he was murdered in cold blood.

Joe Smith, according to his own statement, was born in the town of Sharon, Vermont, on the 23rd of December, 1805, so that at the time of his death he must have nearly entered his fortieth year. His parents, when he was ten years of age, emigrated to Palmyra, where he resided until he was twenty-one years old. Joe Smith, being probably the son of poor parents, of quick natural powers and sagacity, but of limited education, must have been thrown upon his own resources for means of existence at an early period; for we find him pretending to have discovered the Book of Mormon in Ontario County, in 1827. General Bennett, an influential Mormon, published a work in 1843, in which he exposed the impostures of Joe Smith, in connection with Mormonism. From an affidavit of Peter Ingersoll in 1833, we learn that he lived in the neighbourhood of Joe Smith, senior, from 1822 to 1830, and represents that the general employment of the family was digging for money. Joe had found a miraculous stone, which he ascribed by looking into he could discover hidden treasures.

With such a character and such a family and such pursuits, Joe Smith began his great scheme of trickery and delusion in Mormonism; the book itself is a mass of absurdities, written in imitation of the style of the Bible, in which Joe was proclaimed a prophet and priest of the Most High, and thus he drew around him a vast body of uneducated enthusiasts, who journeyed west to commence their operations on a great scale. The history of Mormonism since its establishment in the Western States, the building of the city of Nauvoo, the increase of the deluded followers of Joe Smith, his conflicts with the authorities of the States of Missouri and Illinois, his insatiable spirit of intrigue and mischief, his loose morals, violence, and chicanery, have been the subject of newspaper discussion for the last seven years.

It is evident that Joe Smith contemplated, whenever he had sufficient force, to conquer several of the Western States, and erect there a Mormon empire; and he organized his Nauvoo legion, amounting to several thousand men, with this object. He was a source of constant inquietude to the State of Missouri.

The immediate cause of Joe Smith's recent difficulties was the destruction of a press in Nauvoo, to which he was opposed; he was compelled to take refuge for safety in the gaol, guarded by a body of troops which had been placed there by the Governor of Illinois to protect him; but a band of men broke into the prison and murdered him and his brother.

COAST RAILWAYS.—Mr. Rastrick and numerous assistants are now busily engaged in setting out the lines of railway from Brighton through Lewes to Hastings, and from Shoreham to Chichester, and as soon as these preliminaries are completed the earthworks will be immediately commenced; the Act is to be passed by means of a pile bridge—and we hear that Mr. Rastrick promises to open as far as Worthing in May next; we also understand, from good authority, that the line from Hastings to Lewes is likely to be opened to the public in May or June next. In a national point of view, the early completion of these coast lines is of immense importance. There is little doubt that the branch line about to be made to Chichester will at an early period be continued to Portsmouth—and should the eastern line in like manner be extended to Dover, there will be an unbroken communication between two of the most important points on the southern coast.

THE QUEEN OF GREECE.

Amelia, the lovely young Queen of Greece, is the eldest daughter of the reigning Grand Duke of Oldenburg, by his first wife. She was born on the 21st of December, 1818, and is consequently in her 25th year. She was married to King Otho (whose portrait and memoir we gave in a former Number) on the 22nd of November, 1836, and as yet has no children. Her Majesty is universally beloved by her subjects, possessing all those feminine virtues and accomplishments which are the brightest jewels of a crowned head. The above portrait (which we have just received from Athens) represents her Majesty attired in the beautiful Greek costume which she wears on state occasions.

INSPECTION OF REVENUE CRUISERS, IN KINGSTOWN HARBOUR, DUBLIN.

TROPHY FROM INDIA.

For several days past thousands of persons have been attracted to the river frontage of the Tower, to inspect a "monster" gun, which was taken during one of the brilliant victories in India, in 1841. It appears to have been manufactured of several valuable metallic compounds, and is in good condition. It possesses fewer embellishments than what are generally to be seen on British trophies brought from the eastern hemisphere. The following are its dimensions:—

Length	17 feet 3 inches.
Diameter of the bore	9 "
And weight	7 tons 5 cwt. 15 lb.

MONSTER GUN, AT THE TOWER OF LONDON.

It has been placed beside the numerous pieces of heavy artillery in front of the Ordnance-office.

NEW METHOD OF PAINTING ON WALLS.—We understand that a new method of painting on walls has been submitted to Her Majesty's Commissioners of Fine Arts, by the inventor, Mr. S. Henderson, who vouches for its durability under all vicissitudes of climate, temperature, &c. It has, at least, one advantage, which may be seen by viewing the artist's two pictures in Westminster Hall—"Law" and "Peace"—that of possessing the intensity of oil-painting, without the glare.

FORTUNE'S FORTUNE.—A gentleman, named Clements, died a few days ago at Lower Clapton, Middlesex, at the age of eighty-five. He resided, when a lad, in Aylesbury; and his life is remarkable for a continuation of good fortune which never foretook him. His first start in life was an engagement at the King's Head Inn, Aylesbury, then kept by the late Mr. Honeyer, who took him into his employ as post-boy and errand-boy. Here, by his industry and perseverance, he soon became a great favourite with those by whom he was employed, as also by the persons who frequented the inn at that time; and he shortly saved himself £15, with which he started to London, as the term is, "to seek his fortune." Here he at once obtained a situation as waiter at an hotel much frequented by stockbrokers; from servant he soon became the master and owner of the house where he had served as assistant; from landlord to banker; and from banker upon "Charge," returning, it is said, the enormous amount of £1,000,000 per week, eventually realising a fortune of £200,000. Mr. Clements was not, however, regardless of the poor of his native town, and has, for many years, distributed an annual gift of bread and coals at Christmas, to the indigent families thereof; in addition to which, a pound's worth of silver was regularly sent to be distributed amongst the poor recipients of the holy sacrament at the parish church.

INSPECTION OF VESSELS IN KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

On Monday his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant expressed his intention of inspecting the vessels. They were moored in a half circle for that purpose, dressed in their flags, which gave to the harbour a most interesting appearance. At about half-past eleven his Excellency embarked in the barge of the Shamrock, steered by the Vice-Commodore, Captain Rowe. The commander of each cutter, according to seniority, received his Excellency, and saluted him with oars towed as he passed through their double line of boats. Having rowed round the fleet, he proceeded to the Shamrock, where he was received by a royal salute from each of the vessels, with their yards manned. He complimented Sir James Dromie, Inspector-General, and the officers, on the perfection and state of efficiency of the fleet, and landed under another royal salute. The cutters were immediately stripped of their flags, and in a few minutes were in the bay, under all sail. His Excellency proceeded in her Majesty's steamer Lucifer, sailed round the fleet twice, and witnessed their evolutions.

On the following day, Saturday, about the same time, the vessels weighed and proceeded out of the harbour, with the wind at N.W., fresh breeze off the land, and smooth water. It was previously arranged to sail round Lambay Island, through its sound, and round the Kish light-ship, to Kingstown pier-head—a distance of forty miles. The start was admirable; the vessels being close together, except the Prince of Wales, which was half a mile astern. The strong breeze prevented the cutters carrying more than a reef in their mainmast, until rounding Lambay, when they were enabled to carry their full-topmasts and square-sails, running to the Kish light-ship before the wind, which they rounded in the following order:—

Kite	3 h. 11 m.	Hamilton	3 h. 34 m.
Royal George	3 h. 39 m.	Dolphin	3 h. 40 m.
Prince of Wales	3 h. 36 m.	Swift	3 h. 41 m.
Wickham	3 h. 39 m.	Chance	3 h. 36 m.
Badger	3 h. 39 m.

The smaller vessels had previously been recalled. In proceeding from the Kish light-ship to the pier four tacks were made, and they arrived in the following order:—

Kite	4 h. 39 m.	Hamilton	5 h. 16 m.
Royal George	4 h. 49 m.	Dolphin	5 h. 29 m.
Prince of Wales	4 h. 51 m.	Chance	5 h. 35 m.
Badger	4 h. 53 m.	Swift	5 h. 36 m.
Wickham	4 h. 54 m.

On Friday, the 15th inst., the squadron of H.M. revenue cruisers assembled in the harbour of Kingstown, for their annual inspection and exercise, under the orders of John Rowe, Esq., Inspecting Commander, being eighteen in number, viz:—

Shamrock (brig), 200; Royal George (cutter), 149; Prince Albert, 149; Prince of Wales, 155; Kite, 154; Wickham, 153; Swift, 154; Dolphin, 84; Badger, 60; Hamilton, 59; Chance, 58; Racer, 60; Eliza, 53; Albatross, 47; Liverpool, 39; Neptune, 48; Bal, 33; Viper, 43, tons.

At eleven a.m. the Inspector-General of the Coast Guard hoisted his flag on board the Shamrock, and made the signal to weigh. This evolution was performed in an incredible short space of time, and the vessels proceeded into the bay with a strong wind at S.W., under a single-reefed mainmast, and closed round the senior officer, who directed another reef to be taken in, and "try rate of sailing by the wind, without regard to order." At three the general recall was made; the vessels bore up to close round the brig, when the Badger was declared to have been the weather vessel, being half a mile to windward of the Kite; the Royal George, Wickham, and Hamilton being the next vessels.

The jetties were crowded with fashionable. Special trains were provided by the railway directors. The vessels sailed round the harbour, and came to mooring in their usual seaman-like style, concluding one of the finest sights we ever witnessed.

BISHOP'S BRIDGE, NORWICH.

This picturesque bridge is situated at the end of Bishop-street, and leads to the roads to Moushold, to Thorpe, and other villages and towns to the east of Norwich. It is an excellent specimen of early bridge-building; its pointed arches and quaint appearance make it an exceedingly picturesque object.

Mr. Britton, in his "Picturesque Antiquities," states that "it has its name from having belonged to and been connected with the palace as early as 1340. In 1275, the prior had licence to erect a gate on it. Since the year 1393, it has been taken charge of by the city, who appointed a porter to keep the gate. An hermitage was connected with this bridge, and was, probably, on the site of the old houses presented, on the right hand, in the annexed view. At a bend of the river, to the north of the bridge, is an ancient tower, called the Dungeon, which, according to Blomefield, was finished, at a great expense, in 1390."

The houses in Bishop-street are very old. At some little distance from the bridge, on the road to Moushold, the ground rises gently, till it forms a tolerable eminence, at the base of which, on the right of the road from Norwich, there was formerly a pit, in which persons convicted of heresy were burned. This pit has been filled up many years, and the original name of the hill, St. Leonard's, forgotten. The river crossed by Bishop's Bridge is the Wensum: it is of no great width, or depth. The view of the cathedral from this bridge is very fine; its lofty tower and spire being peculiarly striking.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Constant Subscriber."—The Act for the Amendment of the Law of Settlement was brought in by Sir J. Graham on the 8th of August. He then stated the principal provisions of the measure, saying, at the same time, that it was not intended to pass it into a law during the present session. This course was taken that the members might consider the measure fully during the recess. Our correspondents will see, therefore, that the law is proposed only, not passed; but it will be re-introduced and carried through next session. An act of Parliament comes into operation from the day it receives the royal assent, unless there is a day specially provided by the act itself on which it is to commence. The act in question proposes to repeal between 30 and 40 existing acts relating to settlement, substituting in their place the many present complex modes of gaining it; but it will not disturb old settlements already gained and confirmed by order, or a decision of a court of law. Our correspondents had better obtain the act itself, which may be procured of the Queen's printer at a very slight expense.

"A Subscriber."—Portman's war, should write to the Secretary of the School of Design, Somerset House.

"M. M."—Brighton.—The drawing of Baz's Cricket-ground was by Mr. Sergeant, and the report was abridged from the Brighton Gazette.

"Beano."—Bala.—The company give a receipt for the fee, when paid.

"Young King."—Temple.—The manuscript shall be returned, if not available.

"H. L."—A Constant Reader.—An engraving of Greenwich Hospital will not suit.

"A Constant Reader" should send a note, addressed to Mr. J. S. K., under cover, to Mr. Moore, publisher, Dover-street.

"M. I. G."—An action would lie, and the defendant's oath would not be received as evidence.

"Caleb Brown" should send the pamphlet.

"A. L."—Bradford, will find much information in the Parliamentary Report on the Fruit Trade.

"K. C. B."—Manchester.—The large diamond in the possession of the Emperor of Brazil is, we believe, cut.

"W. Y."—Belfast.—The report reached us much too late.

"L. N."—Hall-place, Newington.—The cost of the Thames Tunnel is stated at £214,000. See the detailed account in No. 46 of our Journal.

"I. F. H."—Barton.—The charge does not reach our standard.

"Walter Blake."—The charge for a newspaper sent by post to Van Diemen's Land is one penny.

"B. M. X."—We do not know.

"A Subscriber."—Manchester.—See future announcements of the great engraving of the Panorama of the Thames.

"Glasgow" is thanked for the sketch of the railway accident, for which we have not room.

"D. B."—Ramsay.—The print was designed by Mr. Thomas Landseer.

"A Subscriber."—South Molton.—The price of the Large Print is 1s. The Nelson Monument will be at length completed by Government.

"I. W. S."—Yes.

"W. K."—Birkenhead, should write to Mr. Deacon, Coffee-house, Walbrook, London.

"W. Pendener."—A gold mine is a dangerous speculation to meddle with.

"Lynd."—Louth.—A pamphlet on the British and French Customs has been published by Mr. C. Knight, Ludgate-street, London.

"An Inhabitant of Winchester."—We will endeavour to obtain the sketch.

"B. A."—We have not room for the note on the New River, Chapter on Mosaics is under consideration.

"G. S."—Burslem.—We cannot undertake to recommend medical books. A note to Messrs. Hingley, Fleet-street, might answer the purpose.

"Medicus."—Southey's edition of the Pilgrim's Progress.

"A Briton."—The observation was an oversight.

"N. M."—Rass-shire.—We have not room for the long letter on Scottish costume, and we have already stated the authority for our remark on its modern character.

The Author of "Ireland and the Irish" should see our Address in the present number.

"A. W. L."—Liverpool.—The height of the Duke of Wellington is about 5 feet 4 inches.

"S. C."—The marriage should take place within a month of the publication of the bans.

"A Constant Subscriber."—Dublin, should address a letter to Mr. Hobson, news-agent, Leeds.

"L. L."—The charge for servants in an inn can be legally made, if publicly announced.

"W. L. B."—Newcastle-upon-Tyne, asks the simple question, "Which is the greatest wonder of the world?" We answer "The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS."

"A Petitioner."—Kingston.—If a person goes to a nuisance he has no remedy; but, if the nuisance come to him, he has a remedy by indictment.

"J. H."—Farnborough.—The Large Print may be sent by post.

"Andrus S."—All the back numbers are kept in print; he will have the Large Print.

"I. S. D."—Lisson-grove.—Ineligible.

"Capt. A."—Weedon Barracks.—The engraving and description shall appear next week.

"I. S. D."—Stafford-street.—We have not room.

"N. L."—Liverpool.—We have frequently illustrated our subscriber's native town.

"E. M." near Wakefield, is thanked; but the subjects have been too often engaged.
"Continuans" Brighton.—The Census of Scotland and Ireland will be ready in a fortnight. Thanks for the suggestion.
"G. T." Maidstone, and "A. M." Harlepool, should write to the War-office. We have not room for the sketch of the regatta.
Reviews of several books, and replies to a few correspondents, are unavoidably deferred until next week.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1844.

THE feverish excitement caused by the events in the Mediterranean still continues, and appears to deepen in its effect on the public mind. The echoes of the cannon that played upon Tangier had scarcely ceased to vibrate, ere they were followed by another bombardment on the same coast. Mogadore has fallen, the French going a step further here than they did in their first attempt; they have taken possession of the place, thus making a lodgment on the coast of Morocco, which will probably be visited with all the blessings of the French colonial system, as exhibited at Algiers. The question now arises, as to what effect this occupation will have on the interests of England, and what is the course she ought to take. This course cannot be distinctly laid down till it is ascertained whether the French really intend to keep possession of the place; they cannot do so without a considerable military force, and Marshal Bugeaud has not any troops to spare, for the Moors, though beaten in the last engagement, made a stout resistance, and give promise of much military obstinacy for the future. At present the mania of France is for naval greatness; enough is being done by the army of Africa to satisfy the national vanity as to the land forces. But as to their naval strength, they are rather doubtful; they have all the wish to be a first-rate naval power, but a suspicion that they are not adapted to be one is forced even on themselves; that doubt must have been rather increased than diminished by the ineffective display at Tangier. But their irritable, excitable nature will be stimulated by it to other attempts, carried a little further than in the instance we have cited. Hence, at Mogadore, in addition to bombarding the place, we find the despatch leaves the Prince "engaged in establishing the garrison of the island." A little military business is here mixed with the naval; the Tangier experiment was too unsatisfactory to render an exact imitation or repetition of it desirable. So we have the bombardment and a military occupation combined.

The effects of this occupation on our interests might not be immediate, but they would be certain. The French are animated by a spirit of national jealousy that is as hostile to our commerce as our arms; and wherever they obtain a footing, there our manufactures are excluded by rates of duty absurdly high and disproportioned.

This has destroyed our regular and legitimate commerce with Algiers; it has been converted into a contraband system of dealing with the inhabitants of the coast, which the French are not in sufficient numbers to guard completely. It will as surely injure our intercourse with the Empire of Morocco as it has already done that of Algiers. This is an injury that will operate to the extent of the value of that trade on the commercial interest of this country, and must have much weight in dealing with the question.
